CITY OF WASHINGTON:
OFFICE OF THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.
1868.

J 11
Geo
ad. ext.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1868, by F. & J. RIVES & GEO. A. BAILEY,
In the Clerk's office of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia.

BLAIR,] whether, if this be true, the soldiers in the Army, their pensioned widows, and crippled comrades now the laborers on the streets, the mechanic in his workshop, the farmer for his produce, the trader for his commodities, and the sexton who "gathers them in," are all compelled to receive greenbacks in full payment, are they treated justly? Again, is the bondholder entitled to payment in gold and silver while those above named are compelled to take rags?

Mr. BLAIR. That is very good, indeed; very good. That is a catchword which is used to deceive the people all over the country. I undertook to show, and thought that I had answered the cavil of the gentleman, that the greenback has some value, because a man may trust that the Government means to pay it in gold at some period. I said that the Government ought to do it, and to do it directly; if not now, then as soon as it can; that that was its duty, and it is for the benefit of all that this should be done. I wish to make these securities more valuable than less so. It was a great necessity which caused the use of this paper at all. My sole object is to get rid of it as soon as may be and to return to a sound specie-paying currency.

Mr. WELKER. Will the gentleman allow me to make one remark?

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio.) The hour of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BLAIR] has expired.

Mr. PERHAM obtained the floor.

Mr. WELKER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a few minutes?

Mr. PERHAM. I cannot yield to the gentleman for more than a remark or two.

Mr. WELKER. I desire to say that I think the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BLAIR] has not correctly represented the position taken by the recent Republican convention in Ohio in reference to the payment of the bonds of the United States in greenbacks. That is all I will now take time to say, although I would be glad to say more, if it were not for trespassing too far upon the courtesy of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PERHAM.]

RELIEF FROM TAXATION—THE NATION'S FINANCES.

Mr. PERHAM. Mr. Speaker, next in importance to the restoration of the whole country to a condition of peace, happiness, and prosperity, and intimately connected with it are the questions in which our financial interests are involved. These questions are not only very important, affecting the interests of all the people, but exceedingly intricate. We are so unlike all other countries that their experience furnishes no guide for us, and our present condition is so unlike anything in our past history that our own experience furnishes but an uncertain light. True, we have many men among us who comprehend the whole subject, can see with mathematical certainty the precise results of any given policy, and can tell us exactly the kind of legislation needed to set all the financial machinery of the Government in harmonious and successful operation. Unfortunately, however, no two of these men can see alike. What one knows will produce certain results the other believes he knows will produce entirely different results. Some of us not favored with this remarkable light and foresight, who have been obliged to grope our way in the partial darkness, have sometimes attempted to follow in the path of these luminaries in the hope of bringing order out of confusion, but only to experience the mortification of seeing "confusion worse confounded." I confess that I have not quite as much confidence in the judgments of men "learned in finance" as I once had. In our present condition much wisdom and great caution are required. We are liable to legislate too much. In this lies our great danger. Laws of Congress should not interfere with what the laws of business demand. We need time as well as laws to adjust our disordered finances. Every step should be thoroughly considered before it is taken. Better not move at all than take a step in the wrong direction. This lesson it is hoped we have learned by the experience of the past.

The work before us may be stated as follows:

To lighten the burdens of taxation.

To establish the national credit.

To give a currency that shall be equal to gold.

To lower the rates of interest.

To provide for the payment of the national debt.

I propose to discuss briefly the principles involved in these several propositions, though not, perhaps, in the order in which I have stated them.

The large balances against us in our foreign trade, which we are obliged to supply by shipments of gold and the most valuable of our securities, has become a source of anxiety to the people and threatens to involve us in further financial embarrassments unless a remedy can speedily be applied. The balance of trade with foreign nations has for the last four years averaged $200,000,000 per annum against us. That is, we have imported $200,000,000 more than we have exported, and have supplied the balance by sending abroad Government bonds, railroad, mineral, and other valuable stocks, and gold. This practice is ruinous to us and must not be continued. If our people would content themselves with articles of our own production and manufacture, instead of importing so largely from abroad, these balances, now so ruinous, would soon be turned in our favor; but this they will not do to any considerable extent while the means of indulgence in imported luxuries are at hand. How, then, shall these balances be met? I can see but one safe method, and that is the increase of our exportable products and manufactures.

The restoration of the States recently in rebellion on a basis that will secure the rapid development of their immense resources and their assimilation to the great industrial interests of the other States in the Union, now so auspiciously progressing, will do very much toward this result. But more than this must be done. Capital, now lying dormant, must be called out from its depositories; national taxation, now paralyzing so many of the industrial interests of the country, must be reduced and placed chiefly upon luxuries; labor must be made to yield a reward corresponding to the cost of living. Our agricultural and mineral resources must be developed. The music of the spindle and the hum of busy industry must again be heard in all our manufactories. Our ship-yards, once the source of prosperity and wealth to the country, but now almost deserted, must be made again to resound with the ax and hammer. Our commerce, now so much depressed, must be revived. Open the avenues of labor; give the workingman enough to do; protect him from ruinous competition with the pauper labor of Europe; unlock the vaults in which much of our capital is hoarded; put the money in circulation; make the industries of the country active; develop our immense resources; send more of the products of the soil and manufactures abroad; make the ledger of foreign trade show a balance in our favor, so as to enable us to keep our gold and valuable stocks at home: these are the great demands of the times, and which challenge our most earnest attention. We can hardly expect to accomplish these desirable results while the industrial interests of the country are burdened with heavy taxation. The bill just passed relieves many of these interests and will be hailed with great joy in all parts of the country and impart a new impetus to business. But other interests need the same relief, and I trust will obtain it before the close of this session.

RELIEF FROM TAXATION.

During the war, and while the necessity existed, the people of this country bore the burdens of unprecedented taxation willingly and cheerfully, and met all the demands made upon them by the Government with wonderful promptness; but now, when the war has closed, they expect, and have a right to demand, that the expenses be reduced to something like a peace basis. We are now not only suffering from the general derangement of business growing out of a gigantic civil combat, but the States and municipalities are struggling to free themselves from debts contracted during the war, and while they are doing this, especially national taxation must be made to rest as lightly as possible. No burdens should be imposed except such as are absolutely necessary, and those should not apply to the necessities of life. How much tax should be raised? Just enough to meet such expenses as, in the exercise of the most rigid economy, are necessary to defray the expenses of the Government, including interest on the public debt, (with perhaps a small sum for its reduction,) bounties and pensions, and no more. Notwithstanding the large expenditures necessary for the payment of officers and men of the military and naval service at the time of their discharge, including bounties, pensions, &c., we have, since the close of the war, reduced our national debt more than two hundred and fifty million dollars, or at the rate of about one hundred and twenty million dollars per annum.

The large expenditures growing out of the discharge of the Army and the reorganization of the States lately in rebellion, have chiefly been met, so that hereafter by an economical administration of public affairs we can reduce our national taxes very largely and still continue a rate of reduction that would pay the whole debt in about twenty years. To attempt to pay the debt in that time, however, is, in my judgment, neither necessary nor wise. The debt has been incurred in the maintenance of a Government in which the interests of the future are as much involved as those of the present, and should bear a portion of the price of the nation's life. This generation has paid the cost of liberty and Union in blood, and the next, to which we bequeath this priceless inheritance, may well pay its share of the debt. The increase of wealth and population will rapidly reduce the proportionate burdens of the debt. The value of the property of the country nearly or quite doubles every ten years; so that, if the debt is now ten per cent. of our valuation, in 1878 it will be but five per cent.; in 1888 two and one-half per cent.; and when, in 1900, our valuation shall have reached $200,000,000,000, and our population eighty millions, the debt, if no part of the principal should be paid before, would be comparatively small, and its burdens would be so light on each individual as to be scarcely felt.

But to return to the question, how much is it necessary to raise by taxation? The Committee on Appropriations, after a careful examination of the subject, have reported that the following sums will be sufficient to meet the necessary expenses of the Government for the next fiscal year:

Army.....	$33,082,093
Navy.....	18,998,045
Executive, legislative, and judicial.....	17,119,478
Post Office Department.....	4,050,000
Consular and diplomatic.....	1,261,434
Indian Department.....	3,000,000
West Point Military Academy.....	303,000
Miscellaneous of all kinds.....	14,000,000

Total expenses of the Government.....$90,912,050

This is a sum somewhat larger than was required before the war, but not so much larger as the difference between gold and currency. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, the expenditures for the same purpose were about seventy millions, equivalent to gold, which, in the present currency, would be equal to $98,000,000.

The other expenses, chiefly made necessary by the war, are estimated as follows:

Interest on the public debt.....	$130,000,000
Pensions.....	30,330,000
Bounties.....	25,000,000
Total amount necessary.....	$285,242,050

From what sources shall this amount be raised? To answer this question I desire to present my views in regard to what interests should be relieved and on what taxation should remain. In my judgment, the time has come when the taxes can safely be removed from all the industrial business of the country except such luxuries as are not essential to the happiness or well-being of the people, and the consumption of which, like spirits and tobacco, might be largely reduced, in case the tax should have that effect, without any disadvantage to the country or any hazard to our highest interests.

During the war, when all the productions and manufactures of the country sold readily at large prices, these interests could bear the burdens of taxation; but now, when prices are so much lower and the cost of producing is but little less, the present rate of taxation operates in many instances to prohibition, so that we not only lose the business, but the revenue also, thus defeating the object of taxation. Many manufacturing establishments have been obliged to suspend, while others have continued at ruinous losses in the hope that some change for the better would take place.

SHIP-BUILDING AND COMMERCE.

Representing, as I do, a district largely interested in ship-building and navigation, I shall be pardoned for referring in this connection to the effect of our present system of taxation on this important interest. The State of Maine, before the war, constructed on an average more than fifty per cent. of all the sea-going vessels of the country, and, now that they have been obliged to suspend almost entirely this business, her people feel the depression severely.

In our eagerness to relieve other interests which have pressed their claims with more pertinacity we have not only turned a deaf ear to those who have presented the claims of the shipping interest, but much of our legislation has been directly antagonistic to it; and now, in order to give a finishing blow to an interest which has been at once the pride and strength of the country, it is seriously proposed to allow foreign vessels to be brought here and registered with the same privileges as those built in our own country. This would effectually crush out the ship-building business in our own country and place it in the hands of others, because we should be obliged to meet, in any attempt at competition, not only our own heavy taxation, but the cheap means of living and low price of labor in other countries. We cannot afford to adopt a policy that will take the gold we so much need at home to pay for vessels built by the people who contributed so largely to the destruction of our ships and our commerce.

A vessel costing seventy-five dollars per ton at our yards, ready for sea costs only forty-five dollars in gold, or about sixty-three dollars in our currency in Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, thus giving our provincial neighbors the advantage over us of from twelve to fifteen thousand dollars on a vessel of one thousand tons. This condition of things has brought our ship-building to a stand-still, benefiting nobody, but injurious to the whole country, and should not be allowed to continue. The remedy in part may be found in a drawback equal to the amount of duties on imported articles, and the removal of all taxes on all materials of domestic production and manufacture, entering into the construction of vessels. Our neighbors across the line will then have the advantage of their cheaper labor, but it is believed that our facilities for and thorough knowledge of the business will enable our ship-builders to compete successfully with all rivals.

The depression of the ship-building interest, with the influences of the war, has affected very seriously our commerce on the seas. A nation that builds ships generally sails them, and it is equally true that a nation that builds none sails none of any consequence. Freights are perhaps sufficiently high to pay fair profits on vessels costing what ours did before the war, and even what they would cost now if the taxes were removed, but they will not pay on the present high prices. This fact, combined with the havoc made in our navigation by confederate cruisers and privateers in the war, has almost annihilated our carrying business. While the subjects of Great Britain were destroying our vessels engaged in the carrying trade, that Government took care that for every one so destroyed she had another sailing under her own flag to take its place.

Our foreign carrying trade is now less than one third what it was in 1860, and the business under foreign flags has increased in proportion. Our domestic commerce or coasting trade, which was wisely secured to us in 1817, is nearly all that remains to us. The business of building and sailing vessels, which in Maine alone employed more than twenty thousand able-bodied men, and on which some one hundred thousand persons depended for support, has been nearly destroyed. This is no mere local question; it is one of great national importance, in which all the interests of the country are concerned, for it is an indispensable source of national wealth, as well as honor and power. The great West wants cheap freights for their immense products, and this can best be secured by reducing the cost of the vessels in which these products are to be carried. She also wants the market which a large number of consumers engaged in this business would create. Our mineral and manufacturing interests want a market for the iron, copper, coal, cordage, duck, &c., which a revival of this business would create. Our forests contain large quantities of timber waiting to become a source of large income whenever this interest shall again be revived. The district I have the honor to represent paid annually, prior to the war, $300,000 to persons in Maryland, Virginia, North and South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida for timber used in our ship-yards, and will do so again whenever this business shall be relieved from its unnatural burdens.

Another reason for encouraging a large merchant marine should not be overlooked. I refer to its importance in the creation of a Navy in time of war. A land force may be raised from the common pursuits of life, organized and drilled so as to be made effective in a few months. Not so with the Navy. We must have men who have been trained in the management of vessels. At the beginning of the recent war our merchant marine furnished experienced men for the creation of a large Navy in a brief period of time, and contributed in no small degree to the salvation of the country. Where should we have obtained the seamen if we had not had the merchant ships in which they had been schooled? In a few years, when those who have had experience in the recent war have become unfit for service, we shall be entirely at the mercy of any hostile maritime Power, in case of a sudden war, unless we resort to the expensive method of supporting a large number of men in the naval service in time of peace. I submit that it is much cheaper and wiser to encourage and foster a large merchant marine, from which, besides being a source of wealth to the country, we can obtain experienced seamen in an emergency such as that we have just passed through. The national convention recently held in Boston declared that—"The mercantile marine commerce of the United States ever has been so intimately allied to and blended with the naval power of our country that it may be regarded as the indispensable auxiliary of the Navy, as the naval history of our country will abundantly show. By our energetic and daring privateers, and by the men in the naval service drawn from our merchantmen this country contested the assumed supremacy of England on the ocean, and wrested the scepter from her in the war of 1812. By a similar intimate union and cooperation between the Navy and our merchantmen, our coast was blockaded for more than two thousand miles during the rebellion.

"We believe it is not too much to assume that the splendid achievement of the Kearsarge, the brilliant victories of Farragut at New Orleans and Mobile, of Rogers at Savannah, of Porter at Fort Fisher, and others equally worthy of mention, could not have been accomplished without the hardy sons of the ocean taken from our merchant ships, and previously educated in the merchant service. The tens of thousands of seamen drawn from the New England States to recruit the Navy are in proof of the truth of this position.

"As an economical measure to the Government, can it be doubted that the mercantile marine, with the men and workshops sustained by private capital, are a cheaper resource to the Navy to meet an emergency than mammoth establishments and immense naval fleets, adequate to the possible and sudden exigencies of the Government, kept up at great cost to the Treasury? As the people do not believe in large standing armies in time of peace, neither do they wish to be taxed to keep up large naval establishments in time of peace, with little or no commerce to protect. The high position of the United States as a naval Power, in comparison with England and France, has been acquired by the cooperation and aid of maritime commerce; it can only be sustained in the future by a similar intimate relation and alliance."

The men who build and sail vessels are generally patriotic, and are willing to sacrifice largely for the public good, and would not complain of the burdens I have referred to if they could see a corresponding advantage to the Government; but no such advantage is derived. The tax of which we complain approximates to prohibition, and defeats the end it was intended to accomplish, besides being destructive to one of the most important interests of the country. It is true that some vessels have been built and some tax has been collected from this source. But it is also true that much of this tax has been derived from the completion of vessels which the owners had begun before the taxes were imposed, or for which they had a portion of the material on hand, and were compelled to use it to prevent greater loss.

Our Navy has achieved too many glorious victories in the past to allow us now to hazard its efficiency in any other contest that may lie before us, by refusing to encourage this preparatory school which has heretofore contributed so largely to our naval success. This subject is one that appeals to the patriotism of every American citizen.

The tonnage tax of thirty cents per ton, imposed by the present law, is exceedingly onerous, and serves still further to cripple our commerce. At the beginning of the present session the Committee of Ways and Means was on my motion instructed to inquire whether this tax should not be abolished. The attention of the committee has also been called to the subject by others; and I cannot doubt but in due time we shall have a report from that committee removing entirely this burdensome tax. Viewed as a means of revenue alone, I am confident that by removing the burdens from these branches of business the Government would be more than compensated in the increase of business it would produce in all the various interests dependent on their prosperity.

In view of the national importance of this subject I cannot for a moment permit myself to doubt that this Congress will grant a drawback on all imported articles entering into the construction of vessels and remove all other taxes that embarrass their building and sailing, and that we shall readily find the means of all needed revenue in other sources.

But, to return to the question, from what sources shall our revenue be raised? It is estimated that we shall receive from duties on imports $170,000,000 in gold. The country require and the people expect, and have a right to demand, a large revenue from spirits and tobacco. But here we are met by the humiliating fact that, despite all the efforts we have made, not one gallon in five pays any tax. The liquor interest, never promotive of good morals, has during the last three years perpetrated frauds to an extent without a parallel in the history of the country.

Prior to the war, when there was no tax on the manufacture of spirits and no occasion to conceal the amount produced, we manufactured, as shown by the census returns, about ninety million gallons of distilled spirits; now we are collecting tax on less than fifteen millions. We see no evidence of any material decrease in its use except, perhaps, in the form of burning fluid. There is no reason to suppose the manufacture is now very much less than in 1860. There is certainly no reason why we should not collect a tax on sixty-five million gallons. It is a national disgrace that while the other interests of the country are so heavily taxed, we allow ourselves to be cheated out of the amount justly due from this, by the connivance of corrupt officials with the distilleries.

It is demoralizing to the whole business and every man engaged in it. The honest distiller who pays two dollars per gallon on the amount of his production cannot compete in the market with the dishonest man who pays nothing to the Government.

The result is that those who would not succumb to the temptation have been driven out of the business. A practice which at once puts any branch of business entirely in the hands of worthless men cannot too soon be abolished. It is a source of just complaint to the tax-payers and a burning shame to the country that should not be tolerated, and that finds its remedy only in the removal of the dishonest revenue officers who now disgrace the Government and eat up its substance, and the appointment of men who are honest and whose integrity cannot be purchased with gold. The pay of these agents is sufficient to secure the services of men who are above suspicion, and with whom the distillers will not dare to attempt to tamper. It is a source of congratulation that there is now a prospect of a speedy change that will rectify this great wrong and relieve the country from such deep disgrace. It is urged by some, as a remedy for these frauds, that the tax should be reduced to one dollar or fifty cents, and some say twenty-five cents, per gallon, on the ground that the reduction of the tax would reduce correspondingly the temptation to fraud and that the distillers would then allow the tax to be collected. If this was an original question the argument might be a strong one, but its force is very much reduced when applied to the present state of the question. I am unwilling to confess, without another trial, that through the agency of better men the laws of the country cannot be enforced. The truth is, these men have learned the tricks of the trade.

They have already sunk into whatever demoralization the tax of two dollars may have produced, and will hardly be elevated into a much purer atmosphere by the reduction of the tax. If a man has once disgraced himself and forfeited the confidence of the community by cheating the Government out of $100,000, he cannot, without a miracle of special grace, which an act of Congress would not be likely to produce, be expected to refrain from taking fifty or twenty-five thousand in the same way when the opportunity presents itself. I trust no reduction will be made in the tax, but that, after the experience we have had, we shall be able so to adjust the law that, with reliable men, who must be placed in charge of these interests, the revenue which the country expects from this source will be realized.

The frauds in the manufacture of fermented liquors and tobacco have been about equal to those in the manufacture of distilled spirits, and can only be prevented by the same instrumentalities.

From the facts I have presented, and other data at hand, it is evident that an honest and efficient enforcement of the law would, at the lowest calculation, secure to the Government, at the present rates of taxation, the following sums:

From distilled spirits.....	$130,000,000
From fermented liquors.....	15,000,000
From tobacco and its manufactures.....	50,000,000
	$195,000,000
Add from customs.....	170,000,000
	$365,000,000
Deduct interest on public debt.....	130,000,000
Leaves a balance of.....	$235,000,000
Deduct the sum estimated by the Committee on Appropriations to defray the expenses of the Government, including pensions and bounties.....	276,242,050
And we have a balance of.....	$58,757,950 which is amply sufficient to meet all contingencies and leave a very considerable sum to be applied to the reduction of the debt—certainly as much as we ought to attempt to pay now. It will be observed that this calculation leaves out every species of taxation except duties on imports and the tax on spirits and tobacco. All other national taxation can be removed from the people whenever we can secure reasonable efficiency in the collection of the taxes from those sources.

It is understood that the Committee of Ways and Means, seeing and appreciating the difficulty that surrounds us, and the uncertainty of being able to secure, in the present state of things, the removal of the officials through whose corruption the manufacturers of spirits and tobacco are robbing the Government of its just dues, have decided to recommend the continuation of the stamp duties, license or special tax, and tax on sales, &c. This may be necessary for the present, but it is earnestly to be hoped, for the honor of the nation as well as the interest of those who pay these taxes, that the occasion will not continue beyond the meeting of the next session of this Congress.

TAXATION OF GOVERNMENT SECURITIES.

In some portions of the country the exemption of Government bonds from taxation is a source of very great complaint. In some places, men on whom the cities and towns in which they reside have depended for a considerable portion of their taxes have invested largely in these bonds, thus reducing, in some instances, their taxes and transferring the sum of which they are relieved to those less able to bear the burdens.

To the principle that all productive property should bear its share in the burdens of taxation, except under extraordinary circumstances, I most heartily subscribe. As, however, Congress has been severely censured for its legislation on this subject, I desire to say a word in vindication of its action. It is proper to state, in this connection, that the complaint to which I have referred has in part been created by the impression that these securities are held by the large capitalists. This is but partially true. There is no class of securities held so largely by persons of small means as our Government bonds. The savings of the masses were invested in them, and freely offered to the nation, not simply as a good investment, but as a proof of their affection. They have been the favorite investment of the working people. They are desirable for this class, because they are convertible at any moment into money. A large amount of these securities are held by the trustees of orphans and widows, and by the savings banks which have invested the sum made up of the scanty earnings of the poor.

Another fact worthy of note: but a small portion of the means invested in Government securities had before paid taxes, or would have done, if it had not been so invested. The instances in which the valuation of persons has been reduced because of investment in Government securities are not numerous. It is supposed by many that the shares in national banks, amounting to more than three hundred million dollars, and all now taxable where the shares are owned, and which is, in effect, a tax on the bonds which the owners of shares have deposited with the Government, will pay as much tax as would have been derived from all the money invested in these bonds providing it had remained as it was before being so invested.

The principle has been well settled by the judicial authority of this country that Government securities are not taxable by local authority. The provision for the exemption in the several acts under which bonds were issued during the war had no effect except as a notice to all interested that they were not to be taxed. Had no such provision been made the exemption would have followed in accordance with the decision of the courts and the uniform practice of the Government. The right of a Government to hold its own securities exempt from taxation is essential to its very existence, for without this right, or in the absence of its exercise, the local authorities, if they should choose so to do, might tax the Government securities to such an extent as to render them utterly worthless and effectually exclude them from such communities, thus limiting the power of the Government to borrow money to those municipalities only which might happen to be friendly to its policy and would be willing from the promptings of patriotism to waive their right to taxation or be content with a tax so low as not to interfere with the ready disposal of the Government securities. This would place the Government, in times of great demand for money, as in the case of our recent war, entirely at the mercy of its enemies. If the Government should pay six per cent. interest and the local authorities should tax the securities four per cent., as they might do if Congress should exercise no control in the matter, capitalists would be very likely to invest in other property. It may be said that no community would so discriminate between different kinds of securities. Suppose the local authorities had been given unlimited power to tax Government bonds issued during the war, what would have been the result? Does any one doubt that the men who opposed the war would have combined wherever they could control and prevent the bonds being valuable by any system of local taxation at their command? I need only call attention to facts still too fresh and mortifying in our minds.

Many men believed, or pretended to believe, that the war for the suppression of the rebellion as prosecuted under Mr. Lincoln's administration was unnecessary, unconstitutional, tyrannical, exceedingly wicked, and no better than a system of wholesale murder. It is not strange that such men justified themselves in throwing obstacles in the way of the Government and resorting to whatever means they found at their command to thwart its purposes and paralyze its efforts.

Does any one doubt that had the privilege of unlimited taxation been allowed these men would have succeeded in excluding the bonds from all places under their control, thus limiting the power of the Government to borrow money to support its struggle with the rebellion to those places in which a majority could be found for the support of the war, thus seriously hazarding, if not effectually preventing, success in the great struggle?

Another reason for not authorizing the taxation of the bonds issued during the war should not be overlooked. The acts under which the most of those bonds were issued were passed when the military situation was not encouraging; when every neighborhood was mourning the loss of some cherished one fallen in the bloody strife, and when the Government was obliged to make frequent calls for "three hundred thousand more" to take the places of the slain; when many of our best men feared that we should fail in our effort to crush the rebellion; when those who opposed the war were telling us defiantly that we could never do it; when leading men were declaring that the bonds were no better than so much white paper, and warning the people against investing in them; when we were being told that we should never pay the debt, and repudiation was boldly talked of as a measure sure to follow the close of the war.

These were perilous times for the country, times when the strongest hearts were made sad and when all faltered save those who felt the justice of our cause, and could see by the eye of faith beyond the seas of blood that encompassed them a glorious future of peace and prosperity.

To prosecute the war the soldiers must be fed, clothed, and paid. Money must be had. Without it the war must cease, and the demands of the rebels become the law of the land. Under these trying circumstances Congress felt that the terms of the securities to be issued must be such as would present some inducement for those who had money to take them, and they were declared exempt from taxation. As to the necessity or the wisdom of the measure the country must judge. It should be remembered that this was no departure from the uniform practice of the Government from its earliest history; and if the exemption was so wicked as some profess to believe, it is but the continuation of the policy of the founders of the Government acted upon by every Administration to the present time.

As Congress has been so severely censured for its exemption of Government securities that were issued during the war from taxation, and as I voted for all the bills authorizing their issue that were passed after I took my seat as member of Congress, I have deemed it my duty to say this much in vindication of my action in this regard.

As to the bonds already issued, I take it for granted that the number who favor any violation of the pledge made to the holders of these securities when the money was paid for them is so small as to render a discussion of that subject unnecessary. The tax-payers of the country do not require the Government to repudiate its agreement. Our promises must be sacredly kept.

But now that the peculiar circumstances under which the present bonds were issued have passed, and when we are about to fund the debt for a long period of time by the issue of new bonds, the question of taxation becomes important, and may very properly claim careful consideration. I do not know that the power of the Government to provide for the taxation of Government securities has been denied. It is believed that the Government would be safe in allowing taxation to a certain extent, say one per cent. or even two per cent. but a specified per cent. should be named, beyond which the authority should cease. The question, then, that will demand our attention in providing for a new issue of bonds will be: can the interest and rights of all concerned be better subserved by providing for taxation or by continuing the policy of exemption heretofore pursued?

It is not unreasonable in the outset to assume that if taxation be allowed we must pay larger interest than we should if the securities were not subject to taxation. If a man proposes to lend money his first object is to see that the payment of the principal is secure, and next, how he shall realize the greatest net income. He inquires not only for the rate of interest, but whether there are to be deductions in the form of taxes or other dues. In other words, he will consider bonds at five per cent. exempt from taxation as desirable as bonds at six per cent. interest with the right of the Government or the local authorities to tax one per cent. unless he intends to cheat the officers of the law out of the tax.

If this view is correct, it follows that the debt would be funded as readily at four per cent. exempt from taxation as at five per cent. interest subject to a tax of one per cent., and that, so far as the Government is concerned, taxation would be but taking from one pocket in interest what we place in the other in taxes. When applied to the local authorities, however, the case is somewhat different. It is right that in the absence of any absolute public necessity to the country that such securities should be taxed in the places where they are owned and from which the money that purchased them has been taken, and where it would have remained subject to taxation in some form if the securities had not been purchased. It is a right which, by the general principles of taxation, belongs to the cities or towns in which personal property is owned, to receive the benefit of its taxation; and it is a right that should not be taken away unless some important public interest requires it. When our debt was small this subject was one of comparatively little consequence, but now, when property to the amount of billions is to be invested in these securities, it becomes a question of very great interest to those who pay the taxes. I therefore trust that in any bill for the funding of the debt that may be passed we shall provide for a limited percentage of taxation by the local authorities, or that the tax shall be collected by the Government when the coupons are paid and distributed in some equitable manner to the municipalities in which the securities shall be held.

SHALL THE FIVE-TWENTY BONDS BE PAID IN GOLD OR CURRENCY?

The question as to whether we will pay the principal of our five-twenty bonds in coin or currency has very unwisely, it appears to me, been thrust upon us at a very inopportune time. It is getting up a controversy on a question that if let alone would settle itself in a few years. We have neither the coin nor the currency with which to pay. And yet we are working ourselves into a high state of excitement about how we shall do what we have no prospect of doing while the cause of division exists. If our legislation shall be wise we will resume specie payment as soon as we shall be able to pay enough of the debt to make this subject of any great importance, and thus settle a question that never had any occasion for existence. It seems to me that it is much better to unite all our efforts to find the shortest and most practicable way to a sound specie basis, and then it will make no difference whether we pay coin or currency.

Since, however, this question has been forced upon us, and has entered so largely into the discussions on this floor and in the country, it must be met and settled. I propose to speak in what I have to say on this subject, not in the interests of the bondholders—for they will do well enough whether they get gold or currency—but in what I deem the highest interest of the country—the maintenance inviolable of its credit.

Even admitting all that is claimed by the advocates of the currency theory, as to our legal right to pay these bonds in currency, I do not believe that, for the little we should gain on the small amount we might possibly pay while the currency is depreciated, we can afford to suffer the shock to our national credit which such a declaration would produce. We are to be borrowers of money for many years to come, and we cannot afford to do an act that will give to our financial policy the least suspicion of repudiation. We must maintain our credit at all hazards. We are soon to make an effort to fund the public debt at a lower rate of interest. It is a subject of vast consequence to the tax-payers of the country, much more than the difference between the price of gold and currency on the few millions that may be paid while our finances are being brought to a gold basis. Our ability to fund the debt at a low rate of interest will depend not only on our ability to pay, but on what capitalists believe to be our disposition to meet, without evasion, every obligation; and this disposition will be judged by our action in regard to the bonds already issued.

There seems to have been an attempt to create an impression that by paying the debt in greenbacks the Government would save about forty per cent. on the entire debt. This would not be true, even if we had—which we have not—the greenbacks to pay; the greenbacks are promises to pay, and must, sometime, if they are good for anything, be paid in gold or its equivalent, the same as the bonds. If we are to pay in our present currency where is it to come from? How shall the Government get it? What are the processes by which we are to come into possession of the means? I know of but two methods: first, tax the people beyond the necessary expenses of the Government, and take from them what you propose to pay the bondholders for the redemption of your securities; or second, set your greenback machinery at work, make the money with which to purchase the bonds, flood the country with an irredeemable currency, thus reducing, proportionately, the purchasing capacity of every dollar the poor man has to pay for the necessities of life. Neither of these methods is believed to be practicable or desirable. I do not know that any one who favors the payment of the debt in coin or its equivalent proposes to pay while our currency is depreciated. It is simply proposed to husband our resources with a view to return at the earliest possible moment to specie payment, when we may just as easily pay gold as currency, and the bondholder would be just as willing to take greenbacks as gold, thus settling this and all other troublesome questions that grow out of the depreciated currency and saving at the same time the credit of the nation inviolate.

Whatever may be the strict legal construction of the several acts under which the five-twenties have been issued—and I do not propose to discuss that subject now—it is undeniable that those who purchased the bonds had good reason to expect that when the principal should be paid it would be in gold or its equivalent. When the acts referred to were passed it was generally expected that before they would be paid our currency would be equal to coin. The Government allowed its agents, through whom a large portion of the loan was made, to advertise to the world that the principal of the bonds would be paid in gold. Two Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury, Messrs. Harrington and Field, declared at different times, in answer to inquiries on the subject, that these bonds would be paid in coin. I submit, that in view of the facts I have stated and the importance of our national credit it would be exceedingly unwise to declare in favor of paying our bonds in depreciated currency, but that by a wise financial policy tending toward a gold basis we declare to all the world that the time is not distant when we will be able to meet all the demands against the Government in gold or paper money, as our creditors may desire. This is the best method of settling a question the agitation of which has, in my judgment, only served to weaken the confidence of this country and Europe in our securities.

I have not time for the discussion of other topics of financial policy, as I intended. I will, however, say a word further in regard to a subject to which I have already referred.

FUNDING THE NATIONAL DEBT.

While I am in favor of paying every dollar of the principal and interest of the bonds now outstanding in exact accordance with our agreement, and am opposed to the violation of any contract, either expressed or implied, I am, at the same time, opposed to paying the present high rate of interest a single day beyond the time when the bonds are payable and the money can be had at a cheaper rate.

Six per cent. interest in gold is now equivalent to more than eight per cent. in currency. Add to this the advantage of exemption from taxation, which is about two per cent., and the interest we are now paying amounts to about ten per cent. This is too much for a nation of such vast resources as ours—a nation whose credit might and should be beyond suspicion—to pay. It would, of course, be for the interest of the holders of the bonds to continue the present rate of interest; but the Government is under no obligations to pay such interest beyond what, by the terms of the law, it agreed to do. The Government has the right to pay the five-twenties at the end of five years from their date. A part of them are already payable, and all will be within five years. As the debt becomes payable we ought to be able to fund it at a rate of interest two per cent., at least, better for the Government than we are now paying.

This will save for the country in interest some thirty-five millions annually. To be able to do this, however, our finances must be placed on a firmer basis and our credit established beyond distrust. The talk about repudiation, the possibility of some time being compelled to assume the debt contracted on the other side of the rebellion, and to pay the value of slave property which was destroyed by emancipation, has impaired, to some extent, our credit. The adoption of the constitutional amendment guarantying the payment of our debt, and preventing the assumption of that contracted in the interest of the rebellion will speedily set these questions at rest. We have then only to unfetter the industry of the country, readjust our currency so that it shall be equal to gold, which will not, we hope, be long delayed. When this is done our securities will be equal to any in the world, will be eagerly sought after by capitalists everywhere, and can be sold at a rate of interest that will reduce the interest on the public debt about one third and relieve the people of taxation to that extent.

SUFFRAGE AND RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Speaker, referring myself to several measures now pending in this House, or lately passed, and to various speeches which have been made here, I submit some observations on three principal heads: suffrage in general, negro suffrage, and the reconstruction laws. And if the discussion seems more elementary than is usual in this Chamber I beg gentlemen to remember that all safe conclusions are derived from elementary discussions. First principles are our best guides to complex truths.

The first relation which the new-born boy sustains is that of the family, and out of this relation result many rights and duties, among which, however, is nothing in the nature of suffrage. He has no voice in the choice even of his name, by which he is to be known through life, nor in the conduct of the affairs of the family. When he becomes a pupil in school or an apprentice in a workshop or an office clerk he is subject to the will of others who have been placed over him, not by his election, but by the disposing providence of his parents or guardians. Nor in the higher relation which the human being sustains to his Creator has he any choice or election. He is brought into the world and taken out of it according to a will superior to his own; and through all his life—

"There's a divinity that shapes our ends, Rough-hew them how we will."

But when men, emancipated from the disabilities of infancy, and free to act within the sphere of human agency that has been allotted to them, come together to form a commonwealth they settle for themselves the principles upon which they will be governed; they agree what rulers they will have and how they shall be chosen. And in doing this they are guided by no natural laws, but by an intelligent regard to the conveniences and expediences of their situation. If they find a government already established their consent to it is implied from their remaining under it, claiming its protection, and enjoying its benefits. So that every member of the State has either assisted at laying the foundations or consented to them as laid, and in both cases suffrage and whatever other political rights he has acquired have come, not from nature, but from the social compact.

The governing power may be divinely appointed, as in the Jewish theocracy; or it may be founded in conquest, as has happened in every age of the world; or it may be hereditary in families whom revolution has placed upon the throne, as in the existing monarchies of Europe; or it may be conferred by the consent of the governed, as in the instance of our own country. All governmental functions have their root in power or compact. Naturally A has no more right to rule over B than B has to rule A, but if one is stronger than the other power decides the right; or if, for mutual advantage, they agree how to rule and be ruled, compact becomes the foundation of their State. In neither case has suffrage or any other incident that is peculiar to the government any foundation in nature.

The Declaration of American Independence is often misapplied to this subject. Thirteen English colonies were in the act of throwing off and abjuring the only civil Government under which they had ever lived. That Government set aside, they were remitted to a state of nature; and in a state of nature, antecedently to the formation of civil government, the Declaration, copying Locke, declares—

"That all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

But it goes on immediately to declare that "to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

Thus that immortal instrument brings into sharp contrast the freedom and equality of a state of nature, and the restricted freedom of a state of government. It does not predicate absolute freedom and equality of a state of government, but of a state of nature before civil government has intervened or been set up. To secure these natural rights governments are formed, and government creates distinctions and inequalities, for some must rule and others obey, else you have no government at all. If I am too weak to defend and secure my natural rights standing alone, I will associate with others in like condition and give up some of my natural rights for the sake of forming with them a commonwealth that shall secure to us all the great rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. For the sake of these great interests I will assent to a condition of inequality and subjection which nature never ordained. Such is the manner in which civil government supervenes upon natural rights, and the misconstruction which is so frequently made of the Declaration of Independence consists in applying to a state of government that which it predicates of a state of nature. The Declaration of Independence never became an article of the Constitution nor an institute of the Government. The colonies, I repeat, were passing from one government to another, and in the transition they called to mind their natural rights, that the government about to be formed might secure those that are specified. But, while these rights are distinctly asserted as proper objects of governmental protection, neither the absolute freedom nor equality of individuals in a state of civil government is affirmed.

And let it be observed, sir, that suffrage is not among the natural rights which the Declaration enumerates. Nor was it mentioned in Magna Charta. That famous passage beginning nulius liber homo, which has been called bad Latin but good law, contains the germinal principles of our Bills of Rights, but does not allude to the elective franchise. The "Petition of Right" and the "Bill of Rights" in the reign of Charles I were equally silent on this head. Liberty never had more passionate devotees than our Saxon ancestors, among whom those principles of common law grew up which were reasserted in Magna Charta and the Petition of Right. But suffrage was not claimed. They were content that rulers should be elected by the sword, by hereditary succession, by revolution, or by accident; but, whoever ruled, religion and speech should be free, trial by jury and habeas corpus should be inviolate, the people should be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects from unreasonable searches and seizures; warrants should issue only on sworn probable cause, and no one should be held to answer for crime unless on presentment of a grand jury, or be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.

These were the great principles of civil liberty that were insisted on and obtained and maintained without popular elections once mentioned or thought of. Yet there are men in our day so ignorant as to teach that suffrage is essential to the negroes of the South to secure the civil rights we have conferred upon them. As if life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness could not be secured without the ballot! Not only does all the history of English freedom disprove it, but the presence of women, minors, and foreigners in our midst in the full enjoyment of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness without the ballot demonstrates the folly of such a pretense.

It is not intended to deny that suffrage may be a safeguard to these civil rights; it is only not indispensable to them. When, in the organization of a State, suffrage is made universal or limited or qualified, it is controlled by high considerations of convenience and general welfare, not by natural rights or necessity. Who shall be voters and who shall not be is a question of expediency rather than of principle, and is to be decided by a due regard to the greatest good of the greatest number. The framers of our Declaration of Independence so considered it; for, while they asserted the natural rights of the man and the principles of good government, they left it to the States which they called into being to regulate suffrage. The pith and substance of the Declaration of Independence are contained in these grand words:

"We, therefore, the Representatives of the United States in general Congress assembled, appealing to the Supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude of our intentions, do, in the name and by the authority of the good people of these Colonies, solemnly publish and declare that these united Colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States; and that as free and independent States they have full power to levy war, conclude peace, contract alliances, establish commerce, and to do all other acts and things which independent States may of right do."

What a sublime fiat was that by which free and independent States were evoked from colonial dependence and bondage. If ever the voice of the people was the voice of God it was when it thundered these words into the ears of the nations: independent States, with full power to do all things which independent States may of right do. How large the charter here claimed! And how triumphantly it was borne aloft through the fires of the Revolution! And how absolute the acknowledgment that was wrung from the monarchs of earth that these poor dependent Colonies had, indeed, burst into States. Sir, do gentlemen consider what a State is? In law, it is treated as a corporation; but it is more than that, for corporations, both municipal and private, are merely creatures of the legislative will, whereas States make Legislatures instead of being made by them. No sharp definition of the incorporeal essence which we call a State is, perhaps, possible; but, without going into metaphysical distinctions, it may be said that a State is formed by an aggregation of individuals into one Commonwealth sufficiently numerous and possessing a territory sufficiently extensive to secure their independence and to enforce their will as supreme law. And when the supreme power is exercised by the people of such a State or by representatives of their own choosing the government is republican in form.

Such were the States which the colonists formed in 1776. They were thirteen living examples not only of States, but of republican States; and whoever would learn what our Constitution means when it speaks of guaranteeing republican forms of government has only to study the constitution of those States.

Two years after the Declaration of Independence these States, in the exercise of the inherent powers which they claimed to themselves, entered into Articles of Confederation in which they called themselves the "United States of America," a name which the subsequent Constitution retained.

The second article of Confederation reads as follows:

"Each State retains its sovereignty, freedom, and independence, and every power, jurisdiction, and right which is not by this confederation expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled."

"ART. V. For the more convenient management of the general interest of the United States delegates shall be annually appointed in such manner as the Legislature of each State shall direct," &c.

Now, sir, take notice that while each State possessed necessarily, in virtue of its statehood, the absolute right of regulating suffrage within its own borders, it did not delegate this right to the Federal Government; but, on the contrary, the Federal Government agreed that its own rulers should be chosen by such electors as the States should qualify. Very important it is that this fundamental principle of our civil polity should be kept in view, for it is one of the mischievous devices of our times to scout State rights as a "pestiferous heresy," whereas it is really the rock on which our political fabric is built, and other foundation can no man lay than that is laid.

Usurpers do not like to hear of State rights, because they know that the doctrine of State rights, when rightly expounded and limited, is the highest safeguard of popular liberty, and the spirit of usurpation is always opposed to popular freedom. It would consolidate all governmental powers into a grand central oligarchy, the actual management of which would fall into the hands of the most adroit and unscrupulous politicians, who would make the people mere hewers of wood and drawers of water.

When the Constitution superseded the Articles of Confederation it provided, in article one, section two, that—

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature."

This is a very remarkable provision. It not only does not arrogate the regulation of suffrage to the Federal Government, and not only leaves it to the unrestricted will of the States, but it refers the members of the popular House of Congress to such electors as each State shall designate for electors of its own popular branch of the Legislature. And yet, as argued by Mr. Madison, in No. 52 of the Federalist, it was an arrangement that—

"Was safe to the United States, because, being fixed by the State constitutions, it is not alterable by the State governments; and it cannot be feared that the people of the States will alter this part of their constitutions in such a manner as to abridge the rights secured to them by the Federal Constitution."

The qualifications of electors being thus referred to the States and placed beyond control of the Federal Government, the fourth section of article one provides that the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations except as to the places of choosing Senators.

The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] argued that this clause gave Congress plenary powers over suffrage in the States. Not so. The two clauses, the second and the fourth, are consistent with each other, are pari materia, as the lawyers say, and ought to be read together, though I could not persuade the gentleman to read them together. Taken together they amount to this: that the qualifications of the electors shall be prescribed by the States, and also the times, places, and manner of holding elections, but Congress may alter these regulations. Time, place, and manner, the mere scaffolding of suffrage, may be regulated by Congress, while the essential matter, the qualification of the elector, is committed wholly to the States. In the Virginia convention of 1788 Mr. Madison and others explained that the reason of giving Congress a right to regulate the time, place, and manner of suffrage was to secure uniformity throughout the country, but the fears of State action which prevailed at that day have not been realized, and this provision giving Congress an ultimate control over the accidents of suffrage has been found a useless though a harmless provision. The honorable gentleman [Mr. KELLEY] made a parade of the debates in the Virginia convention and in the First Congress upon this unimportant clause of the Constitution, and applied the obiter dicta which fell from gentlemen on this subject to the other and very different subject we are discussing—the qualifications of electors. His citations were irrelevant to the point in issue, and calculated only to mislead our judgments.

The States thus left free in all our history to regulate suffrage have conferred it according to their sovereign will and pleasure. In some States property qualifications are required, in others only a poll-tax; in some vagabonds and paupers are permitted to vote; in others they are not; in some negroes have the ballot, and in others it is denied to them. And in the same State it has at one period been extended to them; at another taken away. Thus have the States used and controlled suffrage without abusing it. Until a very recent period their exclusive jurisdiction over the subject has never been questioned—they have been permitted to do as they would with that which was their own. But in the times upon which we are fallen, which are called times of progress in political science, all old truths are questioned, the landmarks of our liberties are ruthlessly dug up, and the passions of party are set up as the only standard of truth and duty.

It must be apparent to the dullest comprehension, from this brief review of our political history, that, except in the District of Columbia, the Federal Government has no suffrage to bestow upon anybody, white or black. No power over the subject was ever delegated, and, by necessary consequence as well as by express provision, all power over the subject was "reserved to the States respectively or to the people." (Art. 10 of the Amendments.)

It is sometimes argued that the second section of article four—"the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States"—gives the Federal Government power to confer a citizenship which the States are bound to respect in the matter of suffrage. But if this were so every foreigner whom the Federal Government naturalized would instantly become entitled to vote in any State without regard to its regulations about residence, tax-paying, &c. That this provision is entitled to no such application is apparent from the masterly summary of the civil and commercial rights secured by it which Judge Washington made in the case of Corfield vs. Coryell, (4 Washington Circuit Court Reports, 371,) and in which he included "the elective franchise as regulated and established by the laws and constitution of the State in which it is to be exercised." The elective franchise, then, which this clause of the Federal Constitution secures to the citizen is that which the States regulate and establish. Many other authorities might be cited to the same effect, but the text of the Constitution, the uniform usage of the Government, the civil and political history of the country, and all concurrent judicial authorities ought to be sufficient to silence cavils and to settle the proposition that suffrage is one of the reserved rights of the States and that the Federal Government has no power to confer or take it away.

Yet, sir, the reconstruction acts of Congress assume control over this State right, and undertake to disfranchise many citizens and to confer suffrage upon ignorant negroes just emancipated from the slavery in which they were born. This brings me to the two remaining heads of my discourse, which must be treated together, for negro suffrage and reconstruction are too intimately associated to be contemplated separately. They are twin heresies, and as they were sent into the world together, no doubt to curse us for our sins, together they will go out of the world after their mission of vengeance is ended, and be mentioned and remembered only as war, pestilence, famine, and other dire afflictions are remembered.

The first of these extraordinary acts of legislation that are indexed under the title of reconstruction was passed over the executive veto on the 2d March, 1867. It divided the ten southern States into five military districts, provided a military commander and army for each, gave to the commander authority to arrest, try, and punish offenders and disturbers of the public peace, "and all interference under color of State authority with the exercise of military authority under this act shall be null and void," which was the provision that struck down all the constitutional tribunals and subjected the civil to the military power in a time of peace. The act then went on to provide for forming a constitution for each State; it was to be framed by delegates elected by the male inhabitants over twenty-one years of age of "whatever race, color, or previous condition," except such as were disfranchised for participation in the rebellion; the constitution to be formed was to provide that the elective franchise shall be enjoyed by the above classes, and when the constitution so formed should be approved by Congress, and the State Legislature elected under it shall have approved of the amendment to the Federal Constitution known as article fourteen, Senators and Representatives were to be admitted into Congress, provided that no person excluded from the privilege of holding office by said proposed amendment shall be eligible as a member of the convention or entitled to vote for members thereof. The final section of the act declared all civil governments in those States provisional only, "and in all respects subject to the paramount authority of the United States at any time to abolish, modify, control, or supersede the same."

Just twenty-one days after this unexampled act of usurpation was passed a supplementary law of nine sections was found necessary to complete the subjugation of the Saxon to the African. It provided for a registration of voters, which, however, should "include only those persons who are qualified to vote for delegates by the aforesaid act," and who should take an oath which many of the best men in the South could not take. Then these registered voters were to elect a convention to form a constitution, which was to be "ratified by a majority of the votes of the registered electors," and then submitted to Congress, who were to pass upon it, subject to various conditions, all of which looked to the stifling of the voice of white men.

The pretense put forward in the preamble of the original act for establishing this military despotism in ten free and independent States was that no legal governments existed therein, or adequate protection for life or liberty, upon which I make two observations:

First, if this were true, Congress found it out, not in the ordinary channels of information, but by some illegitimate and untrustworthy medium of communication. The ordinary modes in which Congress obtains local information is by petition of the people or executive communications from the President. But the people never told Congress there were no legal governments in those States, and how the President deprecated this legislation is shown by his emphatic veto.

The second remark upon the preamble is that it mistakes the fact. The fact is that legal State governments did exist in every one of these States, and had existed in some of them from the date of the Declaration of Independence, in others from the time of their admission into the Union; State governments republican in form and fact; State governments that Congress had often recognized and acknowledged; State governments that are indestructible by any power less than the voice of the people, because that was the power that called them into being.

Such were the avowed purposes of this legislation; but its tendency was not to establish legal governments and to protect persons and property, but to overthrow legal State governments, and to excite animosity and conflict between the whites and the blacks, the power to rule being carefully confided to the blacks. Nothing could be wilder apart, not even the poles, than the avowed purposes and the necessary tendencies of this legislation. The sign it wore on its frontlets was a mask to hide its destructive tendencies from the popular eye.

But, bad as it was, it was found not to be bad enough for the occasion. At the first session of the present Congress more legislation was necessary to interpret the prior acts, and at the present session still more to complete the subjugation of free States to a military despotism in the interest of the negro. And lest the Supreme Court should decide all this legislation unconstitutional we have passed a bill that requires two thirds of the judges to curb these acts, while a bare majority of that tribunal is competent to pass upon the lives, the liberties, and the property of the citizen.

It would seem as if this House could find nothing in the country, not even the absolute rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, so precious in their eyes as these darling acts of reconstruction—nothing else so worthy to be elevated beyond the reach of the judiciary. The Senate hesitates to second this blow at the Supreme Court, but if they finally do, and the bill becomes a law, I hope the court will prove faithful enough to its high trust to declare this disabling enactment, and the reconstruction acts it is designed to shield, flagrant violations of the Constitution. Such a decree would infuse a new life into the body-politic.

Now, all this legislation is the building up of negro States by means of Federal bayonets. To regulate suffrage in the States by peaceful means would have been a subversion of our political system, but to force it upon a servile race by the sword, and to disfranchise those who inherit it in common with ourselves, is to levy war against the United States, and gentlemen can read the name of that crime in the Constitution.

When gentlemen have been pressed to point out the provision of the Federal Constitution which justified this monstrous legislation they have as a last resort taken refuge in section four, of article four:

"The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and, on application of the Legislature or the Executive, against domestic violence."

This is a pledge of guarantee and protection. The reconstruction acts redeem this pledge with a vengeance. Let us look for a moment at the scope of this constitutional provision.

Thirteen States, uniting under a Federal Constitution, promise, the whole to each, to guaranty a republican form of government to each. The government of each was republican at that time, and it is a fair interpretation of the covenant therefore that it was a guarantee of the existing governments.

This would not prevent the States from abolishing the slavery which many of them tolerated, because the republicanism promised entitled them to regulate their domestic institutions according to their pleasure, retaining always the form of a republican government. And it was a solemn pledge of the Federal power to support the people of the States in their right of self-government. Taken in connection with the always admitted State right of suffrage, it was a pledge that this should never be violated, but should be secured to the States in perpetuity. Guarantee is an accessory or secondary contract. The States stood pledged to the people, the Federal Government guaranteed the redemption of the State pledge. If A contracts to build a house or paint a picture for B, that is an original undertaking and not a contract of guarantee; but if I contract with B that A shall do as he promised, there is a guarantee. This contract of guarantee presupposes an existing contract between parties, and superadds itself to what they have already established. The framers of the Constitution had an exquisite sense of the force of language, and when they bound the Federal Government to guaranty and protect the people of the States in such republican governments as they then enjoyed, the existence of the States and their obligations to the people were recognized. And if any State failed to perform its obligations the guarantor might be called on to perform for it. If invasion or insurrection were likely to overrun popular rights the Federal Government was bound to protect the people against these.

Now, who would have dreamed, in the wildest reveries to which human brain was ever subject, that such a provision, so reasonable, so fair, so considerate of State rights, would become the excuse for marching an army into ten States in time of peace, superseding Governors, judges, sheriffs, and all civil officers, and setting up military power to regulate the internal economy of the States, and especially suffrage? Yet we have seen just such a military despotism established by these reconstruction laws; and that not on the ground that they are conquered provinces subject to the will of the conqueror, but that they are States entitled to demand, or rather to have without demand or desire, performance of the guarantee clause of the Constitution. Unlike all other guarantors, we hasten to offer performance before breach of the covenant by the original parties! Upon this clause the reconstructionists plant themselves, for they refuse to follow their leader outside of the Constitution into those devious paths of international law which it is supposed entitle us to wreak our utter vengeance upon our prostrate foe. And I venture to affirm that this beneficent clause of the Constitution, as it never has been heretofore, will never again be invoked to justify so inhuman a policy. Why, sir, what sort of republicanism do the reconstruction enactments guaranty to the southern States? Military invasion, constitutions written with the point of bayonets, habeas corpus suspended, civil tribunals abolished, white men disfranchised, and suffrage forced upon a stupid, ignorant race of negroes who scarcely know how to wield it under the dictation of military masters. Call you this guarantying a republican government? If some foreign enemy had undertaken to do in those States the precise things we have done this clause of the Constitution would have obliged us to protect the people against the enormous wrong, yet we pretend to find in it our justification for inflicting the wrong with our own mailed arm. It had been better to rest our acts upon the imperial maxim "sic volo, sic jubeo." It would have been more candid to have confessed ourselves outside of the Constitution, working our will upon our victims according to no rule but our passions, instead of attempting to torture the benignant provisions of the Constitution into the support of an anti-republican tyranny.

The pretense is insincere. It was not to guaranty republican governments to those States that this scheme of reconstruction was devised. The reader of our current history will stultify himself who so understands it. It was rather to overrun and destroy the republican governments which existed there—to strip white men of their hereditary suffrage and to confer it upon negroes. Negro suffrage and negro supremacy over white men are what reconstruction means, and so the world does read and will read our record.

Now, sir, I have shown sufficiently that the Federal Government has no power to qualify electors in the States. It would be rank usurpation to dictate to the States what white men should vote; it is an intolerable wrong to set up negro suffrage.

If negroes ever acquire the right to vote in the States they must obtain it from the States themselves. The Federal Government cannot confer it, for it has no suffrage to bestow outside of the District of Columbia and the Territories. When any State shall, in the exercise of its unconstrained will, admit the black race to the right of suffrage, I shall respect and acknowledge it. Much as my individual tastes might incline me to vote against negro suffrage in my own State, and fatal as I believe it would be to the peace and comfort of the negroes themselves, yet whenever Pennsylvania, in the free and fair exercise of her sovereign will, shall admit them to a suffrage, either general or restricted, I will reluctantly, but honestly, say amen.

With no undue prejudice against this race, entertaining always the kind and sympathetic feeling for them which a state of inferiority and dependence begets, I have always treated them with tenderness, and have contributed in various forms to their welfare; but, well knowing that they were never a party to the social compact on which our political institutions are founded, and believing that neither their comfort nor our own would be promoted by admitting them into political partnership, I am, and always have been, against negro suffrage. I do not place my objections on ethnological distinctions of races, nor on the denial which is sometimes made, but which I am always pained to hear, that they are human beings, having a common God and Father of us all and a common destiny with ourselves; but I place it on those high considerations of expediency which always prevailed with the founders of our Government. It is not best for the common interests of both races that the inferior should share political privileges with the superior. The men who planned a government in the cabin of the Mayflower were white men—the men who made the Declaration of Independence, the Articles of Confederation, and the Constitution of the United States were white men. The naturalization laws expressly declared that all foreigners who should be admitted into political partnership with us should be white men.

Thus, sir, this has been from the root upward a white man's Government, and it has enjoyed the Divine benediction as such. The negro race had nothing to do with planning or building it up. They have been so well cared for that they have increased and multiplied beyond all example, and if left to be protected by white men, as women are, they are in no more danger of suffering persecution than the gentler sex. Brought here in slavery, the ancestors of these people did not enter as voluntary partners into our political system, and their progeny have never become parties to the compact. This is abundantly shown by the judicial authorities I referred to a few days since, especially the opinion of Chief Justice Gibson, in Hobbs vs. Fogg; Chief Justice Taney, in Dred Scott's case; and of Mr. Justice Agnew, in Miles vs. The Railroad Company. Highly inexpedient, in my humble judgment, as it would be to thrust this race into a compact of white men, if it is to be done it must be by State action and not by superserviceable meddling on the part of the Federal Government. Better let us encourage them to emigrate to Liberia, as the Colonization Society, whose petition has lately been laid before us, urges us to do, and, upheld by the strong arms of English and American benevolence, they may possibly found a state in their fatherland that shall gradually dissipate the thick darkness that has settled for centuries upon Central Africa.

But the learned gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] thinks universal suffrage is the panacea for all the hurts and ills of the body-politic. This he conceives is the grand, culminating point of modern civilization and political science. It is amazing that while he is so enamored of universal suffrage he should persist in disfranchising his fellow-citizens in the southern States. The benevolence that fires at such long range as to overlook the poor and oppressed kindred at your own door and is spent on Africans, who neither need nor deserve it, is not very remarkable for sharpness of sight nor worthy of commendation. Universal suffrage, when it can express the free will of a white yeomanry and is developed by the natural growth of communities in virtue, intelligence, and patriotism, will have all the testimonies of my heart of hearts; but your universal suffrage which comes with a sword in one hand and bills of confiscation and of pains and penalties in the other, which strikes down the hereditary suffrage of intelligent men and confers it on ignorant negroes whom insatiate lust of power expects to use as its supple instruments, talk not of that as progress in political science, as an "inalienable right which ranks with life and liberty." Does not the honorable gentleman know that the petty republics in which a suffrage absolutely universal was practiced have long perished from off the earth? Does he not know that the great struggles of humanity have been for civil rights, not for suffrage? Is he yet to learn that suffrage is more general in despotic France than in free America? And has he not discovered that a form of free government may remain long after the vital principle has been killed out? Sir, when I contemplate all that is being done in this country in the name of universal suffrage, loyalty, and such good words, I feel like exclaiming, with Madame Roland, "O Liberty! what wrongs are perpetrated in thy name."

But, sir, I must hasten to close with a summary of the thoughts suggested:

1. Suffrage is a conventional and not a natural right.

2. It is bestowed by the parties to the social compact according to their views of their best interests.

3. In our political system it is a reserved and an exclusive right of the States with which the Federal Government has no right to interfere.

4. The reconstruction acts violate this fundamental law.

5. Negro suffrage, if ever established, must be done by the States; but the highest good of both races forbids it, and dictates rather that the African should be colonized on his native shores.

Mr. Speaker, without exhausting the subject my time is exhausted. I beg leave only to add that thirty years ago I had occasion to discuss negro suffrage in the Pennsylvania constitutional convention, and having now before me a speech I then made, I propose to conclude my present remarks with the following extracts from that speech. I have only to say that the experience and observation of nearly a third of a century have tended to confirm the conclusions then expressed:

"Who ought to be voters in Pennsylvania? Or, in other words, who ought to have the political control of our Government. This is a question of the first impression and of great magnitude. When you have established your Government and distributed its powers among the several departments of Government, legislative, executive, and judicial, it remains to decide who shall control and direct that Government. The machine may be well supplied with all the necessary wheels and springs; but in preparing and fitting them no question can arise of so great moment as who shall have the regulation of its motion and direction when it is finished and ready for use. This question has now to be answered with reference to two distinct and separate classes of men, the whites and the blacks; and from all thereoflection I have been able to give the subject I am prepared to say the political powers of this Government ought to be exercised exclusively by the whites. In coming to this conclusion, sir, I have endeavored as far as possible to divest my mind of all the popular prejudices against the African race whom we have among us. They deserve my sympathies, and they have them; but I feel unwilling to surrender this Government, in whole or in part, into their keeping; and I am therefore prepared to vote for this amendment, and to say in our constitution that the voters of Pennsylvania shall be white freemen.

"The reasons for this vote must be stated; but I cannot explain them clearly without noticing a few prominent and undoubted facts which attended the introduction of negroes into Pennsylvania and the other American Colonies, and which now mark their condition here. The first fact, then, to which I invite the attention of the Convention is that the negroes of Africa were brought into these Colonies by the English. Whatever the sin was of seizing the defenseless African, of tearing him from his home and country, and carrying him into hopeless bondage in a distant land, lies at the door of England. And whatever of evil has resulted or is to result to the colored people or the whites of this country from the institution of domestic slavery and the presence among us of large masses of degraded and wretched blacks is also fairly chargeable to the inhuman policy of Great Britain. From the middle of the sixteenth century up to 1807 England carried on an extensive slave trade from the coast of Africa; and while the American Colonies belonged to her she made it a State object to introduce so many of them here as would render the Colonies more productive and beneficial to her. Avarice and an ambition for commercial supremacy were the motives which impelled England to the vigorous prosecution of the slave trade. And she made it as far as she could her own trade. She incorporated African companies and gave to these and her merchants a monopoly of the business. If the Colonies desired a participation in this nefarious traffic they were excluded by the monopolizing inhumanity of the mother country, and did not, to any considerable extent, engage in it.

"The next fact to which I refer is that from a very early day in the history of the Colonies they resisted in every way they could, by petitions and remonstrances and laws, the continuance of the slave trade and the increasing of the black population by importation. I find that in 1688 the 'Friends,' who have always been foremost in Pennsylvania to consider and agitate the subject. The German Friends settled at Germantown presented a protest at their yearly meeting—this year held at Burlington—drawn by Daniel F. Pastorius, against the 'buying, selling, and holding men in slavery, as inconsistent with the Christian religion.' That meeting did not feel prepared to act, and declared it not proper then to give a positive judgment in the case. In 1696 the yearly meeting discouraged the further importation of slaves and adopted measures for their moral improvement. In the same year George Keith and his friends denounced the institution of slavery 'as contrary to the religion of Christ, the rights of man, and sound reason and policy.' About the same period several of the other Colonies began to move in the same direction. Massachusetts, in 1645, made a law prohibiting the buying and selling of slaves, except those taken in lawful war or reduced to servitude for their crimes by a judicial sentence; and in 1703 Massachusetts imposed a heavy duty on every negro imported, for the payment of which both the master and vessel were answerable."

"In 1728 Pennsylvania passed a law imposing a duty on the importation of negroes and allowing a drawback on their reexportation. Virginia, too, was early and earnest in her opposition to the introduction of negroes. By petitions to the crown and Colonial Legislature she discouraged to the utmost this inhuman traffic, which had long been a settled and a favorite policy of England; and the first Legislature which met under the first constitution of Virginia abolished the traffic.

"These measures were constantly opposed by the mother country. To the petitions of the Colonists she turned a deaf ear; to their legislation she opposed her negative, and overruled and defeated every effort which was made in the Colonies for preventing the introduction of the negro population. And this policy, so disgraceful to England and so injurious to the Colonies, so perseveringly adhered to by her, and so abundant in bitter fruits to us, was one of the causes which finally impelled the Colonies to throw off their allegiance to Great Britain."

"So soon as the Colonies became free States they abolished the slave trade—Virginia in 1778, Pennsylvania in 1780, Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Rhode Island in 1787 or 1788. The Revolution was not yet fought, their independence was not yet established, when the Old Dominion and the future Keystone of the Federal arch extinguished forever within their borders the nefarious traffic in human flesh. Now, sir, let it be remembered that England, who forced slavery upon us, and whose authors, orators, and travelers denounced us on account of it, did not herself abolish the slave trade until 1807."

"Federal America interdicted the slave trade from her ports thirteen years before Great Britain. She made it punishable as a crime seven years before, and she fixed four years sooner the period of non-importation."

"During the time the British nation was engaged in the slave trade, from the early part of the sixteenth century to the year 1807, a period of nearly two hundred and fifty years, it is estimated that she must have torn from their homes in Africa six or seven million human beings, and carried them away into hopeless slavery. If the English, instead of superadding to their guilt by attempts to dissolve our Union and to sacrifice our liberties, were to enlighten, civilize, and Christianize the remaining millions on the continent of Africa, they would scarcely atone for the deep and unutterable injuries inflicted on that race by their prosecution of the slave trade.

"The history of slavery in the American colonies establishes the fact beyond all controversy that negroes were brought here and planted by the power of England against the will as well of the negroes themselves as of the colonists. They were forced upon us. They came not as the primitive colonists came, searching for liberty; but, torn from their native soil by English rapacity, they were brought here slaves. The colonists sought these peaceful shores as a refuge from tyranny, and as a home where they might worship God according to the dictates of their consciences, and enjoy all the blessings of civil and religious freedom. And when in further pursuit of these objects they proceeded to establish governments, there was in their voluntary presence here an implied consent to the forms of government which were adopted. They were freemen, capable to consent to a particular form of government, and they did consent. It is the great excellence and beauty of our system that it is founded on the consent of the governed, so that allegiance and fidelity result as necessary consequences, and need not to be enforced by oaths and positive enactments.

"But, sir, the negroes never assented, and their presence here, since it was procured by fraud and force, could not be construed into an adoption of the country or an acquiescence in its terms of government. They were brought here to be slaves and not freemen; and they were slaves and not freemen when the principles of government were agreed on, and when its foundations were laid. They had neither lot nor part in the matter. I inquire not whether they ought to have had. Sufficient for my present purpose is the fact that they had not. No, sir; this Government, the control of which it is now proposed to divide with the colored race, was founded and reared by white freemen; it was a white Government and not a parti-colored. In its institution they had no voice; in its early struggles no share. It was founded by white men and freemen, and they bequeathed it to us. Shall we preserve it as we inherited it, or share it with a race with whom we cannot have any social equality? It seems to be supposed that since the first establishment of free government in this country the condition of the negro, at least in Pennsylvania, has been so changed as to qualify him for the proposed participation. A great change has, indeed, been wrought in his condition by our humane legislation, but nothing which elevates him to political brotherhood with us.

"The act of 1780, which abolished slavery in Pennsylvania, has already been referred to. That act was a proud monument to the humane policy of the State, and presents a contrast with the course of England on the subject of slavery which no Pennsylvanian need blush to look on. It wiped out the stain of slavery which England had left on our soil, and conferred on the negro what he had not before enjoyed, civil freedom. It secured to him those civil rights to which he, in common with all other human beings, of whatever clime or complexion, had an inalienable title, and of which he never ought to have been deprived. But did it do more? Did it confer political equality? Did it say to the negro, 'You have indeed been thrust upon our soil by your oppressor and ours against your consent and in defiance of our opposition; but we bestow on you now a full measure of our political privileges, which we have purchased at so great a cost of blood and treasure?' No; such was not the construction of that law. It pledged the security of the Government for his life, liberty, his reputation, and property; but it went no further. It has never been understood to confer any political privileges; it opened no door for him into the political family. The Legislature of Pennsylvania and the public at large have never so understood it.

"The naturalization laws illustrate and fortify this position. A free white alien comes to Pennsylvania and establishes a residence. No law compels him to become naturalized.

"We receive him into the community on a footing of exact equality with ourselves, so far as relates to his natural and civil rights. We extend to him not only the charities of life, but the same protecting laws which secure our interests; and he may live his whole lifetime in this condition, and be all the while as destitute of our political privileges as if he had never set foot on our soil. Into that condition, sir, and no more, did the act of 1780 bring the negro. Before the alien can add our political privileges to his other rights he must become naturalized; but no provision has been made for admitting colored men, whether native or alien born, to political equality. And I infer, from the absence of all such provisions, that it was never dreamed of in the early days of our Government, that these people were to be made voters. Some act like that of naturalization would be necessary to testify the allegiance of even native negroes; for when we look into the history of the race we can find nothing in the fact of their presence among us which is a pledge for their fidelity to the Government.

"But no means have been provided for their testifying their allegiance, even though they come here voluntarily from abroad and take up a residence like other foreigners; and is not this indicative of the universal understanding of our people that they do not and ought not to possess our political privileges? The act of 1780 was not a naturalization law. It could not be; for it was the act of a single State and would have interfered with the uniformity which was to prevail under the legislation of Congress in reference to naturalization, and would have been unconstitutional. It attempted no impossibilities; and it accomplished whatever it attempted, the relief of the Pennsylvania negro from slavery and all its disabilities, and here it stopped. The negroes have themselves understood it in the same manner as the whites. In common with the whites, they have appealed to the laws for the redress of their injuries and the protection of their rights; but they never have as a body exercised or claimed the right of exercising the political privilege of voting. I do not say that now and then on occasions of great popular excitement a single vote, or perhaps a few votes, may have been offered at the polls by negroes, and occasionally perhaps these votes have been received; but my general position is not affected by these instances, that the negroes as a body have never claimed the rights and privileges which have lately been discovered to have belonged to them since 1780.

"No, sir; they have lived in the peaceful enjoyment of their civil rights, exempted from the payment of such taxes as are assessed on the person, and from the performance of those duties which attend the right of suffrage; and they might have continued to enjoy the blessings of freedom without prejudice, excitement, or reproach, if a new party had not started into existence who arrogate to themselves a peculiar sympathy for this injured race, and who testify their affection by sowing discord and jealousies where peace and confidence prevailed before. Would they not have been content so to live? Do they now ask for any change in their past condition? But an excitement has been produced in the country which threatens to overthrow all the Governments hitherto the protection of the blacks as well as the whites; an excitement which is rending society to its foundation, and which threatens to melt in its lurid flames the bonds of our national Union; and, under the influence of this pernicious excitement, men demand for the blacks what the blacks never demanded themselves—a share, a partnership with us in the administration of this Government of ours.

"If this point could be gained, if the negro race could be elevated to political equality with the white voters of Pennsylvania, this excitement would acquire a new impulse, and the war of the Abolitionists against our southern brethren would be waged with redoubled ferocity. I cannot assent to it. Let us rescue our institutions from meditated debasement by declaring what has always been understood, that voters must be white men. Let us rebuke the excitement which has been kindled by the bad passions of the North by a vote which will show that we mean not to disturb the foundation of our political fabric, but that we do mean to preserve them where our revolutionary ancestors planted them."

"For the manifold evils which connect themselves with the black population of this country, slavery, abolitionism, questions of suffrage and all, there is a remedy—a peaceful and a constitutional remedy. My friend from Alleghany [Mr. Forward] has discussed it. It is colonization. The negroes belong to Africa; they were cruelly torn from that country, and if now they could be returned to their fatherland with the arts of civilization and the lights of education and religion, their bondage might prove a blessing to the benighted millions who inhabit that continent.

"Colonization is the antidote both for slavery and that wild fanaticism which is far-spreading now, and destined one day to rock this Union—it is the best expedient both for the blacks and the whites. Sir, by giving the blacks the right of suffrage, an everlasting obstacle is thrown in the way of colonization—it will chain them to us, and expose them to every species of indignity and outrage on the election grounds. Broils and bloodshed will be the inevitable consequence of their attempts to vote, particularly in large and dense communities like this. But if you deny them the right to vote, you not only save them from this danger, but you keep before them an abiding lesson, that this is not their fit resting-place, and that on the luxuriant soil and in the genial climate of the country of their ancestors, they could enjoy a full measure of the privileges which are denied them here. The amendment becomes another argument for colonization, and as such is worthy of all support.

"Sir, I believe the negro race to be capable of self-government, and if habits of industry be cultivated among them in the colonies of western Africa, and if care be taken to educate them, they may in our day present the delightful spectacle of a great, free, and prosperous people. Undoubtedly they deserve civil and religious freedom, and with proper culture are capable of enjoying it. Thither, then, would I turn the eyes and hopes of these people. Thither, then, let them go with our political principles, and establish governments after our model, which may protect them, and exert salutary effects on their fellow Africans, now ignorant of all the blessings of civilization. And, sir, verily do I believe that the much-wronged people of the South would add to the tide of emigration by gradually abolishing slavery, and sending their blacks to Africa, so that we might hope that our country would see the day when slavery on her soil would be extinct—her whole population white people, and this same Government still enduring the glory of the world and the fountain of infinite happiness."

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HAMLIN, one of its clerks, announced that that body had passed a bill (H. R. No. 658) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1869, and for other purposes, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

Mr. NIBLACK. Mr. Speaker, when the Freedmen's Bureau bill was under consideration, I endeavored to obtain the floor to state some of my objections to its passage, but was unable to do so in consequence of the very limited time allowed for discussion on that measure. I do not propose to-day, in view of the fact that the bill has already passed this House and is now pending in the Senate, to attempt anything like a discussion of the merits of the measure or to submit in detail the many objections I have to the enactment of that bill and of all prior bills on this subject which have been passed during the last as well as the present Congress.

So long as the doctrines of the Dred Scott decision, as they are frequently termed, prevailed in this country—which were in substance that the negro was an inferior race, not a part of the governing power of the country, not a party to the social compact which organized in the first place the governments of the States and afterward the Government of the United States—there was to my mind some reason, some apology for attempting to govern the colored people of the country by different laws from those by which the white people were governed. We were justified under that theory in treating them as an alien element among us, as the people of another country, another nation.

Upon that theory we might with some degree of consistency enact this Freedmen's Bureau bill and continue in force the law on that subject. But, sir, I submit in all seriousness that since the passage of the civil rights bill, which is now a part of the law of the land and enforced, I believe, by all the Departments of the Government—at all events never yet declared to be unconstitutional by the courts of the country, at least the courts of last resort—I submit that to attempt now, in view of this condition of things, to govern the negro race in this country by separate laws and by an independent bureau is absurd in theory as it is pernicious in practice. If they are, in point of fact, as the other side claim they are, a part of the governing power of this country, really citizens of the United States, entitled to enjoy the right of elective franchise, then, sir, I think the commonest consistency requires no greater means shall be taken for their protection than for the protection of any other class of citizens. Therefore this proposition, that by a sort of military authority they shall be governed and special care taken of them, is a gross violation of those very principles of equality which gentlemen asked for when they passed the civil rights bill, and which runs through all the other legislation of Congress peculiarly affecting the southern States.

But, sir, my principal object was to have a letter read from a gentleman formerly from my State, and who for many years was a distinguished officer of the Federal Army, whose loyalty, integrity, and intelligence no one doubts who is acquainted with him. He presents some of the objections to this measure more forcibly and graphically than I can, for he is now a resident of one of these southern States, and, of course, has better opportunities to know the practical workings of the Freedmen's Bureau, and I will have this letter read, especially since the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] stated that opposition to this bureau came from none other than disloyal sources. It is a private letter and was not intended for publication, and I do not propose to disclose his name at present. I ask the Clerk to read all but the name and the last two lines.

VICKSBURG, December 26, 1867.

DEAR SIR: I see by the papers here that Major General Gillem has been sent by General Ord, commanding this department, to the capital to represent the suffering condition of the freedmen and to ask aid from the Government in their behalf. The order says their condition has been brought on by the bankruptcy of the planters, and wants them to be fed, and especially those who are armed, to prevent a war of races. It seems to me that any legislation or action having this object in view would be unwise and entail unnecessary additional burdens, in the way of taxes, upon the people of the country. Nothing, in my opinion, has done so much to render the freedmen worthless and indifferent as to working for their support as this fostering care of the Government. They are about convinced that they will be taken care of at all hazards, and do not care a fig whether they try to support themselves or not. They are much more responsible, next to the Freedmen's Bureau, for the present condition of things than any one else. In the beginning of the season just closed inducements were held out to the planters and to the merchants by the military to employ the freedmen and furnish them lands, provisions, clothing, and all means necessary to cultivate the crops. In most cases contracts were made to work on the shares, the freedmen to have one half the crop, the cost of his supplies and clothing to be deducted therefrom. It is a notorious fact that they did not half work, and at the close of the season there were but few instances in which the entire crop would pay for the supplies alone, much less the use of the land, stock, and implements. The freedmen, not being able to see how they must labor all the year and come out in debt, run to the bureau with their complaints of fraud, &c., and an order is too readily and willingly issued upon this ex parte testimony all in the interest of the freedmen and against the planter and the merchant. The entire course, so far, looks as though it was intended to teach the freedmen to repudiate their contracts and to let those who have supported them whistle for their pay.

General Ord has even gone so far as to issue an order making the crop of this year liable for the claims of those who worked on the same place last year, thus, in some instances, entirely setting aside the claim of the merchant who fed and clothed the freedmen who made this year's crop. The planters are not only bankrupt, as General Ord says in his order sending General Gillem to Washington, but the merchants are great sufferers. The course of proceeding I have mentioned may be a temporary advantage to the freedman, but, if I am not very much mistaken, it will prove a hardship to him in the end, and unless the Government does take charge of them as so many paupers there will be actual suffering among them in the future. If they are to be given all the benefits and bear none of the burdens; if this officious and rather indifferently administered bureau is to be here to step in and act as commission merchant (as the one here does) and appropriate the proceeds as it suits their tastes, regardless of the interests of any one, I cannot see who will be silly enough to furnish lands and stock and clothing and food for the freedmen to operate upon in the future, unless, indeed, it be some men in Congress who know little of the true situation and care less.

The only real concern the freedmen hereabouts have manifested was not many days since, when General Gillem issued an order requiring them to go to work, if only for their board, or be treated as vagrants. Now that they have learned he is on a mission to Washington they have quieted their fears, and, like the ever hopeful Micawber, are "waiting for something to turn up." As long as the Government keeps turning it up for them they will not, as a rule, be anything but a burden. I do hope that no legislation, as contemplated in General Gillem's mission, will be worked through. It would certainly be unjust to the tax-payer and injurious to the freedmen. There is no excuse for suffering in this productive country for the want of food except pure indolence or miserable management. This, I think, is a fair representation of affairs here in a brief way.

HON. WILLIAM E. NIBLACK, M. C.

Mr. NIBLACK. Mr. Speaker, I do not attempt to enlarge upon what I have already said or the suggestions contained in that letter. Similar testimony comes to us from other sources all over the South.

I have no question myself, and never have doubted so long as the fostering care of this Government is continued as it now is by the Freedmen's Bureau, the colored people of the southern States will continue to be, as they have all the time been since their emancipation, a burden upon the Government; while, in the meantime they will acquire none of the habits of industry and of reliance which will make them a self-sustaining people. Sooner or later they must be thrown upon their resources, and I know no reason, if they are ever to take care of themselves, why they should not begin now. To attempt to perpetuate this Freedmen's Bureau is to perpetuate the anomalous condition of things which the people of this country will not always patiently submit to. But, sir, I will not occupy the attention of the House longer to-day, and now thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] for his courtesy in yielding to me.

ADMISSION OF ALABAMA.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word for Alabama. I took occasion, not long ago, to say something before the House about reconstruction, and to put upon record certain written evidence of the condition of politics in that State. I have felt much interest in her affairs. I have been particularly attracted in that direction, because among her loyal and struggling thousands, who are endeavoring to take her from the thralldom of slavery and rebellion, are many earnest, honest, and reliable men who are sons of Maine. Circumstances have thrown me of late into a considerable correspondence and sympathy with them. For one, sir, I am earnest for her admission now under the bill which is at this time before us. There are, to my mind, pressing reasons for such a measure.

In my opinion, sir, it would exceedingly encourage and gratify the people of the whole country to see Alabama in her place among the States. The country would feel greatly rejoiced to see some progress in the work of reconstruction. It would be a step forward. It would show the world that we are advancing in the execution of our plan. The great masses will patiently wait for us if we only show signs that the work is actually going on. It has now been about three years since actual hostilities ceased, and but one of all the seceding States has been brought back again; and who does not recollect and appreciate the thrill of joy that ran over this nation when Tennessee was readmitted! It was an augury of the future. It stopped the mouth of our enemies, who denied our desire and purpose to bring back the rebellious States as soon as it could be done, and maintain the dignity and safety of the nation. It did much toward conferring power upon the party having the responsibility for the government of the land. And how well has Tennessee maintained herself! But for that act of restoration she might to-day have been controlled by the withering influence of rebellion; instead of which she is now represented upon this floor by a MAYNARD and a MULLINS, a TRIMBLE and STOKES, and other eloquent and loyal sons. The prompt and liberal action of Congress toward Tennessee gave her a wonderful impulse in her determination to be loyal and free. May we not to-day make Alabama as proud and patriotic a State? The people are looking for our efforts to bring all the discordant portions of our country into a harmonious whole; let us give them this experiment—let others follow.

The rejection of Alabama would terribly discourage the loyal white and black people of that State. They have exhausted themselves in means and money, and almost in mind and body, in the election which has just taken place. They have shown wonderful heroism in accomplishing as much as they have accomplished against such terrible odds. The blacks have acted the part of martyrs. They have in many instances footed it for distances of even twenty to forty miles, swam swift currents, been without rest or food for well nigh several days at a time, and breasted all sorts of danger to reach a chance to vote. They have sought or received no office or nomination; they have claimed no pay. Many of them knew they would for such act be driven from their hearths and homes, and be subject to personal injury, not excepting even death. Words can hardly describe their sufferings, nor would many men believe their story of woe so awfully true. All this has been endured by the black people of Alabama for the sake of giving aid to a country which has promised them the boon that they shall be free. What noble heroism! Nothing but a reliance upon God, for which that humble race are so remarkably, would ever enable them to afford us such splendid example. They cannot repeat such efforts without encouragement from us. They will be discouraged and dispirited if after all such efforts they can see and feel no practical results. Their enemies will have more potent weapons with which to oppose them, and trample their rights in the dust. If disappointed now, the black population will hesitate and falter by and by, till their cause in that State may be lost. Nor will they alone suffer from our inaction. The loyal whites of that State will have to pause in the work of reconstruction. Their representatives here, who have come to Washington to maintain their cause, say they would hardly be safe to return. If admitted, Alabama can maintain herself; if rejected, the cause of loyalty and freedom, for a season at least, in that State must die.

But, Mr. Speaker, there can be no reasonable doubt that Alabama has complied with the requirement that a majority of the registered votes shall be cast, if such compliance should be necessary. There was an essential performance of the condition, if condition it is. While the nominal failure in the number of votes is not great, the real failure is none. Between seventy and eighty thousand votes were thrown for the constitution, and about one thousand against. Adding to this the number of votes shown to have been cast, and not known to General Grant when he reported to the House what information he had, and a very few thousands more would in any view have been enough. But the evidence is quite conclusive and satisfactory, that on account of the peculiar condition of that country the number who have died or left the State since the date of their registry would even exceed the number wanted to bring out such a result. Again, the evidence is as clear as sunlight that thousands upon thousands of electors who offered to vote were deprived of the privilege on account of various and almost endless errors in names. The hostile registrars of election were very strict constructionists about names, when slavery had hardly allowed name enough to a black man to be known by.

But, Mr. Speaker, if the terms of admission have not been literally complied with, it was on account of the fraudulent, violent, and wicked conduct of the red-hot rebels of Alabama, who were as bent upon keeping that State out of the Union as they were in taking her out in the beginning of rebellion.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from Maine what evidence he has that the state of things existed in Alabama to which he has referred? I should also like to know whether he does or not claim that Alabama is a State in the Union? I understood him to say that the rebels of that State were as anxious and persistent to keep the State out of the Union—to prevent her coming back—as they were to take her out originally. If the State is out of the Union, as he seemed to intimate, at what time did it go out and what power took it out?

Mr. PETERS. As to the evidence, in the first place it is one of great notoriety. It has been wafted on the newspaper press to every part of the country. It has come to us in the private letters and other communications every member of this House has received. It is in evidence before the Reconstruction Committee in detail, and it will be laid before the House before this question is closed. I have had the pleasure of referring to that evidence in general. I am fully convinced; I have no doubt the House is fully convinced; I have no doubt the nation is convinced of the truth of the facts I have stated.

As to the other question of the gentleman, it seems to me it has been put and answered a great many times on this floor. I remember that the gentleman asked the question once of the gentleman now in the chair, [Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio,] by whom it was fully answered. I can only state that in my opinion the rebellion took these States out of the Union, at least so far as to leave them States without any political rights in the Union at the present time, excepting such rights as may be allowed them by Congress.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman then allow me to ask him this question? If the rebellion took the confederate States out of the Union then does the gentleman consider that the rebellion was successful? I understand that the rebellion, when it was inaugurated, was intended to take those States out of the Union. I had supposed that the armies of the loyal North had been successful and had overthrown the rebellion and prevented its success, thereby preserving those States to the Union.

Mr. PETERS. Yes, the rebellion succeeded to the extent of taking those States out of any political rights in the Union. We have conquered them; we have seized them; they are in our possession, and they can be allowed to come back again when they have attained a fit political condition for that purpose, a condition to which, I contend, Alabama has now attained, and which no other of these rebel States has yet reached.

The proofs upon this point are incontestable. Shall the men who have committed the frauds against the adoption of this constitution have the benefit of such fraudulent action? Shall we hesitate to pass this bill because it will not suit rebels, who have not even voted upon the issue, but who have, by force and threat and guile, restrained thousands of others from voting? But the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BOYER] upon this floor has asked how could any frauds have been committed except by Republicans, because they only had the appointing power. Let me ask, sir, why was General Pope removed by Andrew Johnson from this military district? Why was General Swayne ordered away? Was it not to give more opportunities to the supporters of rebellion to stifle the voice of the loyal people? Was it not an emphatic expression of the President of the United States against the constitution offered to the electors of that State? Was it not an act of rebellion in itself? Mr. Speaker, I will read a letter just received from a gentleman in Alabama, every word of which, I have no doubt, is literal truth. The picture here drawn will show gentlemen and the country whether frauds were committed, and who committed them. Bear in mind that while it is reckoned that at least thirty thousand white men voted for the convention no more than from three to five thousand of the same color dared to vote upon the constitution which that convention had adopted:

GREENVILLE, ALABAMA, March 2, 1868.

DEAR SIR: I had refrained from writing you in regard to the election, thinking that the facts would be so fully stated by the Alabamians now in Washington, and the case would be such a clear one for congressional action, that there would be no justification for my troubling you. But the delay that has already occurred, and the adverse reports of newspaper correspondents, awaken a fear that for some, to me, unaccountable reason Congress is not decided upon the matter. I wish only that all who are in doubt whether the free choice of the legal voters of Alabama would have ratified the constitution could have been, in cogno, witnesses of the scenes at the polling place for this (Butler) county. They would have seen the registrar deprived of all competent assistance by the force of social and business proscription for the express purpose of hindering the voting and discouraging the brave and patient crowds waiting in the bitter storm to strike the last blow at the shackles their old masters are trying so hard to keep fastened upon them.

These men have come from five to forty miles on foot. Many of them have stripped and swam the deep and swift creeks that crossed their route. They have traveled through the woods and by night, avoiding the observation of their fellow-citizens, gifted with white skins, as the hunted fugitive did in the days of ownership slavery. They have endeavored to show the Congress of the United States that they appreciate their generous sympathy and aid, but they find all the vast machinery that Congress has set in motion clogged and frustrated by the petty devices of rebel malignants. The unknown looker on would have seen next the sheriff of the county, a fuming and blatant rebel, with a posse of twelve men, selected notoriously for their bitter and reckless hatred and their active partizanship against the constitution. These men crowd around the polling window, filling all the space behind the ropes and compelling every voter to pass between their lines. The duty of a posse comitatus is supposed to be that of keeping order in the crowd and in the town should any disturbance arise. The actual employment of this set was to watch and mark every man who voted and give immediate information to his employer, so that he might be discharged, in accordance with the resolutions of the Conservative Club adopted the Saturday night before election.

Two of the posse stood at the window, book and pencil in hand, to take names and challenge voters. They would challenge upon the most frivolous causes, and endeavor to confuse and mislead the voter into a statement of something to his prejudice. Others would talk with voters as they stood waiting their turn, and by threats and promises try to induce them not to vote. For a time they compelled every voter, at a certain point in the line, to pull off his hat and bow before he could go on to vote. All of them continually were jeering, scouting, ridiculing, and insulting the voters as they came up. Their rebel friends outside the ropes passed back and forth the jests, curses, and information that the posse gave out to them, and on one occasion circulated a scandalous and obscene drawing of the registrar, which was passed around among the posse with boisterous manifestations of admiration. If these observers had been known to the colored people, and had their confidence, they would have heard them saying: "Well, I hardly know what to do; I have a large family. If I vote I am to be turned out of employment and out of house and home at once." "Cannot I vote secretly? Men are watching who will go immediately and report." Others would say, "Well, I have done it. The old boss turned me off. I do not know what I will do, but if I had it to do again I would gladly do it."

The devotion and courage exhibited by the whole class, and especially in individual instances, where every chance of success or even support was depending on their action, cannot be too highly commended. The thanks of the nation are due their self-sacrificing patriotism. One word further in regard to the matter of the expression of the popular will in the election. There were white men estimated by all who know best to number between one hundred and fifty and two hundred in this county who had promised and were anxious to vote the constitution, but when they saw how completely the system of terrorism inaugurated by the malignants had gained the ascendancy their hearts failed them, and they went home feeling as they felt when Alabama was dragged into secession by the same means.

It is much to be regretted that Congress has not seen fit to ratify promptly, for every day that the insolent and self-styled victorious rebels hold office is an additional power of damage, which they are ready and active to use. It is a possibility which we depreciate very much that a new election may be ordered. I hope this policy will not be adopted unless ample means and regulations for securing a fair expression of the popular will are insured. The rebels will, of course, change their policy and vote their strength, while the friends of the constitution, especially the colored portion, will be confused and distracted by the seeming whiffing and uncertainty, will be disheartened by the failure of all their heroic sacrifices, and slow to repeat the ordeal. Many will be out of reach of the necessary information to clear their understanding in the matter. Even if troops and orders should be satisfactory, it is impossible to avert the influence of social and business proscription which will again be exerted in its fullest power. I greatly fear such a policy will only prolong the triumph of the anarchists and call for greatly increased expense and effort to secure the desired settlement.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

Hon. JOHN A. PETERS.

But, Mr. Speaker, I go further, and maintain that the only essential element in the terms of admission has been literally complied with; and that is, that the constitution has been adopted by an overwhelming majority of all those who have seen fit to vote. No more stringent provision has usually, or perhaps ever, been required. The history of this subject-matter shows that States have been admitted under all sorts of application, and, as has been said, Rhode Island was one of us without even a constitution at all, but having merely a charter from a king of Great Britain. All the precedents show that Congress has from the beginning exercised the authority of admitting States when and as they pleased. Let us recur to the act of March last:

"Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That if, according to said returns, the constitution shall be ratified by a majority of the votes of the registered electors qualified as herein specified, cast at said election, at least one half of all the registered voters voting upon the question of such ratification, the president of the convention shall transmit a copy of the same, duly certified, to the President of the United States, who shall forthwith transmit the same to Congress, if then in session, and if not in session, then immediately upon its next assembling; and if it shall moreover appear to Congress that the election was one at which all the registered and qualified electors in the State had an opportunity to vote freely and without restraint, fear, or the influence of fraud, and if the Congress shall be satisfied that such constitution meets the approval of a majority of all the qualified electors in the State, and if the said constitution shall be declared by Congress to be in conformity with the provisions of the act to which this is supplementary, and the other provisions of said act shall have been complied with, and the said constitution shall be approved by Congress, the State shall be declared entitled to representation, and Senators and Representatives shall be admitted therefrom as therein provided."

It will be seen that it is provided that if a majority of the votes were given for the ratification of the Constitution, and a majority of the registered votes were cast upon the question of ratification and certain other things are done, the State then shall be declared entitled to representation—Alabama could then with a show of reason demand her admission. She could have claimed to come in on a sort of moral, if not a political right. But can we not grant her admission by a relaxation of some of these conditions if we please to do so? The conditions are named upon which she should come in, but there is no declaration that she might not come in if the conditions should, some of them, remain unperformed. In annexing the condition requiring the action of a majority of the registered voters Congress made no contract with anybody, white or black, loyalists or rebels. The question submitted was not so much what kind of a political constitution Alabama should have, as whether she should have any at all. Thank Heaven, it was settled by the war and the potent voice of the people that her constitution should be a radically free one. That is a foreclosed question. What, then, was the meaning of the conditions annexed? It was this: Congress desired to be satisfied whether the people of Alabama were strong enough to frame and uphold a loyally reconstructed State. The principal evidence of the fact was to be whether the conditions of said section could be carried out. Even if we had agreed with Alabama to be conclusively satisfied with that amount of evidence, have we not a perfect right to be satisfied with less evidence under all the circumstances which surrounded the election in that State? Nothing can be clearer than that Congress would decide upon the political character of the constitution for Alabama. The section which I have read requires that it shall be in conformity with the act of reconstruction and that it shall be approved by Congress.

There can be no bad faith or want of authority in our admission of this State. Then why postpone action for a day? Is it an apprehension that the friends of the Government cannot maintain the State upon the side of loyalty? For one, Mr. Speaker, I am willing to try the experiment. If there is a risk about it I am ready and willing to meet it. Are we not in as good condition to pursue the fight now as we shall be in time to come? Are not the patriotic people of Alabama as able to inaugurate and maintain civil government now as they can be the next week or the next year? Do they not need the hope and courage and impetus which the passage of this bill would inspire? What say the rebels of that State? Do not they believe that our friends could maintain the government they are building up? If not, why is every one of them as hostile as death toward the new constitution? What hopes and expectations can they have under it when they have refused to vote, and used murderous means to prevent others from voting for its ratification? Would not the success of Alabama, like the heaven hidden in the measures of meal, work out good influences through all the other seceding States? Why should the Democratic party so violently denounce our mode of reconstructing this State, if, with all their sagacity, they believed that, politically, she could be turned immediately upside down and her electoral vote be obtained for the Democratic candidate? If we pause now for such reasons when shall we dare to move again? When shall we attempt to give emphasis and application to the words of Andrew Johnson, that "loyal men, black or white, shall rule America," a sentiment which has been echoed and reechoed throughout the land.

I find this view, sir, sustained by the New York Tribune in another phase, and in words of a most direct and emphatic character; and I invoke the sentiments of Horace Greeley, or some one who writes in that paper as well as he does, when he says:

"We hold that the concerted proscription and terrorism whereby the rebels of Alabama prevented the ratification of that instrument by a majority vote was a most culpable conspiracy, which should not be allowed to prevail. Congress, in recoiling before that conspiracy, concedes a virtual triumph to the rebellion." "We venture to suggest to the Republican majority that the country is tired of agitation, turmoil, chaos, and longs for restoration and peace. The rebels and their northern allies want the South kept disorganized till after the presidential election. Their chief stock in trade is complaint that ten States remain unrepresented in Congress, though they would keenly deplore their being represented otherwise than by unchanged rebels. It is the plain duty of Congress to divest them of their pet grievance at the earliest possible day. Every hour that a State remains unrepresented is a damage to the Republican cause."

Mr. Speaker, we owe it to the black man to admit Alabama. President Lincoln never uttered nobler words than when he said: "We have promised the colored men their rights; and, by the help of God, that promise shall be kept." It is needless to enumerate what the colored man has done for our country. He has prayed for and expected in return the liberty of the citizen. Give him all else in the States where slavery lately existed, and in some forms essentially continues to exist, and deny him the right to vote, and you deny him his liberty. If he does not obtain such a boon by our indorsing the constitution of Alabama now, in that State, at least, he may never obtain it. The sooner he gets such a privilege the more likely will he be to retain it. The longer he has it, the harder it will be for rebels to wrest it from his possession. If he can maintain himself to-day, he will be stronger to-morrow. The ballot is the symbol of freedom, and the use of it in his hands will be the needle-gun which will bring about a speedy political victory over the whole hosts of rebels and Democrats combined.

Education will be constantly advancing him. It makes a mighty difference whether education of the race, as under this constitution, or their subjection to ignorance, as under a slave constitution, is enjoined by law. He has the capacity for self government. In spite of the declaration of Democratic orators I will invoke the belief and opinion of that man whom Democracy has always canonized as a saint; I mean Thomas Jefferson. He wrote a brief letter which is valuable enough to read in full:

PHILADELPHIA, August 30, 1791.

SIR: I thank you sincerely for your letter of the 19th instant, and for the almanac it contained. Nobody wishes more than I do to see such proofs as you exhibit that nature has given to our black brethren talents equal to those of the other colors of men, and that the appearance of the want of them is owing only to the degraded condition of their existence both in Africa and America. I can add with truth, that no one wishes more ardently to see a good system commenced for raising the condition both of their body and mind to what it ought to be as fast as the imbecility of their present existence, and other circumstances which cannot be neglected, will admit. I have taken the liberty of sending your almanac to Monsieur de Condorcet, Secretary of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, and member of the Philanthropic Society, because I considered it a document to which your whole color had a right for their justification against the doubts which have been entertained against them.

I am, with great esteem, sir, your most obedient servant,

THOMAS JEFFERSON.

MR. BENJAMIN BANNEKER, near Ellicott's Lower Mills, Baltimore county.

This Mr. Banneker lived at Ellicott's Mills, in Maryland. He was a profound and scientific scholar, although self-educated. John H. B. Latrobe, Esq., in an interesting memoir read in 1845 before the Maryland Historical Society, says: "His father was a native African, and his mother the child of natives of Africa; so that to no admixture of the blood of the white man was he indebted for his peculiar and extraordinary abilities."

He compiled an almanac and sent it in manuscript to Jefferson. What a commentary is this generous expression of the immortal author of our Declaration of Independence upon the bigotry and ignorance and prejudices of smaller men!

Mr. Speaker, let us extend to the southern black man all political rights and privileges. It will pour a new sunlight over that land. It is just toward them; it may be necessary for us, and the very life of the nation. Then their more perfect development, morally, socially, and politically, will follow. Then will all classes and colors be better off. Then other Bannekers may be found among them; and now, while the occasion offers, first of all, let us welcome back Alabama.

I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [MR. PAINE.]

Mr. PAINE then addressed the House against the ratification of the treaty for the purchase of Alaska. [See Appendix.] At the conclusion of his remarks Mr. PAINE yielded the remainder of the hour of Mr. PETERS to Mr. WILSON, of Iowa.

AMENDMENT TO JUDICIARY ACT OF 1789.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I was not in the House last Saturday when the somewhat remarkable debate occurred which was reported in the Globe of last Monday. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BOYER] speaking, as he said, for the minority of the House, referred to an amendment which I offered to a bill on the preceding Thursday, denounced the whole proceeding as one which involved not only sharp practice, but a fraud. During that debate to a question propounded to him by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BOYER] replied as follows:

"The gentleman entirely misinterprets my language when he says that I characterized this as an 'illegal' transaction. I admit that whatever fraud there may be in this case is not punishable at law. I admit that the act, although passed as it has been, cannot therefore be vitiated as an act of legislation. What I condemn particularly is not the illegality of the transaction, but the manner in which the measure was foisted upon us, and so made a law without resistance and without debate. I say that such a proceeding was not consistent with the courage usually displayed by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] himself, and I will add by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] and the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON.] What is done in this House upon important matters like that should be done courageously, in a manly way, in open debate, with fair notice. Your numbers surely are overwhelming enough. Can you not rely upon them without resorting to devices of this description in your assaults upon the judiciary of the country?"

Mr. Speaker, I cannot account for this language or the general course of remarks indulged in by the gentleman from Pennsylvania on that occasion, except on the ground that he was smarting under the effects of his inattention to the public business; for certainly there was not involved in the transaction, so far as I was concerned, anything which would afford just ground for any such charge or complaint as this.

Before I proceed further I will state the facts involved in my connection with the adoption of the amendment complained of and the passage of that bill. My attention had been called to the bill by one of the revenue officers in New York city, he suggesting it was important that bill should pass. I examined it. I saw it was a bill relating to the judiciary, and on Thursday morning, knowing an amendment such as was adopted could be fairly ingrafted upon the bill, I handed to the clerk of the Judiciary Committee a draft of the one of which complaint has been made, and asked him to copy it inasmuch as it was somewhat defaced by interlineations and erasures. He did so, and returned it to me. I went to the Speaker of the House and inquired of him whether we would have the morning hour on that day. He informed me it was doubtful, owing to the condition of the business of the House. I informed him if the morning hour should occur on that day it was my purpose, after the expiration of the hour, to go to the Speaker's table for the purpose of taking up that bill, and it was my intention, when the bill should thus come before the House, to offer that amendment by way of adding a new section. But, on being informed that there would probably not be a morning hour on Thursday, I returned to my committee room.

During the course of the afternoon I was informed a motion would be made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] to take that bill from the Speaker's table. The bill having originated with the Finance Committee in the Senate, and he, being the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of the House, deemed it his proper province to take charge of the bill. I had no consultation with the gentleman from Ohio on the subject. The amendment was locked up in my desk, and when I came into the House, thus knowing the bill was to be called up, I went to my seat and unlocked my desk and took out the amendment for the purpose of offering it, and I asked the gentleman from Ohio to yield to me that I might do so. Before the bill was called up I sent to the Library for the acts of 1866 and 1867, and turned to the act entitled "An act to amend an act to establish judicial courts of the United States," approved September 24, 1789, and marked upon the proper page that portion of the law which I wished to have read to the House in explanation of the amendment I intended to offer.

When the gentleman from Ohio yielded to me to offer the amendment I expected to make an explanation, but there seemed to be no demand for it on the part of any member of the House. The previous question was moved and the main question ordered to be put. Gentlemen know I never trouble the House with any unnecessary remarks. If a measure proposed by me can pass without discussion I am inclined to let it so pass, whether it be a bill from my committee or a measure brought forward on my own motion, or a measure of any character, amendment or otherwise. The House adopted the amendment, and then passed the bill as amended.

That, sir, is my entire connection with the subject, except such as I will hereafter disclose. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, on the points growing out of this state of facts, bases the attack to which I have alluded; and he said, at the time he was speaking, for the minority.

The first ground of the complaint presented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is that the amendment was not germane to the bill and was therefore out of order. In that respect, as well as in others, he spoke, as he said, for the minority of the House. That is his first complaint. I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that one of the minority, for whom he proposed to speak, stated during that debate last Saturday—I allude to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,]—that "the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa was germane, and, therefore, no point of order could be made." There is one of the minority for whom the gentleman from Pennsylvania was not authorized to speak.

Mr. BOYER. I desire to correct what is a misstatement of the gentleman, no doubt made unintentionally, that I stated I was speaking for the minority. The gentleman will find no such thing in my remarks. What I stated in the course of my remarks, and near the conclusion of them, was, "what I did say was due to the minority in explanation of their position." I did not say in any part of my remarks I had been authorized to speak for the minority of the House, or had undertaken to speak for the minority. I spoke for myself, but I said the explanation was due to the minority, including myself.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Which only results in this, (I will not take up the time to hunt up the gentleman's precise language,) instead of an affirmative statement that he was speaking for the minority, he left it to be inferred that he was speaking for them when he said it was due to the minority he should call the attention of the House and go on and make his remarks in that connection. I do not care whether the authority was affirmed or left to implication.

The gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NIBLACK,] during that debate, also interposed and stated, as follows:

"Mr. Speaker, I only want to say a word or two about this matter by way of explanation on my own account. I happened to be one of those on this side of the House who were not 'caught napping' so far as this amendment was concerned. I think, however, that many of our friends attach undue importance to the action of the minority here on that occasion. Nothing that we could have done could have delayed the passage of that proposition for any great length of time; and hence our action is of no practical importance in the matter."

In another place the gentleman says he noticed the amendment was germane to the bill.

Now, sir, there are two gentlemen from the minority who have spoken on this subject, and who certainly do not agree in opinion that the amendment was not germane to the bill. More than that, I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania himself, on reflection, will not contend it was not germane, and did not relate to the subject embraced in the bill.

But, sir, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, speaking at least by implication for the minority, in order to set them right before the country, not only insists the amendment was not germane, but that they were taken by surprise, and could not interpose opposition to the bill, is confronted again by the same gentleman from Indiana by these words, uttered by him on the occasion in question:

"I suppose that the difference of a day or two will not amount to anything so far as regards any influence which the bill may have upon the Supreme Court. I was in my seat giving some attention to the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] and to his statement about this bill, he being the chairman of a committee of which I am a member. From the statement which he made I could see nothing objectionable in the bill, and, therefore, I did not object to taking it up. When, however, the bill had been taken up, and this amendment was proposed, I did see in the amendment a measure to which I was seriously opposed. I rose to my feet for the purpose of objecting to the amendment; but a moment's reflection convinced me that an objection from me would be of no avail; that the amendment was regularly in under the rules, and that the gentleman from Ohio controlled the affair. I did not think the amendment could be ruled out on a point of order; for it occurred to me that it was germane to the bill. I turned round to a gentleman near me and remarked, 'We are caught handsomely in this thing; there is no use in making a fuss now.' Under those circumstances the bill with the amendment was passed, the previous question being ordered on the demand of the gentleman from Ohio."

I fully understood when that measure was passed what was involved in it, and was prepared to submit my objections if those objections could have availed in the slightest degree; but I knew that objection was useless. I subsequently inquired of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSHALL] and the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE,] who did not happen to be in their seats at the time, and who are members of the Judiciary Committee, whether the measure had been considered by that committee, and whether there had been any prior arrangement or understanding in the committee in regard to the matter. Learning that there had not been, I did not see that anything was to be gained by pursuing the matter further; but it having been telegraphed all over the country that we on this side were 'caught napping,' I desired to say that I, for one, understood the effect of the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] at the time it was offered, though, of course, when the gentleman from Ohio asked unanimous consent to take up a perfectly unobjectionable measure, I could not foresee that any such amendment as that of the gentleman from Iowa was to be offered."

Now, it will not do for gentlemen to say, unless they are informed in advance of all the amendments that may be offered to a bill when once before the House, that if some amendment is offered which is objectionable in their view of the case, they have been entrapped into allowing the main subject to come before the House by unanimous consent. Every member of the House understands perfectly well that, under the rule, when any measure comes before the House, either by being originally introduced, or by being taken from the Speaker's table by unanimous consent, it comes up subject to the right of every member to offer any amendment to it which may be germane to its subject-matter.

Mr. NIBLACK. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment at this point?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. NIBLACK. I desire to say that the reason why I remarked the other day that I did not regard as of much practical importance any action we might have taken upon that occasion, was this: (I did not then amplify my statement as much as perhaps I might have done,) if the effort of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] to obtain unanimous consent to take up this bill had not been successful, I knew, or supposed, that a motion to proceed to business on the Speaker's table would soon be in order; and then the bill would have been taken up and disposed of that day. Therefore I did not regard what we had done or had not done as of any practical importance.

And I did not complain of the bill being taken up in view of the statement submitted by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.] But what I did complain of was that after the bill had been taken up, judging by the action of gentlemen, not by anything that was said, it seemed that there was some preconceived relation to this matter. And we have labored under that impression from that time to this: at least I have to a certain extent. I have had the impression that there was a prearrangement between the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] in regard to this bill.

THE SPEAKER pro tempore. (Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio.) The hour of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PETERS] has expired.

Mr. MOORHEAD obtained the floor.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I hope the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] will be allowed to conclude his explanation.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I have no objection to yielding, if by general understanding I may be considered as being entitled to the floor on the next day for general debate.

THE SPEAKER pro tempore. That will require unanimous consent.

No objection was made.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, resumed the floor.

Mr. NIBLACK. Will the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] allow me to conclude what I was saying when the hammer fell?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. NIBLACK. I desire to say that the disclaimer of the gentleman from Iowa that there was no preconceived arrangement concerning this matter is sufficient for me, and I presume it will be sufficient for this side of the House. But we have been under the impression that there was a prearrangement between gentlemen to have the bill taken up, and then the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] was to come in with his amendment, and thus perpetrate upon us what might be called a parliamentary trick. And I will say to the gentleman from Iowa that the force of that impression was increased by expressions used and remarks made by members of the other side after the bill had passed. We were informed that there was a prearrangement, between some gentlemen at least on the other side, that this affair should go off just as it did. We felt that if there was such an understanding, then the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] had done something which we could not indorse, something which was reprehensible in submitting the statement he did in regard to what he proposed to do if he in fact understood that behind that bill there was an important amendment to come in of which the House had no previous notice. That was all that I or any other member of the House, had any right to complain of. If there was no such previous understanding, then, of course, much that I objected to was unfounded. But that was the point on this side of the House, that we were entrapped by a previous understanding of some sort of which we had no knowledge.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will now recognize the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] as entitled to the floor for one hour.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield to me for a question?

Mr. WILSON. I desire first to answer the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NIBLACK.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I think the gentleman can reply to both of us at the same time.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Very well.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to say that just before this bill came up, I was called to the door by a gentleman who had sent his card in to me. I was at the door when unanimous consent was given to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] to have this bill taken up from the Speaker's table. I came into the House just as the last words of the amendment, as I supposed, were being read. It struck my ear as something differing from the proposition which I heard. As I came in and took my seat I was asked if the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa was a matter reported from the Judiciary Committee, and not recognizing it as anything we had considered in committee I at once called upon my colleague on the committee [Mr. MARSHALL] to know if it came from the committee. He said he knew nothing of it. I then went to the Clerk's desk to read the amendment; but about the time I reached the desk the Speaker announced that the measure had passed.

I did not at that time suppose it was anything extraordinary, and as was remarked by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] the first that led me to suppose we had been entrapped or tricked in the matter was a remark made to me by gentlemen of the House.

The Speaker himself, about the time we adjourned, came to my desk and wondered that no one had discovered what that measure was, as no one had made or insisted upon any objection. These remarks have been made to me repeatedly since by gentlemen of the House who said that they understood the matter. I remember one gentleman from Indiana saying to me—and I suppose he was not speaking to me privately—that he understood precisely what was to be done; that if the bill of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] was allowed to come before the House the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] intended to move his amendment. It was from these remarks that I became satisfied—and I must say the impression still remains upon my mind—that gentlemen on the other side of the House had arranged to adopt the measure in the manner in which it passed the House.

I now wish the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] to state—and I certainly shall be satisfied with his statement—whether there was not an understanding by certain members of the House that in case the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] should get unanimous consent to take up his bill that amendment was to be moved, and whether it was not drawn in such language as not to inform the House by its terms and without reference to the section of the statute it was intended to repeal of the nature and character of the amendment.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to disguise in this matter. When the charge was made, at least implicitly, that I had entered into an arrangement with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] that he should disarm the House of any suspicion of what might be coming, in order to get that bill before the House so that I might offer that amendment, I said, as I say now, that it was entirely without foundation. I had no interview with the gentleman from Ohio on the subject of the preparation of the amendment, nor did he see it, nor did I know that he was aware of what the amendment was to be. If he was it certainly came from nothing said by me to him or by him to me. I am free to say that I had the amendment prepared for the purpose of putting it on to that particular bill as an additional section, and in pursuance of that purpose I inquired of the Speaker, as I have already stated, whether there would be a morning hour on Thursday, intending, if such should be the case, immediately upon the expiration of the morning hour, to move to proceed to business on the Speaker's table for the purpose of taking up that bill. I had resolved to make that motion in order that I might attach to the bill the then prepared amendment as an additional section. And it was for the express purpose, so far as I was concerned, of taking away the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in the cases that are affected by the amendment—of repealing the very power which we conferred upon that Court about a year ago. I have no disguise about that. That was my purpose.

But how the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] came to move in the matter at that time I do not know. It was proper for him to take charge of the bill. The bill having originated with the Committee on Finance in the Senate, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means in the House very properly assumed jurisdiction of it. I learned that he proposed to ask to take it from the Speaker's table, and I was resolved not to permit the opportunity afforded by its consideration to pass without offering that amendment whenever that bill should come before the House. But, sir, had not the gentleman from Ohio interfered with my purpose, in about twenty minutes after he made that motion, the morning hour would have expired.

Mr. BOYER. I would like to inquire if the gentleman from Iowa heard the remark made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] introductory to that bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I certainly did; and the statement of the gentleman from Ohio was entirely correct, so far as I now remember it. As I remarked, within twenty minutes after the motion was made the morning hour would have expired, when I should have moved at once to proceed to business on the Speaker's table. Now, it is very well understood by every member that that is a motion of very high privilege.

It is an invariable practice to permit a member on the expiration of the morning hour to take the floor, even though another may have occupied it, to make a motion to proceed to business on the Speaker's table." (Rules, House, p. 30.)

Under that rule, by a vote of the majority, I had expected to reach that bill and offer that amendment.

Now, sir, I will say further, in order that there might not be any misunderstanding about the matter, after I had made known to the Speaker my purpose to make that motion, I did say to very many gentlemen on this side of the House that I intended to make it, and that I would also offer that amendment to the bill. I have no concealment to practice about that.

Mr. WOODWARD. Will the gentlemen yield for a question?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Yes, sir.

Mr. WOODWARD. I wish to inquire of the gentleman whether, in his legal judgment, the effect of that bill was to take away the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in the McCordle case?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Yes, sir; I think it would be.

Mr. WOODWARD. One further question. Was it not your intention in offering that amendment to take away the jurisdiction in that case?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Most assuredly it was my intention to take away the jurisdiction given by the act of 1867 reaching the McCordle case, or any other case depending on the provisions of that act affected by the amendment.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. I would like to inquire whether the gentleman had any other specific intention than to reach the McCordle case?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. My specific intention was to reach that case and all other cases in which the jurisdiction might depend upon that provision of the statute.

And now, inasmuch as the gentlemen have themselves introduced the McCordle case, let me see whether it was a very improper thing to be done, considering the kind of man he is. In the first place I may say that, in my judgment, the court is mistaken in its construction of that act; but they have construed it so as to take jurisdiction, and there we must be content to rest as to that case if it should be decided before the repealing amendment becomes a part of the law. I hold in my hand the Vicksburg Daily Times, a paper of which the said McCordle is the editor; and, sir, during the very time that he and his attorneys were pressing the Supreme Court to advance his case on the docket, on the ground that his rights and liberties were being interfered with, in a number of his paper, bearing date January 21, 1868, I find an editorial article from which I will read an extract. Speaking of the constitutional convention then in session in the State of Mississippi, and of the ordinance for the collection of taxes in order to pay the expenses of the same, he says:

"There is not a man who will pay any tax imposed by this convention, and if their tax collectors undertake to enforce collection, by seizing and selling the property of the people, they will be shot down like dogs, as they are! They will deserve to be shot, and we advise every man to resist the payment of such a tax by all the means God has given him. The Mygatts and Orrs, the Hausers and Gibbs, the Aldersons, and all the other scavengers may make a note of it. The people of Mississippi are in no humor to be trifled with. They know that Ord's convention has no power or authority to tax them, and they are determined not to be robbed! The men who attempt it will certainly get hurt, for they will be treated as all robbers and highwaymen deserve to be treated."

"The insolence and villany of this convention is boundless. The adventurers from abroad, the renegades of home production, and the negroes assembled with them seem to think that they are the masters of the people, and that they can rob them at pleasure. We advise a little caution. There are some things that flesh and blood will not bear. Let them go on and concoct their villany; let them make their constitution "so called," and when it is completed the people—the real people—not the omnibus full of vagrants and vagabonds, called Radicals—will rise in their might and trample this constitution under their feet. Decent negroes even will not vote for it!"

This was published on the 21st day of January, 1868, and at the very time McCordle's counsel were pressing the advancement of this case on the docket. And now, because, in strict accordance with the rule of this House, myself not being entitled even to the floor to enter upon any discussion except by consent, I offered the amendment which may or may not (that is a question of time) result in depriving the Supreme Court of jurisdiction in that man's case, we are told that we have been practicing a great wrong upon the rights of a man who uses his press for the purpose of obstructing the laws of the land, a man who calls upon the people of the State of Mississippi to shoot down the agents of the law; to "shoot them down like dogs, as they are."

Because, in the exercise of our just powers, this man may be interfered with in some respects, we find the minority of this House raising a hue and cry, as though some great outrage had been perpetrated.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to put an inquiry to the gentleman from Iowa, who is, I believe, in the habit, at all events, of thinking in regard to himself, as I do of myself, that he means to act fairly and to give just judgment in regard to a matter of this kind, in view of the explanation which was given by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,]—and I base my question simply upon that, for I have no feeling about this matter, so far as I am concerned; I did not happen to be here; and there was no fraud practiced upon me personally, so far as I am aware—I ask the gentleman, in view of the explanation of the gentleman from Ohio, in view of that gentleman's statement that there was nothing objectionable in the proposition for which he asked unanimous consent, and after the minority, with their known opinions upon the question of the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, and their known desire to have the McCordle case decided, had given their consent, was it fair to introduce a proposition so objectionable as that amendment was known to be to the minority without explaining the amendment which was intended to be attached?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Why, sir, I judge of the fairness of the transaction by the rules of the House. Any member could have objected to taking that bill from the Speaker's table. No member did object. When the members withheld their objections they did it with a full understanding of the rule which would authorize the presentation of the identical amendment which I did present, and with knowledge also of the fact that the majority of the House, if they should so decide, could second the previous question and cut off debate, and that the same majority could pass the bill as amended.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. But the gentleman does not quite answer my question. Suppose that the gentleman had asked the consent of the House; suppose that he had made precisely the speech which the gentleman from Ohio made—

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I am not here defending the gentleman from Ohio; he did that for himself very well last Saturday.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I am not asking the gentleman to defend him. But I ask him, if that had been done by himself, would he consider that he had a right, in fairness, in candor, in justice to this side of the House, to introduce that amendment? Having explained the original proposition as unobjectionable, would he have felt that he was justified in attaching to that proposition an amendment to which he knew every member of the minority in this House to be opposed?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman cannot put me in a false position in this matter. He is stating a hypothetical case. That is not the case with which we are dealing. I made no statement to the House upon the subject.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. But the gentleman from Ohio did.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Very well. The gentleman from Ohio speaks for himself, not for me. When the gentleman can present a case in which I have made any representations to the House then he will have a case which I may feel called upon to answer.

Mr. NIBLACK. The gentleman, however, availed himself of the statement made by the gentleman from Ohio to get in his amendment.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. No, sir; I did no such thing. I availed myself of the right which the rule of the House gave me to offer an amendment to the then pending bill. That was all. Now, there was no disguise at all as to the purpose of that amendment. I will read it:

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act approved February 5, 1867, entitled 'An act to amend an act to establish the judicial courts of the United States, approved September 24, 1789,' as authorizes an appeal from the judgment of a circuit court to the Supreme Court of the United States, or the exercise of any such jurisdiction by said Supreme Court on appeals which have been or may hereafter be taken, be, and the same is hereby, repealed."

No person could misunderstand the scope of that proposition. Any member who listened to the reading of it knew at once that it was striking at a branch of the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States, a jurisdiction conferred by an act of Congress passed but little more than a year ago. The proposition was that Congress should by statute take away from the Supreme Court jurisdiction which it had but recently conferred by statute. That is all there was of the proposition. Any man could comprehend it. There was no attempt to cover up its purpose or conceal its scope and effect; and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] says that he understood it. He was not caught in any trap. He saw that the amendment was an important one, reaching to the very end that I purposed it should reach. But he has very properly said, doubtless, in view of the rule to which I have called the attention of the House, that but a few minutes would elapse before the morning hour would expire, when any member could make the motion to proceed to business on the Speaker's table; and seeing that the amendment was germane to the bill, and that resistance would amount to nothing because of the majority on this side of the House, he said nothing further and permitted the matter to pass.

That gentleman could have interposed an inquiry. I was prepared to answer any that might have been proposed, and should have done so just as unreservedly on that occasion as I have done to-day. I was not prepared to ask this House to pass anything under false pretenses or by trick or fraud. I never do anything in this House by trick or fraud. As to any measure which I introduce or advocate, I am always willing to announce its purpose and to assume the responsibility which may attach to it. And I will say to gentlemen who have propounded questions to me that I will be glad if the bill shall become a law before a decision is made by the Supreme Court in the McCordle case, thereby sweeping the case from the docket by taking away the jurisdiction of the court.

Mr. WOODWARD. I beg leave to say, in opposition to the legal opinion of the gentleman from Iowa, that the bill will accomplish no such purpose.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Very well; then the gentleman from Pennsylvania is not hurt, nor is Mr. McCordle. If the bill will not accomplish that purpose, why all this "tempest in a teapot?"

Mr. WOODWARD. I have not stirred up any "tempest in a teapot," nor do I intend to do so. I put a question to the gentleman from Iowa a little while ago as to his legal opinion of the effect of that bill. If I understood his answer, it was that the bill was not only designed to take away the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in the McCordle case, but would, in his judgment, have that effect. Now, I submit to the gentleman, as a lawyer, that it is not in the power of the legislative department of the Government to take away from the Supreme Court jurisdiction in a case where the jurisdiction has already attached.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Why, Mr. Speaker, is not the gentleman from Pennsylvania aware that the Supreme Court has decided that a repeal of the act conferring jurisdiction arrests the power of the court at any stage of a case before judgment? that if, after hearing and before judgment is announced, the jurisdiction is taken away by a repeal of the act under which it is conferred the court cannot announce judgment? Why, sir, the right of the court to act at all depends upon the jurisdiction conferred. Take away the jurisdiction and of course the power to act ceases.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Speaker, however well the gentleman may have succeeded in exonerating himself from responsibility for a questionable line of conduct in bringing the bill before the House—I pronounce no judgment upon that matter—the gentleman must see that he stands here maintaining that the legislative department of the Government may do the highly indecent thing of looking into the courts of the country to see what cases are there pending, and then using the legislative function to arrest the course of justice in any particular case.

That is the position in which the gentleman places himself and his party by the explanation he has made here to-day.

I submit to that gentleman's legal judgment, for he stands at the head of the Judiciary Committee of this House, that it is a misuse and an abuse of the legislative power of this Government. I maintain the courts of this country have a right to finish their investigation of a case to which their jurisdiction has attached; and neither the Republican party nor the Judiciary Committee itself, though its chairman, nor the whole country together, have the right to interfere with the exercise of that jurisdiction by that department of the Government.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do not know whether the gentleman uses the term "right" in the sense of "power" or not.

Mr. WOODWARD. The judicial power of the Government is vested in that court. It has attached in a particular case. The court is in the exercise of that jurisdiction. I maintain as to that case it is, in the first place, indecent for the legislative power to come in, and in the next place, it is incompetent.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. As to the question of indecency the gentleman will permit those who voted for that measure to judge for themselves. As to the power I have already stated that the Supreme Court have settled that by their own decision.

Mr. WOODWARD. In what case?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I cannot refer to the case by title now, and will hand it to the gentleman. I think every lawyer familiar with the reports of the Supreme Court understands this question perfectly.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Was it not in a criminal case?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Let me get through with one thing at a time, if you please.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania says it is not proper for us to look into the courts and see what they propose to do—what cases they have to dispose of. Why, sir, we could not shut our eyes nor close our ears to the information which come to us from all quarters, particularly in the press representing the party to which the gentleman belongs, that it was a thing certain that the McCordle case was to be made use of to enable a majority of that court to determine the invalidity and unconstitutionality of the reconstruction laws of Congress.

Mr. Speaker, if their papers had merely stated in this respect that the court will pass upon the sufficiency of the return to the writ and decide whether or no, in view of that return, McCordle can properly and lawfully be held by the authorities by whom he was arrested, I do not know that much would have been said about it on this side of the House. It would have been proper and not going out of the line of jurisdiction conferred upon the court as its members construe the act of February 5, 1867. But when we were told day by day that the majority of the court had practically made up its judgment, not only to pass upon the sufficiency of the return to the writ, which involves the only question properly before them in the McCordle case, but also to do as the court did once before in the Dred Scott case, go outside of the record properly involving the questions really presented for its determination, undertaking to infringe upon the political power of Congress and declare the laws for the government of the rebel States in every respect unconstitutional, it was our duty to intervene by a repeal of the jurisdiction and prevent the threatened calamity falling upon the country.

Now, sir, I have said all that I wished to say on this case, and more than I intended when I asked for the floor.

I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I wish to ask a question. I understand the gentleman from Iowa to defend his own conduct in this matter. I wish to say to him I never once impugned his conduct, but what we complain of is the whole transaction. It must necessarily involve the statement made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] in getting unanimous consent for the proposition he introduced as well as the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa. I think that was fairly involved in the question, which I think he evaded when he said he did not come here to defend the gentleman from Ohio. Yet the gentleman, as I understand it, has endeavored to show we had no reason to complain. We complain of the entire transaction. We think it was an abuse of the unanimous consent given to the gentleman from Ohio, especially if there was a preconcerted plan to pass at that time this amendment. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] has stated he was informed by gentlemen upon this floor, and I will state I was informed by gentlemen here, that they knew this thing was to be done. It is of that which we complain.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentlemen who make such statements are responsible for them. I am not responsible for anything to which I was not a party. I say again to the gentleman from Wisconsin, as I have said before, that I did inform members of the House of my intention to make a motion to proceed to the business upon the Speaker's table to get up that bill, and that I intended to offer an amendment; and, sir, I disclosed the terms of the amendment to very many gentlemen on this side of the House. What particular event may have brought that bill to the attention of the gentleman from Ohio and caused its coming before the House twenty minutes before I could make the motion I am not advised. As I stated before, there was no agreement between the gentleman from Ohio and myself that he should do that thing, and then purposely let me in by way of catching in a trick the minority of this House. If the gentleman from Ohio knew the terms of my amendment he did not get his information from me. The amendment, when I left the House to retire to my committee-room, was locked up in my desk, and I had not conversed with the gentleman from Ohio concerning it.

Mr. BOYER. I rejoice the gentleman from Iowa thought it necessary to make the explanation which he has made to the House, for it is well that matters of this kind should be felt to be subjects which need an explanation. When, on last Saturday, I introduced this subject I did so without consultation with many of the members of the minority. But few members on our side of the House knew a few minutes before it was done that I intended to do it. But I believed then, and I am sure now, that I spoke the sentiments of the minority; and I am glad to find I have spoken the sentiments of a great many just and right-minded men belonging to the party of the majority, if not in this House, at least outside of it.

The gentleman from Iowa has not, in my opinion, by the explanation which he has given, materially changed the aspect of the case. He has said, to be sure, that he had no previous consultation with the gentleman from Ohio before he offered his amendment, but he has said he told members around him that he was about to offer such an amendment to the then pending bill. The gentleman from Ohio informed the House on last Saturday that he understood when he introduced the bill and made his remarks that there was some such amendment to be offered—that there was to be a "good thing" attached to the bill, which would be likely to produce a good effect.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I did not yield the floor to the gentleman to attack the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BOYER. This reference is inseparable from the discussion of the subject now before the House.

The gentleman from Iowa has further admitted that he was present and heard the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio with which he introduced the bill, and that notwithstanding he pressed his amendment without any explanation, although he also stated he had intended to make an explanation of the amendment before its introduction, but he was not in the habit of unnecessarily discussing any subject, and when he found it could be introduced and passed without discussion he abstained from it. He has defended the amendment on the ground that it was germane to the bill then pending, and has taken exception to the position I then took, that it was not so. As a technical matter it may be the amendment was germane to the bill, but it was not germane in the ordinary general sense. It related to the restriction of the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, whereas the bill itself provided for its enlargement. It related to a case pending upon a habeas corpus, whereas the bill itself only related to appeals to the Supreme Court in cases in which revenue officers were parties. I said then, and I say now, if the amendment was strictly germane to the bill under the rules, it presents a worse case than if it had not been germane, for the reason that no point of order could have been made to exclude it if it was germane, no matter how attentive the minority might have been to what was passing at the time.

I desire, in the first place, to show the manner in which the previous question was moved immediately after the introduction of the amendment, in order to show that there was no possible opportunity to introduce any effective objection on the part of any member, no matter how perfectly he might have understood at that stage of the proceedings what was going on and however desirous he might have been to be heard. When the amendment was offered by the gentleman from Iowa the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] said:

"I am willing to have the amendment received, and now I call the previous question on the bill and amendment."

Immediately upon the introduction of the amendment, and its being accepted by the gentleman from Ohio, in the same breath and in the same sentence he moved he previous question and shut off everything in the nature of inquiry and everything in the nature of opposition unless a question of order was raised, which could only be entertained in case the amendment was not germane. But being, as the gentleman from Iowa now says, germane to the bill, the mode in which it was introduced completely closed the door against any effort which could possibly be made in opposition to it.

I do not think it necessary that I should enter into any discussion as to whether it was proper to limit the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in the case in question.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do not propose to yield for the discussion of that question.

Mr. BOYER. Or whether the amendment in any way prevents the Supreme Court from deciding the McCordle case. That was discussed by the gentleman from Iowa, and I do not undertake—

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It was brought in by your colleague, [Mr. WOODWARD.]

Mr. BOYER. I do not intend to go into that subject on this occasion. The gentleman admits the object of the introduction of the amendment, and he has alluded to the defense made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] on Saturday last in approving terms.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Pardon me; I said the gentleman from Ohio had taken care of himself well in the debate on Saturday. That is not my branch of the case. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOYER. That was substantially what the gentleman said.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do not say there is anything in what he said to disapprove of.

Mr. BOYER. The gentleman does not say there is anything in what the gentleman from Ohio did that he disapproved of.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. In what he said, not did.

Mr. BOYER. The gentleman explains—

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do not explain; I rest upon my statement in the first instance.

Mr. BOYER. Very well; the gentleman may have his own way. The introduction of the bill by the gentleman from Ohio was, of course, perfectly legitimate; so were his remarks as applied to the bill itself as it then stood. The introduction of the amendment, disconnected with any other question, by the gentleman from Iowa, was also perfectly legitimate. He had a right to do it. With that no fault should be found. Very innocent things may be done by individuals without preconcert and without a common design to which no possible exception could be taken, and yet, when the two things are done by different individuals by preconcert and with a common design to effect a certain purpose, the law sometimes denominates it a conspiracy.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I want to know of the gentleman (who is speaking in my time) whether he charges that there was concert of action?

Mr. BOYER. I accept whatever the gentleman has stated in that respect as being true; for I do not charge him with having made any intentional misrepresentation of his own position, his own object, or the facts connected, so far as he is individually concerned, with the introduction of the amendment; nor did I undertake to characterize by any offensive epithets on last Saturday what had taken place. But I intended to mention the facts, and I said then what I repeat now, that I would have the country to give the transaction a name and to pass judgment upon it.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, resumed the floor.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask the gentleman to yield to me, not for the purpose of participating in the discussion of the issue which has arisen between that gentleman and the gentleman who has just taken his seat, [Mr. BOYER,] but for the purpose of alluding to a remark which fell from another gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WOODWARD,] in which he criticised the action of Congress, of this House and the other, in passing the amendment which was introduced by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON,] as indecent. Passing over the assumption—

Mr. WOODWARD. Allow me to correct the gentleman as to the form of my expression. My recollection is that my remark was that it was "an indecent exercise of legislative power."

Mr. MAYNARD. So I understood the gentleman to say. Now, if any gentleman considers himself justified in assuming to lecture Congress upon questions of decency, why, sir, I shall not quarrel with him. But I submit to the consideration of gentlemen, if we are to engage in inquiries of this sort, whether the indecency is not in the judicial branch of the Government seeking to transcend its legitimate sphere, and to enter into the domain of the political branch of the Government, and to attempt the decision of political questions. With my ideas of decency and propriety, so long as I am connected with either of the branches of the political department of this Government, I will use every means in my power, will cast every vote I can, to take away every jurisdiction or subject of jurisdiction that would authorize the judicial tribunals of the country to pass beyond their legitimate sphere and attempt the decision of purely political questions.

Mr. WOODWARD. I know the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] alluded to it, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] again alludes to it. But I confess I do not understand what they mean when they charge the Supreme Court with having gone beyond its jurisdiction. The gentleman read from a newspaper criticism on the Supreme Court.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Who did that?

Mr. WOODWARD. I do not know that the gentleman read from a newspaper, but he cited a newspaper—

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I did not.

Mr. WOODWARD. Certainly you did.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I referred to a newspaper criticism of the Supreme Court?

Mr. WOODWARD. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. No, sir.

Mr. WOODWARD. I understood you to do so.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I referred to the constant assertions of the newspapers representing the party to which the gentleman belongs, in which we were informed, day by day, and week by week, that a majority of the Supreme Court had determined to use the McCordle case for the purpose of annulling, by declaring them unconstitutional, all the reconstruction laws of Congress.

Mr. WOODWARD. Then I was entirely right in what I was saying. The gentleman did charge, upon the authority of newspapers—

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman will pardon me, and remember that the McCordle case was introduced into this discussion by himself.

Mr. WOODWARD. I made an inquiry of the gentleman in regard to the McCordle case; but the point I am now upon is this—

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Excuse me; but I do not intend to get too far away from the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BOYER.]

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman allow me to conclude what I was saying?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Very well.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will simply observe that his pendens is the highest notice. Surely the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] has not been here listening to what was going on in that high tribunal without knowing, just as well as he knows any fact, from the line of argument of counsel, to say nothing about what has appeared in the newspapers, that this McCordle case was brought up for no purpose in the world except to test and settle political questions. It is a political suit; that and nothing else, and brought for that purpose alone. And decency and propriety, according to my ideas, require that we should, by our legislation, put an end to that suit and save the court from further annoyance or further occasion to engage in any discussion, or to make any decision of that kind.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to notice very briefly the last remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BOYER,] and I do not intend that that gentleman shall escape from his responsibility as a member of this House by any specious plea such as he has put in here to-day and on last Saturday.

Mr. BOYER. The gentleman will find that there is no design on this side to escape from responsibility.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman will pardon me; he has had his say, and I prefer not to be interrupted just now.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania was in his seat; he heard that amendment read. It took some time to read it. The gentleman was not deprived of an opportunity of making an inquiry. He did not even attempt to do so. He sat in his seat dumb. Now, will he say that after that bill was introduced he understood by the rules of the House that I could not offer an amendment? Will he say that he did not hear the amendment read? If he knew that I might offer the amendment, why did he not object to the bill? If he heard the amendment read, why did he not, at least, make some attempt to get some explanation of it?

Mr. BOYER. Because there was no time.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman did not even rise in his seat and attempt to object.

Mr. BOYER. And because the measure was introduced in such a way as to disarm suspicion.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Disarm suspicion! Were the gentleman's ears closed while the amendment was being read?

Mr. BOYER. The gentleman asks me a question and I will answer it. I am sometimes, like the gentleman from Iowa, engaged in other matters than attending to the reading of bills which are presented, especially when the nature of the bill has been explained to me, and when by that explanation it appears perfectly harmless.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The amendment had not been explained to him, but it was read in his hearing, while he was sitting in his place as a Representative of the people. It was understood by other members on that side of the House, for they have so stated in their places.

Mr. BOYER. Will the gentleman say that the amendment upon its face explains its full nature and effect?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman say that any law upon its face explains its full nature and all of its effects?

Mr. BOYER. Yes, sir; I do say that some laws do that.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Are all amendments to be so drawn that by the mere reading of them members shall understand their entire scope and bearing?

Mr. BOYER. As an example of what I said, I may remark that the bill to which this amendment was attached does explain itself; its whole nature and effect are apparent upon its face.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If the gentleman would not listen to the reading of the amendment what right had I to expect that he would listen to an explanation? The gentleman sat there while that bill was being read, and after it was read the amendment was also read at the Clerk's desk, yet, as I have stated, the gentleman did not even attempt to interpose an objection or an inquiry. Now, sir, it was fair for me to presume from the terms of my amendment that any gentleman could understand the general scope of its provisions.

Mr. BOYER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. BOYER. I desire to ask the gentleman this question: if the nature and effect of this proposition were so obvious that any one could read them upon its face, why have so many gentlemen upon the majority side of the House boasted of the proceeding since as a most excellent trick on their part to entrap the minority?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do not know that any gentleman has made any such boast, though it may have been so. If gentlemen on this side have made a boast of that kind, it may have been founded on the seeming dullness of the gentleman from Pennsylvania in not understanding the amendment when it was read by the Clerk.

Mr. BOYER. Or, perhaps, upon the seeming candor of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman from Iowa said nothing on the subject at all.

Mr. WOOD. Will the gentleman from Iowa permit me to say a few words?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. How long does the gentleman want?

Mr. WOOD. One or two minutes.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Oh, yes; I will yield the gentleman three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa has but three minutes remaining.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Then I yield to the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. WOOD. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Iowa and of the House to this fact, that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means occupies a very peculiar position in this House.

He has charge of revenue matters. He has charge of what we term the legislation of the House, and when he rises in his place to call from the Speaker's table an ordinary revenue bill apparently it is almost always the case he receives the unanimous consent; but it is not always the case, after a bill has been introduced by unanimous consent, an amendment is attached to it, which could not have got in under other circumstances, which refers entirely to another subject, and which, as an original proposition, would lead to a great deal of opposition and debate.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Both referred to the same subject.

Mr. WOOD. One word further. Mr. Speaker, I think our side of the House is not entirely blameless in this matter. When it occurred I was in the library reading; but when it did occur I think the old members who sat here on our side are censurable for the neglect they showed on that occasion.

Now, to show how the gentleman's own political friends view this subject—to show it is not Democrats alone who look upon this procedure with marked disfavor—I desire to send to the Clerk's desk to have read an article from the New York Times, a Republican paper, edited by Henry J. Raymond.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I cannot yield for that purpose.

Mr. WOOD. I have not exhausted my two minutes.

Mr. NIBLACK. Let it be read. We will extend the time of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Then I yield.

Mr. WOOD. It is Republican authority.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Congress and the Supreme Court—Sharp Practice.— We see nothing very adroit, and certainly nothing very creditable, in the hurried passage of a bill nominally relating to appeals in internal revenue cases, but really designed to remove the McCordle case and all similar cases from the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. In its original shape, as introduced by Mr. TRUMBULL, the proposition would have encountered strenuous opposition. It was considered, very justly, a dangerous interference with the authority of the court and a disingenuous attempt to evade judicial criticism of the constitutionality of the reconstruction acts; and, though opposition would probably have been futile, it would unquestionably have served to give prominence to the real nature of the proceeding, the purpose of its authors, and its effect upon a coordinate authority in the Government. On Thursday, however, a bill was brought up in the House which on its face bore no evidence of importance. It seemed to be no more than a measure required to relieve collectors of internal revenue from annoyance; and so it professed to be. Taking advantage of the absence of Democratic members, and without affording the slightest clue to its object and scope, an amendment was added repealing so much of a certain act as provides for an appeal in habeas corpus cases from the circuit court to the United States Supreme Court. No opposition was offered because nobody not in the secret understood the game, and the bill, as amended, passed at once. It was carried to the Senate, where it slipped through with equal celerity. Not until it had escaped the legislative ordeal was its import understood or its effect upon the case now undergoing argument in the court.

If the only interests involved were those of party, we might smile at the dexterity with which the Democratic members and Senators were outwitted. And if in legislation that passes for dexterous strategy which in ordinary life would be denounced as trickery or fraud, we might set down the Democrats as dull-witted fellows, whom their sharper associates are privileged to out-manuever. But the proceeding has more than a personal or partisan significance. A trick it is, and as a trick it will be remembered, but it is a trick by which Congress is enabled to forestall the action of the Supreme Court, and prevent an adverse decision on the merits of reconstruction by limiting the jurisdiction of the court. Unless the court refuses to be so restrained, and thus comes into direct collision with Congress, all chance of obtaining a judgement is destroyed. Whether the reconstruction law is constitutional or otherwise is no longer a matter of moment to sufferers from its provisions. They are denied the privilege of testing the validity of the law by a proceeding which is virtually retroactive, and which renders the administration of justice subordinate to partisan ends.

The shamelessness with which the thing is done suggests a humiliating commentary upon the temper of Congress and the effect of its legislation upon the most cherished institutions of the country. In better days changes affecting the judiciary were discussed calmly, carefully, and with no immediate reference to their effect upon parties. They were, in fact, discussed and settled on their merits. Now, we have a measure arresting justice in its course, forcing out of court a case rightfully there, awaiting argument and judgment, and forbidding the recognition of cases affecting the constitutionality of statutes under which the States are to be brought into the Union; and this measure not subjected to examination, not debated or explained, not understood or even known, but hurried through both Chambers almost with the quickness of lightning, and for a purpose of which the ruling party are ashamed.

The SPEAKER. The hour of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. NIBLACK. I move that the gentleman's time be extended.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. There are two or three unfortunate features about that, so far as the other side of the House is concerned. In the first place, the gentleman presents it as a Republican authority.

Mr. WOOD. Henry J. Raymond, of the New York Times.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I read the article some days ago. I do not know any member on this side of the House who would acknowledge the New York Times as a Republican paper. It opposes more Republican measures than it supports.

Mr. WOOD. We do not acknowledge it as a Democratic paper.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Then it must stand between us. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. All the more reason for believing it is impartial.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It seems so. It gives as much attention to that side as it does to this, but it did not understand the facts.

If members on the other side of the House were absent we could not wait for their return; if compelled to await their presence they might stop all legislation. Therefore I submit that the authority he has presented is very much against him and his friends. Why was not the gentleman here attending to his public duties?

Mr. WOOD. I did not suspect a trick.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I have given the reason why I was absent.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman says he did not suspect a trick. What right had he to be absent, even though he did not suspect a trick? His constituents expect him to attend to their business and the affairs of the country in the House. Instead of that he absents himself from the House and neglects his public duties. His constituents have a right to find fault with him if he absents himself in this way. [Laughter.]

Mr. WOOD. I never will give my consent hereafter to anything, not even when courtesy would seem to demand it.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman loses his temper. [Laughter.] If he will only continue that practice of neglecting and betraying his constituents he will not need to consent to anything. If, however, he shall discharge his duty by remaining here he will have an opportunity, as he might have had when this bill was taken from the Speaker's table, to make objection.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I think the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] made quite as severe a confession in the opening of his remarks as the lecture of the gentleman from Iowa. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I think he deserves both. [Laughter.]

Mr. WOOD. You have not answered that article in the New York Times.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Oh, no; the gentleman himself will not indorse that because it strikes his friends quite as much as it does any one on this side. Let the Times scold.

Again, the bill went to the Senate. Were all the Democratic Senators absent? Why was it not challenged there? Why did not some of the gentlemen who, like the gentleman from New York were absent, after returning to the Hall and ascertaining the nature of this amendment inform some Democratic Senators of this "trick" which had been perpetrated in their absence from their seats? If that had been done there might have been a full discussion in the Senate, for there there is no limit to debate except that of physical endurance. But, instead of its being arrested in its passage there, Senators were as dumb and perhaps as absent as members of the House.

But before the roll-call was finally completed on the passage of the bill in the Senate, the vote being taken by yeas and nays, we find that there were a number of Democratic Senators present. Now, their attention must have been called to that amendment, otherwise they would not have demanded the yeas and nays. Where a matter is not deemed important they do not call the yeas and nays on its passage; but Democratic Senators present deemed this so important that, having at their disposition unlimited time for discussion, they merely demanded the yeas and nays on the passage and all the Democrats voted against it. Why? It must have been because they understood it. We certainly will not charge them with voting against a thing they did not understand. That would be quite as unfair as it would be to charge the gentleman from New York, who was absent on this occasion, with being absent all the time. Therefore I will not make any charge against the Senators any more than against the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BOYER. I would inform the gentleman that I believe there was opposition made to it in the Senate, so far, at all events, as to inquire in reference to the nature of it, but no explanation was given. The vote was immediately afterward taken, and I believe the yeas and nays were called on the passage of the bill by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCKALEW.]

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do not know for what purpose that explanation is interpolated. Is it for the purpose of showing that Democratic Senators were quite as unable to understand that amendment when it was adopted as members of this House were when it was being read? [Laughter.] Or is it for the purpose of showing that they, too, disregarded the interests of the people, their constituents, and had abandoned attention to public affairs?

Mr. BOYER. If it will do the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] any good I will confess, for my own part, that the members of the minority of this House were not as attentive as the proceedings in the particular matter we are discussing show they ought to have been; and I will say further to the gentleman that he may be assured that it is not necessary for him further to lecture the members of the minority upon that point.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Then I will desist.

Mr. BOYER. The lesson he and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] have taught us will not be lost either upon us or upon the country.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That is to say, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BOYER] will hereafter be more attentive to his public duties than he was on that occasion.

Mr. BOYER. And less confiding.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. But I must interpose a defense for some members on that side of the House, and particularly the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NIBLACK,] who is always attentive to his duties, and that is that he neither deserves a lecture on this occasion nor needs any defense from the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BOYER.] The gentleman from Indiana has stated in his own behalf that he understood the nature of the amendment, and yet he did not think it was necessary to consume the time of the House in opposing it. Mr. Speaker, I have done.

TREATY-MAKING POWER—THE PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I take this occasion to say to the House that I will at the earliest time, when it may be in order, submit for consideration the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire and report whether public lands sold under treaties with Indian tribes are held by a valid title, and whether such lands can be sold except in pursuance of a law duly enacted by Congress.

And I will present now very briefly some of the reasons in support of the resolution, so that the House may know in advance the grounds upon which I will ask its adoption. The ample discussions in Congress on the subject of the public lands have demonstrated the wisdom, the justice, and the expediency of so disposing of them as to secure their sale to actual settlers. Notwithstanding this there have been, and yet are, many and plausible pretexts for disposing of the public lands so as to place them in large tracts in the hands of monopolists and speculators, who grow rich at the expense of the toiling millions, and impoverish the agricultural classes by the exorbitant prices demanded and received when the lands are sold.

Among the modes more recently adopted of disposing of the public lands in this unjust and ruinous mode is that of selling them by virtue of treaty stipulations with Indian tribes, and without any act of Congress to authorize it.

I have procured from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs a table, as follows:

Sent to Secretary of Interior with report February 28, 1868.

(See House Ex. Doc. No. 85, second session Fortieth Congress, relative to Indian lands in Kansas; speeches of Mr. JULIAN in House of Representatives, January 22 and 28 and February 4 and March 6, 1868.)

It is a fact which should not be overlooked that the treaty made October 1, 1859, ratified July 9, 1860, between the United States and the confederated tribes of Sacs and Foxes of the Mississippi, and under which more lands were sold than under any other, has never been published with the volumes of public laws, and was, therefore, comparatively unknown to the people.

Now, sir, if the public lands of the United States occupied by Indian tribes can be sold in pursuance of treaties like this, without consulting the law-making power of the Government, it is high time it should be known, in order that some proper remedy may be applied. This nation has never admitted that any Indian tribe ever had any title to the lands in their occupancy, and consequently no power of sale was ever conceded to them. No tribe ever could make a treaty with or sell the lands in their occupancy to any foreign nation, or even to private citizens of the United States. The writers on public law all agree as to this, and no citation of authorities is necessary. These treaties under which sales have been made to private individuals assert the novel, dangerous, and, as it seems to me, unwarranted right to divest the title of the United States simply by the authority of the President and Senate. I deny that there exists in this Government any such power as is asserted in these treaties, and I will at the proper time introduce the resolution just submitted, in order that the subject of which it treats may be considered and that this House may assert its rights over the public lands.

The treaty-making power is not defined by the Constitution. It is treated as a power already known, defined, and recognized, and limitations are thrown around it by the Constitution. Subject to these limitations it is as ample as was the treaty-making power in England when the Constitution was adopted. There "the sovereign power quo ad hoc is vested in the king. Whatever contracts he engages in no other power in the kingdom can legally delay, resist, or annul." (1 Blackstone, 267.) And Blackstone says that ministers are impeachable if from criminal motives they advise an improper treaty. In this country the power is limited as to the authority to make treaties by devolving it on the President and Senate. But all treaties are declared to be the supreme law. It has been maintained, therefore, with great force, that the treaty-making power is competent to execute itself even by the appropriation of money from the Treasury—that such appropriation is a law within article one, section eight, clause twelve, of the Constitution. It was so declared—

"By William Pinckney, of Maryland, in 1816, in the House of Representatives, and supported by one of his most elaborate and able speeches. The speech may be found in Williston's 'Eloquence of the United States,' vol. 3, page 231."—1 Cranch, 103; 1 Wash. C. C. R. 322; 1 Paine, 65.

The action of the Government, however, has been different from this from Jay's treaty to this hour. And it has been said:

"The discussion of the appropriation for that treaty was an undisputed admission of the right of the House to act. The occasion was worth the error, for it gave birth to that magnificent oration of Fisher Ames, which, in honor of American literature, will be read in future ages in company with the oration of Demosthenes for the crown."

But as the Constitution, in article one, commits the whole subject of raising revenue to Congress, a treaty requiring the payment of money to execute it cannot of its own force be carried into effect so far as the payment is concerned, unless, indeed, money shall be found in the Treasury unappropriated by act of Congress or shall so come in. (Paschal's Annotated Constitution, 175; 2 Peters, 314; 3 Dallas, 276; Story on Constitution, sec. 1508; 4 Hall's Law Journal, 461; 6 Wheat., 161; 1 Kent, 165, 284; Spalding's speech, House of Representatives, December 19, 1867.)

A treaty with an Indian tribe cannot dispose of public lands, and the reason is plain. I have already remarked that the title to the public domain within the boundaries of the United States, though there be an occupancy by Indians, is nevertheless in the Government. The Indians never did and never could have any title but only a right of occupancy. (Johnson vs. McIntosh, 8 Wheat., 543; Clark vs. Smith, 13 Peters, 195.)

And the power to dispose of the public lands is expressly reserved to Congress by the Constitution. (Art. 4, sec. 3, clause 2; United States vs. Rogers, 4 Howard, 567; American Insurance Company vs. Cauter, 1 Peters, 542; 19 Howard, 395, 633.)

A power which is reserved to Congress exclusively cannot be exercised under any authority purporting to be conferred by treaty.

The authorities which explain and illustrate the treaty-making power have been collected by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Butler,] and I present them, so that they may be before the House for the proper understanding of the land titles purporting to have been created under treaties with the Indian tribes.

The treaty-making power was discussed in the national convention which framed the Constitution in 1787, as follows: May 29, 5 Eliot's Debates, 127, 181; June 13, ibid., 190; June 15, ibid., 192; June 18, ibid., 209; June 20, ibid., 245; July 17, ibid., 322, 375; August 6, ibid., 379; August 7, ibid., 382, 383; August 15, ibid., 427, 428, 467, 469, 470; August 25, ibid., 478; August 27, ibid., 483; September 4, ibid., 607; September 7, ibid., 622, 623, 624; September 8, ibid.

It was discussed in the Virginia convention, June 18, 1788. (3 Eliot's Debates, 496, 514, 516, 660.)

It was said by Mr. Madison that "if the President got up a treaty by surprise he would be impeached."

It was discussed in the North Carolina convention, July 28, 1788, (3 Eliot, 115, 132, 245;) in Maryland, (2 Eliot, 553;) in the Federalist, Nos. 21 and 63, (Dawson's Fed., 147, 148;) in the debates on Jay's Treaty, March 2, 1796; March 7, March 24; 1 Benton's Abridgment, 642, 643, 644, 645, 646, 648, 651, 671, 677, 678, 679, 680; March 25, President's Message; March 30, 1 Benton's Abridgment, 692, 693; March 31, 1796, 1 Benton, 692, 693, 696; April 6, 1796, 1 Benton, 696, 698, 699, 700, 701, 702.

Mr. Speaker, the objection to these Indian treaties is twofold; first, as to the asserted power to dispose of the public lands; and second, the fact that lands have been sold in large tracts, thus creating vast monopolies and subverting the homestead policy of the Government. And while upon this subject I desire to say, as I have often before said, that land monopoly is a great, and, I fear, a growing evil. Let me state some facts to prove this.

The Government, since its organization, has sold lands amounting to over 154,000,000 acres.

Of the lands sold, there remain in private hands, not reduced to occupancy as farms, over 30,000,000 acres.

The Government grants of lands to western and southern States, to aid in constructing railroads, amount to over 57,000,000 acres.

The grants to aid in the construction of canals amount to over 17,000,000 acres.

The grants to different lines of Pacific railroad companies, 124,000,000 acres.

The amount of land granted and to be granted to the States under the act of Congress of July 2, 1862, to aid in the establishment of agricultural colleges, reaches (Laws of 1862, p. 504) 9,600,000 acres.

The lands granted to the States under different acts of Congress as "swamp and overflowed lands," amount to 43,000,000 acres. (See JULIAN's speech, House of Representatives, March 6, 1868.)

This subject is further illustrated by letters which I have received from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
GENERAL LAND OFFICE, February 6, 1868.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your letter of this date, and in reply have to refer you to the Indian office for the information therein requested as to the lands in Indian reservations sold to individuals or companies within the last three years. In answer to your second inquiry I have to state that the selections in place for agricultural colleges under the act of July 2, 1862, amounted on the 30th June, 1867, to one million one hundred and fifty-nine thousand four hundred and ninety-nine acres, and the scrip issued under the same law to non-public-land-holding States, amounts to five million three hundred and forty thousand acres, which is exclusive of two hundred and seventy thousand acres issued to North Carolina, and the location thereof prohibited under the joint resolution of March 29, 1867.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
JOS. S. WILSON, Commissioner.

Hon. WILLIAM LAWRENCE, House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
GENERAL LAND OFFICE, February 8, 1868.

SIR: I had the honor this morning to receive your letter dated the 9th instant, and in reply to your first and second inquiries have to state that the quantity of land inuring under grants by act of Congress for railroad purposes is estimated at 181,588,581 acres, exclusive of 3,225,413 acres granted for wagon roads, and up to the 30th of June last there were certified to the proper beneficiaries a fraction over twenty-one millions. (See Annual Report of October 15, 1867.)

In reply to your third inquiry I have to state that the quantity of public land which remained unsold and unappropriated in the States and Territories on the 30th of June last, including 399,529,600 acres, as the area of the American purchase from Russia, was.....1,414,567,574 acres.

The area surveyed on the 30th June, 1867, was.....485,311,778 acres.

Of the aforesaid surveyed area the area undisposed of was.....64,880,952 acres.

I have no data for forming a judgment of the probable amount of arable land not surveyed.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
JOS. S. WILSON, Commissioner.

Hon. WILLIAM LAWRENCE, House of Representatives.

It was to remedy some of the evils of land monopoly that I deemed it my duty, on the 20th of January, to introduce a bill which is now pending, as follows:

A bill to secure to actual settlers the right to purchase lands hereafter granted to railway and other companies.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all lands which may hereafter be granted to railway or other companies to aid in the construction of railways or other works, whether under existing law or laws hereafter enacted, shall be sold by such grantees only to actual settlers in quantities not greater than one half section to any one person, and at a price not exceeding $1 25 per acre, with interest at six per cent. per annum from the date of the grant to such company; and the Secretary of the Interior shall have power to prescribe rules and regulations for carrying this act into effect; and no person shall be deemed an actual settler who does not furnish evidence in such form as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, that it is his or her intention to enter upon, improve, and reside upon the lands he or she may purchase as and for a homestead.

The Committee on Public Lands subsequently reported a bill designed to remedy the same evils, which is as follows:

A bill to regulate the disposition of lands that may be hereafter granted to aid in the construction of railways.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all lands which may hereafter be granted to aid in the construction of railways shall, unless otherwise expressly provided in the act granting the same, be sold by the State or Territory to which said grant is made to actual settlers, in quantities no greater than one quarter section to any one person, and at a price to be fixed by the company which shall build the road, not exceeding $250 per acre, and the amount received for the said land shall be paid by the State or Territory to the company constructing said road, after deducting all the expense incurred by the State or Territory in making such sales. And all sales so made shall be made upon the following terms, namely: one fourth of the amount thereof shall be paid in cash at the time of purchase, and the balance thereof shall be paid by the settler in three annual installments, with interest not to exceed seven per cent. per annum, until paid. And the Secretary of the Interior shall have power to prescribe rules and regulations for carrying this act into effect; and no person shall be deemed an actual settler who does not furnish evidence, in such form as the Governor of a State or Territory may prescribe, that it is his or her intention to enter upon, improve, and reside upon the lands he or she may purchase: Provided further, That any alternate even-numbered sections along the line of any railway, which have not been sold or entered upon by actual settlers within ten years from and after the survey and location of said railway, shall be disposed of on the same terms as other public lands of the United States.

As these bills relate to a kindred subject and are yet pending I have deemed it proper to present them here, and I hope they and the facts I have stated may be of some service in illustrating the policy pursued as to the public lands and the resolution which I have submitted.

This subject has attracted the attention of the public in many forms.

The Republican State convention in Indiana, on the 20th February, 1868, adopted a platform of principles, which declares:

"Eighth. The public lands are the property of the people. Monopolies of them either by individuals or corporations should be prohibited. They should be reserved for actual settlers, and as a substantial recognition of the services of the Union officers and soldiers in the late civil war, they should each be allowed one hundred and sixty acres thereof."

I hope the resolution when it shall be offered may receive the sanction of the House.

The SPEAKER. According to general consent given to-day, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORHEAD] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 122) for the relief of the heirs of Major A. L. Brewer, late a paymaster in the United States Army.

DAMAGES TO STEAMER MONITOR IN JAPAN.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 123, reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which I think there will be no objection.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (S. R. No. 123) authorizing the Secretary of State to adjust certain claims, and directing the payment thereof, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of State to ascertain and allow the damages which ought to be paid to the owners of the steamer Monitor, or Fee Pang, their representatives or assigns, for the injuries sustained from being fired into by the batteries of the Daimio of Nagato, in July, 1864, and the sum allowed by the Secretary of State, together with the expenses attending the ascertainment thereof, is to be paid out of the moneys received for indemnities from the Government of Japan.

It also proposes to authorize the Secretary of State to appoint a commissioner, or commissioners, as may be necessary, to take testimony in Japan, or elsewhere, in relation to such damages, and report the same to him; and any consular or diplomatic officer who may be so appointed is to be entitled to a reasonable compensation, to be allowed by the Secretary of State, in addition to his official salary or emoluments.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is there a report accompanying the joint resolution?

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is a statement of the facts. I will state them briefly to the Senator and the Senate to save time. The difficulties out of which this present fund grew arose from the firing upon this vessel, the Monitor, a private vessel, by this Daimio. Afterward one of our national vessels went there, I believe, and she was fired upon. When the several Powers came to demand payment for injuries done the demand was, I believe, for $3,000,000 for all of them, which was pretty high, and a proposition was made at the same time that we should take instead another port, a particular port that was wanted for the benefit of commerce; but, to their surprise, the Government of Japan chose to pay the money. Our proportion of it is about eight hundred thousand dollars, and there is nothing to which to appropriate it in fact. The injury done to this vessel would not exceed twenty or thirty thousand dollars. The injury to our national vessel was very slight. The report of the fact shows that this was the only vessel that was injured.

Mr. JOHNSON. The money is paid into the Treasury?

Mr. FESSENDEN. A part of the money is already paid.

Mr. JOHNSON. In gold?

Mr. FESSENDEN. In gold; and properly the damages sustained by our citizens should first be paid out of the fund. It is recommended by the Secretary of State, and the joint resolution was drawn by him.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not know anything about the case of the Monitor to which this resolution refers, and for which it is proposed to provide; but it was not in connection with the attack on the ship Monitor that the American national vessel was afterward fired upon; but in connection with the attack by the ships and forts under the direction of one of the local princes of Japan upon the American steamer Pembroke, which was an unarmed trading vessel, and it was after that attack that the United States steamer Wyoming, under Commander McDougall, was fired upon, and attacked those vessels and forts. It was out of that attack, and the further attack made by the French and English ships upon the Japanese forts, that this money was paid to us. But it is not, I think, correct that the treaty made and growing out of those disturbances did not open other ports to us. I think it did result in the opening of other ports.

Mr. GRIMES. Osaka.

Mr. CONNESS. Yes, sir; and Hiogo, and three or four different ports, and the payment of a sum between seven and eight hundred thousand dollars indemnity to the United States.

That money is in the Treasury, but not appropriated to any purpose nor disposed of, and this resolution provides:

That the Secretary of State be, and hereby is, directed to ascertain and allow the damages which ought to be paid to the owners of the steamer Monitor or Fee Pang, their representatives or assigns, for the injuries sustained from being fired into by the batteries of the Daimio of Nagato, in July, 1864, and that the sum allowed by the Secretary of State, together with the expenses attending the ascertainment thereof, be paid out of the moneys received for indemnities from the Government of Japan.

Now, it appears to me that at best this is a very partial disposition of this case, and that any step we should take in the way of a commission for the ascertainment of damages done to American ships should include all that was done. Therefore I hope that this resolution at present will be laid over until we further inquire into the matter.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour has arrived when, by the eleventh rule relative to proceedings in the trial of impeachments, all legislative business must cease and the House be notified by the Secretary that the Senate is ready to proceed upon the impeachment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I understand that we adjourned the trial until one o'clock to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At twelve o'clock and thirty minutes all legislative business must cease, according to the eleventh rule of proceeding.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I suppose that that rule was changed by the order of the Senate which directed these proceedings to commence at one o'clock to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I am not aware that the rule is changed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I suppose the order of the Senate will change it. That is my understanding.

Mr. HOWARD. It becomes now the duty of the Secretary of the Senate to inform the House of Representatives that the Senate are ready to receive the managers on the part of the House. It will require about half an hour to do that, and to put things in order to proceed upon the impeachment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I call for the reading of the resolution adopted by the Senate at the last meeting.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The eleventh rule will be read.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Not the rule, the resolution adopted by the Senate.

The Secretary read from the Journal of the proceedings of the Senate sitting on the trial of impeachment of March 13, 1868:

"On motion by Mr. HOWARD, the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment of the President upon articles of impeachment adjourned to the 23d day of March instant, at one o'clock p. m."

Mr. TRUMBULL. I so understood; and the rule I understand only to apply to the first day. I will ask that the rule may now be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The Secretary read rule eleven, as follows:

"11. At twelve o'clock and thirty minutes afternoon of the day appointed for the trial of an impeachment the legislative and executive business of the Senate shall be suspended, and the Secretary shall give notice to the House of Representatives that the Senate is ready to proceed upon the impeachment of ——— in the Senate Chamber, which Chamber is prepared with accommodations for the reception of the House of Representatives."

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will now ask the Secretary to read the next rule.

The Secretary proceeded to read rule twelve, as follows:

"12. The hour of the day at which the Senate shall sit upon the trial of an impeachment shall be (unless otherwise ordered) twelve o'clock m.; and when the hour for such sitting shall arrive the Presiding Officer shall so announce."

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is enough. That hour has not yet arrived.

"The hour of the day at which the Senate shall sit upon the trial of an impeachment shall be (unless otherwise ordered) twelve o'clock m.; and when the hour for such sitting shall arrive the Presiding Officer of the Senate." &c.

The hour was otherwise ordered; it was by our last adjournment made one o'clock, and that hour has not yet arrived. I know it is not a matter of any great importance, but my understanding was that the adjournment was until one o'clock; and I think that is the rule.

Mr. CONKLING. I take it this is a mere question of dispatch in the transaction of business. It will be remembered that on the last day when the subject of impeachment was under consideration, after the hour had arrived, a good deal of delay took place and a good deal of confusion was caused; first, by the managers of the House coming with those attending them; and subsequently, after the proceedings had commenced, by the body of the House coming with the Speaker and chairman of the Committee of the Whole, and so on. It had occurred to me that if, under the rule, the Chair should make the announcement which he has already made, and then the interval should be occupied in having the House come here, as the whole House is to come, and find their seats, and have the whole Chamber tranquil and in order by one o'clock, we should gain just that much in the proceedings of the day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think an examination of the rules will settle this question without any difficulty. The ninth rule provides that at half past twelve o'clock "of the day appointed for the return of the summons" the Senate shall proceed to the trial of the impeachment, the Presiding Officer vacating the chair and the Chief Justice taking it. That day was the last day on which we sat—the day for the return of the summons. Then the eleventh rule provides that "at twelve o'clock and thirty minutes after noon of the day appointed for the trial," &c. Now, the question is, under that rule, whether this is the day appointed for the trial. The action of the Senate on that cause subsequently shows to me that it is not the day appointed for the trial, but it is the day appointed for the filing of the answer, with a provision that after that a replication may be put in by the managers on the part of the House of Representatives, upon which the trial shall proceed. So that, coming down to the time when the trial really begins by the appointment of the Senate, it is entirely in the power of the Senate, independent of the rules, because the rules do not provide for it, to fix from time to time to what period it will postpone the proceedings. Acting under that, my friend from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] submitted the order the week before last that this proceeding should stand adjourned over until one o'clock to-day. I therefore respectfully submit to the Chair that that order of the Senate adjourning the proceeding until one o'clock to day is not in opposition to any of the rules, but is in accordance with them, because it speaks upon a topic for which the rules have not yet provided.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This is a question of the true construction of the rules, and it ought to be understood. The Chair will refer the question to the Senate.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the Chair will decide it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has decided what seems to him to be the meaning of the rule.

Mr. CONNESS. Then let that stand.

Mr. SUMNER and Mr. HOWARD. Nobody appeals.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the rule is to stand according to the decision of the Chair, the Secretary will inform the House of Representatives that the Senate is now ready to receive the managers of the House of Representatives for the purpose of proceeding with the impeachment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I appeal from the decision of the Chair in order to bring the matter before the Senate; and for this reason: if the Chair will permit me to state, as an appeal is subject to debate; not that it is of any practical consequence except that it involves us in this extraordinary position: that the announcement is made to the House of Representatives that the Senate is ready, under that rule, to proceed upon the impeachment, when, in point of fact, it is not ready, because the Chief Justice is not in the chair, and no step upon the trial can be taken, either of receiving managers or anything else, now that the body is organized, without the presence of the Chief Justice. At least, it would seem very extraordinary, indeed.

I only wish to submit a word more. As I have said, this appeal is not taken in any spirit of opposition to the decision of the Chair, but to avoid what would appear to me to be an impropriety. The Senate when it sat upon this trial last ordered that this proceeding should stand over until one o'clock to-day. Now, can anything be done in this proceeding until one o'clock arrives? If the Senate, by its order, violated its own rules, it was a question of order then whether the rule should be permitted to be set aside; and inasmuch as we all know that that order passed by unanimous consent, without any opposition, the fact that it was in violation of the rule would make no difference; it would stand as the order of the Senate; and any objection to its standing in opposition to this rule should have been made then, when it could have been considered, when the Senator from Michigan submitted his order for the adjournment of the proceedings. It is for that reason that the introduction of the managers and the statement to the House of Representatives that we are ready to proceed upon this half an hour before the time when the Chief Justice can take the chair would be an impropriety which, I think, we ought not to enter upon, that I appeal from the decision of the Chair, with all respect, in order to bring it before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I confess I do not like the shape that this is assuming, of an appeal from the decision of the Chair. When I made the suggestion I supposed that the Chair had, inadvertently, looking at one rule, supposed that at half past twelve o'clock the time had arrived without, perhaps, knowing or remembering that we had adjourned to one o'clock; and it seemed to me it might confuse matters. I do not think there is any considerable importance in it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was of opinion that all legislative business was to be suspended at twelve o'clock and thirty minutes, because the rule said so.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is such a rule; but the Senate having adjourned until one o'clock it would seem as if we could do no business until that hour, and I supposed that the Chair, on having his attention called to it, would probably reconsider the matter. But I do not think there is importance enough in it to have an appeal from the Chair, and I hope my friend from Vermont will withdraw the appeal and let the case stand as it is. I do not think there is any importance in it. It will be one o'clock by the time we get ready.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is desirous that the Senate should settle the question. That is all the Chair cares about it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Inasmuch as I have got inveigled into this discussion in support of my friend from Illinois, and he wishes me to retire, I will do so. I withdraw the appeal. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the Secretary will inform the House of Representatives that the Senate is ready to receive the managers and the House preparatory to the trial of the impeachment.

The Secretary accordingly proceeded to notify the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, at one o'clock, said: According to the order of the Senate the chair will be now vacated, that the Senate may be presided over by the Chief Justice of the United States for the trial of the impeachment.

At one o'clock the Chief Justice took the chair, and the Senate was engaged in the consideration of the impeachment case till four o'clock and forty minutes p. m., when, the Chief Justice having retired, the President pro tempore resumed the chair.

On motion of Mr. CONKLING, the Senate adjourned.

Resolved, That in the judgment of this House it is equally just to the holders of public securities and to the people of the United States that the bonds issued by the Government should be paid in the lawful money of the United States on the basis on which the public debt was contracted, and that said bonds, except where by law expressly payable in coin, should be paid as the same shall from time to time mature and the public resources shall permit, in lawful money of the United States, commonly known as United States notes.

Mr. BLAINE. I hope the demand for the previous question will not be seconded.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the resolution will be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. BLAINE. Let it go where all like resolutions go.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Resolved, That the room now occupied by the engrossing clerks be assigned to the use of the Committee on Appropriations, and the room at present occupied by that committee be assigned to the engrossing clerks until a better and a permanent arrangement can be made.

Mr. BLAINE proposed the following as an amendment, but, objection being made by several members, subsequently withdrew it:

Resolved further, That the architect of the Capitol be requested to furnish this House without delay with an estimate of the expense and practicability of converting the old Hall of Representatives into committee-rooms for the use of the committees of the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded the previous question on his resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REMOVAL OF JAMES B. STEADMAN.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMPENSATION TO COMMITTEE CLERKS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, offered the following resolution, and demanded the previous question thereon:

Resolved, That the resolution of the House passed March the 3d instant, in the following words:

Resolved, That the clerks to committees in the House of Representatives shall receive the same additional compensation as the other employes of the House; shall be so construed as to increase the compensation of those committee clerks now receiving four dollars per day twenty per cent.; and the Clerk of the House of Representatives is hereby authorized to pay them at the rate of $480 per day during the sessions of the Fortieth Congress.

The previous question was not seconded; and Mr. ROSS rising to debate the resolution, it went over.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, notified the House that the Senate had ordered that the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill of the House (H. R. No. 658) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1869, and for other purposes, passed by the Senate on the 21st instant with amendments and sent to the House for its concurrence in said amendments.

By unanimous consent, it was ordered that the bill be returned to the Senate.

ADDITIONAL COMPENSATION.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, also offered a joint resolution (H. R. No. 245) giving additional compensation to certain employes in the civil service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let it be reported.

The joint resolution was accordingly read in full. It provides that there be paid for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1868, to the several clerks, messengers, laborers, and other employes in the several Executive Departments in the city of Washington, (excepting those female employes whose pay has been raised to $900 per annum, under the act of July 23, 1866,) and to the photographer and assistant photographer of the Treasury Department, to the clerks and other employes in city post office and the Agricultural Department, and civilians who are clerks and temporary clerks in the offices of the Coast Survey and Naval Observatory and in the office of the Capitol extension, in the city of Washington, a graduated per cent. upon the amount of their salary or other compensation of the following character and with the following restrictions and limitations, to wit: to all who receive a compensation of less than $1,200, per annum, twenty per cent. on the amount of such compensation; to all who receive $1,200 and less than $1,600, fifteen per cent.; to all who receive $1,600 and less than $2,000, ten per cent.; and to all who receive $2,000 and less than $3,500 per annum, five per cent. on the amount of their annual compensation; to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose my colleague does not wish this acted upon immediately.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I want action upon it now.

Mr. CHANLER and Mr. ROSS objected on the ground that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WASHBURN] had already offered one resolution.

Mr. ORTH. I then introduce the joint resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust my colleague will strike out that part of the resolution which excludes the female employes receiving $900 per annum.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. Have they not already received twenty per cent. extra?

The SPEAKER. If debate arises the resolution goes over.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is action asked upon this without reference to a committee?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. ROSS. I raise the point of order, that the resolution contains an appropriation, and must therefore go to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. The last words in the resolution make an appropriation, and it must therefore go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I move to strike them out.

The SPEAKER. That cannot be done.

On motion of Mr. SPALDING, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed.

PAY OF GEORGE D. BLAKEY, CONTESTANT.

Mr. JULIAN submitted the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House to George D. Blakey, the sum of $2,500 as compensation for time spent and expenses incurred in contesting a seat in this House, as Representative from the third congressional district of Kentucky.

Mr. UPSON. Will not the gentleman consent to have this resolution referred to the Committee of Elections?

Mr. JULIAN. I prefer to take the sense of the House upon it.

Mr. KERR. I move that the resolution be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to—ayes 73, noes 25.

Mr. JULIAN. I trust that by unanimous consent the resolution may be referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is fair. Let that be done.

Mr. CHANLER. I object.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was laid on the table; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BOYER obtained leave of absence for one week.

Mr. HIGBY obtained leave of absence for two weeks.

Mr. AXTELL obtained indefinite leave of absence.

ATTENDANCE ON IMPEACHMENT TRIAL.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, as the hour is at hand when the impeachment trial will be resumed, would it not be proper for the Chair to suggest to members the very great impropriety of their straggling over one by one into the Senate, so that when the time arrives for us to go over, according to order, as a Committee of the Whole, but a small number of members will be there, and all the best seats in the Senate will have been secured by members who have gone over in advance?

The SPEAKER. The order of the House is that the House shall, as a Committee of the Whole, accompany the managers to the bar of the Senate. Gentlemen will understand that the order of the House is not complied with by members going over individually.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Clerk, communicated the following extract from its Journal; which was read at the Clerk's desk:

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
March 23, 1868.

Ordered, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that the Senate is in its Chamber and ready to proceed on the trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, and that seats are provided for the accommodation of the members.

Mr. CHANLER. Does the rule still hold that when the House shall return from the Senate business is to be transacted as usual?

The SPEAKER. Any business can be transacted after the House returns from the Senate.

Mr. CHANLER. Is a motion now in order to provide that no business be transacted to-day after the House returns to its Hall?

The SPEAKER. That motion is not now in order, because the House is now about to execute its resolution with regard to attendance on the impeachment trial.

Agreeably to order, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole, (Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, in the chair,) and proceeded to the bar of the Senate.

At twenty minutes before five o'clock p. m. the Committee of the Whole returned to the Hall, and the Speaker having resumed the Chair,

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, said: As chairman of the Committee of the Whole I have to report that the committee have, according to order, attended the trial by the Senate of the impeachment of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States; that the answer of the said Andrew Johnson was presented in their presence; that progress was made in the trial; and that the Senate sitting for the said trial adjourned to meet to-morrow at one o'clock.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The SPEAKER presented papers in the contested-election case of McGrorty vs. Hooper; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in response to a resolution of the House of the 9th instant, relative to the authority by which Edmund Cooper acts as Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I call for the reading of that document.

The SPEAKER. If it is to be read the Chair will withdraw it and present it to-morrow morning.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would like to hear it read whenever it may be presented.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will withdraw the document for the present.

PRESENTS FOR INDIANS IN ALASKA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, recommending an appropriation, to be expended in presents of clothing and tobacco to the Indians of the Aleutian islands, in Alaska; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House resolutions of the constitutional convention of North Carolina, indorsing the action of the House of Representatives in impeaching the President of the United States; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

POLITICAL DISABILITIES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the report of the committee on political disabilities of the convention of North Carolina, asking the action of Congress in behalf of certain persons therein named; which was referred to the Committee on Reconstruction, and ordered to be printed.

ELECTION CONTEST—SWITZLER VS. ANDERSON.

Mr. POLAND, from the Committee of Elections, presented a report in the contested-election case of Switzler vs. Anderson, accompanied by the following resolutions:

Resolved, That George W. Anderson is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Fortieth Congress from the ninth congressional district of Missouri.

Resolved, That William F. Switzler is entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Fortieth Congress from the ninth congressional district of Missouri.

Mr. POLAND. I move that the report and accompanying resolutions be laid on the table and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McCLURG, from the same committee, subsequently asked and obtained leave to submit a minority report in the case of Switzler vs. Anderson.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to say to the House that the managers on the part of the House in the matter of the impeachment of the President, anticipating the answer which has been presented by him, are prepared, as soon as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] may come in, to present, for the consideration of the House, a general replication to the answer which the President has filed to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him. I have made some inquiries since I left the Senate Chamber, but have not been able to ascertain with certainty where the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] now is.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Let the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] make the motion himself.

Mr. BINGHAM. Very well; I move that the managers be authorized to file in the Senate to-morrow, through the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] a general replication to the answer filed to-day by the President of the United States to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the House.

Mr. NIBLACK. I rise to a point of order; my point of order is that the managers already have full power to do this without further authority from the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. Heretofore, in cases of impeachment, the House has always decided upon the replication.

Mr. WOOD. I would inquire if it is designed, after this replication has been submitted to the House, to give us an opportunity to examine and discuss it before it is authorized to be presented in the Senate as the action of the House? Or are the managers alone to assume the exclusive right to prepare and present this replication in the name of the House?

Mr. BINGHAM. That will rest with the majority of the House. I suppose every member understands very well what a general replication is. It is, in short, a traverse to all the material allegations in the answer; a denial of matters and things set up; an averment that the accused is guilty of the several high crimes and misdemeanors charged against him in the several articles heretofore exhibited against him.

Mr. WOOD. We desire to discuss this replication.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to say that if a replication is to be presented to the answer of the President it cannot be done without the authority of this House. The responsibility of this replication rests upon the House, and not upon the managers, and, for one, I do not wish to authorize those managers to file a replication in my name or on my behalf unless I know beforehand what the replication is. I have heard the answer of the President read, and I am not prepared to deny its correctness. On the contrary, I believe that the most of it is true, in fact that every word of it is true, and I do not wish the managers, on my behalf, to present a denial of that answer. It is now a part of the current history of the country that that answer is the truth, that every word of it is the truth, so far as it states the facts, and this House cannot deny it. I do not want the managers or anybody else to deny it.

Mr. BLAINE. We all agree that the answer is true so far as it states facts. When the managers were elected by this House the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE,] and all here who sympathize with him, refused to participate in the election, saying that they had neither part nor lot in the whole transaction. It seems to me it ill becomes them to wake up just at this time and interpose an objection of this kind.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I believe that if the gentleman will reflect a moment—certainly if he recollects the facts as I recollect them—he will not deny that we took part in discussing the articles of impeachment so far as we were allowed to do so.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentlemen on that side took no part in the election of managers, but expressly declined to do so, stating that they would have no participation in the matter.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] undertakes to be very sharp, as he always is. He says I stated that the answer of the President was true so far as it stated facts. I supposed that that remark would be understood as lawyers understand such an expression. When in pleading we speak of facts we mean facts, not conclusions. I do not undertake to say that everything the President has said in his answer, where he undertakes to draw conclusions, is true; but I say that the answer, wherever he has undertaken to state facts, is true—every word of it.

If it be the fact, as the gentleman from Maine says, that we refused to take any part in electing the managers, that is a reason, and a very strong one, why we should not be willing that in our name they should put in an answer denying those things which we claim to be facts.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire merely to state to the House that all we wish in regard to this matter is to be authorized, by the order of the House, to respond at the bar of the Senate to-morrow with a general replication to this answer. It must be very obvious to every man that gentlemen who think the answer of the President all true and the allegations of the House all false have nothing to do but to refuse to vote for any replication.

Mr. WOODWARD. I wish to make a single inquiry.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will yield for a question.

Mr. WOODWARD. I wish to inquire whether the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] is open to amendment?

Mr. BINGHAM. No, sir; not now. Mr. Speaker, I propose, pending my motion, to suggest that the House take a recess till to-morrow morning at half past ten o'clock.

Mr. WOOD. I desire to make an inquiry.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD?]

Mr. BINGHAM. No, sir. I desire to state to the House that one of the managers, after consultation with the other managers, notified the Senate that the managers hoped to file a replication, by order of the House, at the bar of the Senate to-morrow at one o'clock p. m. To that end I suggest that the House now take a recess until half past ten o'clock to-morrow morning, so that the House may have an opportunity to consider and pass upon this replication and authorize the managers to present it. To meet the suggestions of gentlemen around me, I am willing to name eleven o'clock to-morrow morning as the hour of meeting.

Mr. WOODWARD. I now desire to inquire of the Chair whether the motion of the gentleman from Ohio in regard to filing a replication is not amendable.

The SPEAKER. It is not while the gentleman from Ohio is upon the floor. If he surrenders the floor without demanding the previous question the motion will be open to amendment or debate.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Is the motion for a recess debatable?

The SPEAKER. Whenever that motion is made it is not debatable.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will make that motion.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move that the House take a recess till to-morrow morning at eleven o'clock.

Mr. WOOD. I rise to a question of order.

Is not the gentleman's motion debatable, he not having demanded the previous question?

The SPEAKER. The motion for a recess is not debatable, as the gentleman will find by referring to the Digest.

Mr. WOOD. Will the gentleman allow any discussion on this question?

Mr. BINGHAM. I have no objection to discussion to-morrow.

The motion to take a recess was agreed to; and thereupon (at four o'clock and fifty-five minutes) the House took a recess till to-morrow morning at eleven o'clock.

AFTER THE RECESS.

The SPEAKER. The recess having expired, the House resumes its session.

REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. CULLOM, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 965) to amend the revenue laws; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence was granted for ten days to Mr. BLAIR; also, to Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana, and Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania, for the same time.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BLAINE. I ask unanimous consent to take up from the Speaker's table House bill No. 832, making appropriations for the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, which has come back from the Senate with an immaterial amendment.

No objection being made, the bill was taken up.

The amendment of the Senate was to insert on page 1, line twelve, after the word "dollars," the words "under the act approved March 3, 1865, entitled 'An act relative to the Post Office laws.'"

Mr. BLAINE. It merely defines the law under which a certain item in an appropriation bill was authorized.

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

Mr. BLAINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEGAL-TENDER NOTES.

Mr. WOODWARD. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing so much of the act of February 25, 1862, and of all subsequent acts of Congress as makes Treasury notes or anything else than gold and silver coin a legal tender in payment of debts; the repealing law to take effect as to all debts not exceeding twenty dollars on the 1st day of January, 1869, and as to all other debts on the 1st of January, 1870.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Is that intended for action at the present time?

Mr. WOODWARD. It is simply a resolution of reference to the Judiciary Committee.

The resolution was agreed to.

CONTESTED ELECTION—M'KEE VS. YOUNG.

Mr. McCLURG. I rise to a privileged question. I present the report of the Committee of Elections in the contested-election case of Samuel McKee vs. John D. Young, from the ninth congressional district of Kentucky.

The resolutions at the conclusion of the report were read, as follows:

Resolved, That John D. Young, having voluntarily given aid, countenance, and encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility to the United States, is not entitled to take the oath of office as a Representative in this House from the ninth congressional district of Kentucky or to hold a seat therein as such Representative.

Resolved, That Samuel McKee, not having received a majority of the votes cast for Representative in this House from the ninth congressional district of Kentucky, is not entitled to a seat therein as such Representative.

Resolved, That the Speaker be directed to notify the Governor of Kentucky that a vacancy exists in the representation in this House from the ninth district of Kentucky.

Mr. McCLURG. I move that the report be laid on the table, and ordered to be printed. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KERR. I submit the report of the minority in the same case, and move that it be laid on the table, and ordered to be printed with the majority report. At the proper time I give notice that I shall move a substitute for the first resolution.

The minority report was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

FLORIDA.

Mr. FARNSWORTH, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial of the members of the Florida constitutional convention, transmitting two constitutions, and moved that they be referred to the Committee on Reconstruction, and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

ANNUAL POST ROUTE BILL.

Mr. FARNSWORTH, by unanimous consent, moved to take from the Speaker's table the amendments of the Senate to the amendments of the House to the Senate amendments to House bill No. 328, to establish certain post roads.

The amendments were taken up and concurred in.

SETTLEMENT OF PUBLIC ACCOUNTS.

Mr. POLAND. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on Revision and Unfinished Business Senate bill No. 350, to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the prompt settlement of public debts," approved March 3, 1817, with the recommendation that it do pass. The committee have examined the bill fully and are unanimously of the opinion that the bill ought to pass.

The bill was read in extenso. It provides that the act of March 3, 1817, entitled "An act to provide for the prompt settlement of public accounts," shall not be construed to authorize the heads of Departments to change or modify the balances that may be certified to them by the Commissioner of Customs or the Comptrollers of the Treasury, but that such balances, when stated by the Auditor and properly certified by the Comptroller as provided by that act, shall be taken and considered as final and conclusive upon the executive branch of the Government, and be subject to revision only by Congress or the proper courts, provided that the head of the proper Department, before signing a warrant for any balance certified to him by a Comptroller, may submit to such Comptroller any facts in his judgment affecting the correctness of such balance, but the decision of the Comptroller thereon shall be final and conclusive as hereinbefore provided.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I cannot yield if it gives rise to debate.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not know that I want to debate it. I should like to have some explanation whether it takes away any of the guards now thrown around the Treasury.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I reserve the right to object during the debate.

Mr. POLAND. Mr. Speaker, this bill gives construction to the act of 1817. Prior to March 3, 1817, accounts had been settled in the different Departments. Accounts arising in the Navy or War Department were settled in that Department, and evidence of that fact was final and conclusive. Such was the practice, but within a few years there has been some controversy between officers of the Treasury Department and the War Department in reference to the settlement of accounts.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, notifying the House of its action sitting as a court for the trial of the President, and communicating a copy of the President's answer to the articles of impeachment.

SETTLEMENT OF ACCOUNTS—AGAIN.

Mr. POLAND. I must call for the previous question on the pending bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time.

The House divided on the passage of the bill; and there were—ayes 58, noes 6; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. POLAND and Mr. CHANLER.

Mr. SPALDING demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I reserved the right to object to further proceeding on this bill.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the bill is not before the House.

Mr. CHANLER. I rise to a point of order, that a vote having commenced it must absolutely be continued.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts reserved the right to object at any time.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The reservation was during debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct, and the vote must be taken if insisted on.

Mr. CHANLER. I insist on the vote.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 100, nays 18, not voting 71; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allison, Ames, Bailey, Baker, Banks, Barnes, Beaman, Beck, Benjamin, Bingham, Blaine, Buckland, Burr, Butler, Calkins, Chandler, Reader W. Clarke, Covode, Dixon, Dodge, Driggs, Eckley, Eldridge, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Fox, Garfield, Getz, Glossbrenner, Goldaday, Gravelly, Grover, Haight, Higby, Hill, Holman, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Lawrence, Lincoln, Logan, Mallory, Maynard, McCullough, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Mullins, Mungen, Myers, Newcomb, Niblack, Nicholson, O'Neill, Peters, Pike, Poland, Polesky, Pomeroy, Randall, Raum, Robertson, Schenck, Selye, Shanks, Sitgreaves, Smith, Spalding, Taber, Taffe, John Trimble, Lawrence S. Trimble, Twichell, Van Auker, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, Wood, and Woodward—100.

NAYS—Messrs. Beatty, Boutwell, Broomall, Churchill, Cullom, Dawes, Ketcham, William Lawrence, Orth, Paine, Perham, Price, Sawyer, Scofield, Thaddeus Stevens, Elihu B. Washburn, William B. Washburn, and James F. Wilson—18.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, Archer, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Baldwin, Barnum, Benton, Blair, Boyer, Bromwell, Brooks, Cary, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Donnelly, Eggleston, Ela, Finney, Griswold, Halscy, Harding, Hawkins, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Kelley, Knott, Loan, Loughridge, Lynch, Marshall, Marvin, McCarthy, McClurg, McCormick, Morgan, Morrissey, Nunn, Phelps, Pile, Platts, Pruyn, Robinson, Ross, Shellabarger, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Stone, Taylor, Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Henry D. Washburn, William Williams, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—71.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. POLAND moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I am directed by the managers to report to the House a form of replication to the answer filed by the President of the United States to the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House, and also to submit a resolution.

The SPEAKER. The replication and the resolution will be read.

Mr. CHANLER. Is it in order to call for the reading of the President's answer?

The SPEAKER. It is not. It is in order to call for the reading of the message from the Senate.

Mr. CHANLER. I call for the reading of that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules that the message from the Senate can be read, but the answer of the President cannot be read upon the demand of any member.

Mr. CHANLER. Does the reading of the message from the Senate bring the answer before the House?

The SPEAKER. It does not.

Mr. CHANLER. I desire to ask, for information, how the House can act judiciously and judiciously on a replication to the answer of the President without having that answer before it?

The SPEAKER. That is a matter for the House and not for the Chair to determine.

Mr. BLAINE. The House heard the answer yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The message from the Senate will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In the Senate of the United States sitting for the trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, upon articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives:

March 23, 1868.

Ordered, That the Managers have time to consult the House of Representatives on a replication, and that the Secretary communicate to the House of Representatives an attested copy of the answer of the President to the articles of impeachment.

Attest: J. W. FORNEY, Secretary.

The Clerk then read the replication reported by the managers, as follows:

Replication by the House of Representatives of the United States to the answer of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives.

The House of Representatives of the United States have considered the several answers of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, to the several articles of impeachment against him by them exhibited in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States, and reserving to themselves all advantage of exception to the insufficiency of his answer to each and all of the several articles of impeachment exhibited against said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, do deny each and every averment in said several answers, or either of them, which denies or traverses the acts, intents, crimes or misdemeanors charged against said Andrew Johnson in the said articles of impeachment or either of them; and for replication to the said answer do say, that said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States is guilty of the high crimes and misdemeanors mentioned in said articles, and that the House of Representatives are ready to prove the same.

The Clerk then read the resolution reported by Mr. BOUTWELL, as follows:

Resolved, That the House hereby adopts the replication to the answer of the President as now submitted by the managers.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to inquire of the managers if the President, in his answer—we have it not before us—has denied that he is guilty? I want to know what he admits.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. He admits the fact, but denies the motive.

Mr. SPALDING. The managers will unquestionably be met by legal critics in the other House, and they had better be careful how they draw the replication.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The attention of the managers was called to the peculiar form of the answer filed by the President. To most of the articles, however, he makes answer, in substance, that he is not guilty, although the form of the answer is different from that which has generally been employed in similar cases. In respect to some of the articles the answer probably amounts to a demurrer merely. But upon the whole the managers have chosen to treat the answer of the President to each and every article as a plea of the general issue of not guilty. And the managers are of opinion that no advantage can be taken, as against the House of Representatives, from the form of replication which has been reported by the managers.

Some gentlemen near me desire that the replication may be read again. And, inasmuch as it is the desire of the managers to give a few minutes for criticism, in the first place, before the previous question is demanded, as to the form of the replication, I should myself be glad to have it again read and the attention of the House directed to it.

The replication was again read.

Mr. WOODWARD. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] yield to me?

Mr. BOUTWELL. For a moment, yes, sir.

Mr. WOODWARD. I wish to call the attention of the managers to a state of facts that I hope they will recognize. If I understood the answer of the President to the eleventh article of impeachment, it amounts to a demurrer to that article. It denies that there is any impeachable offense charged in the eleventh article. My own private opinion is that the demurrer or answer is very conclusive. I do not think there is any impeachable offense charged in the eleventh article.

The answer of the President putting that point in issue, which is a legal question and amounts to a demurrer, there should be a special replication to that part of the answer which relates to the eleventh article, or a formal rejoinder in demurrer. This general replication does not join an issue upon that article at all; it is what might be called a departure in pleading. Here is a demurrer to the eleventh article which denies that any impeachable offense is charged in it. The managers do not aver in the replication that the eleventh article charges any impeachable offense; and therefore there is no issue upon the record upon that article.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will my colleague [Mr. BOUTWELL] yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Certainly.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] will find that the eleventh article of impeachment, like every other article exhibited by the House against the President, charges and avers that he has committed a misdemeanor in office or a high crime in office; so that there is no departure in the replication.

Now, as to the answer of the President, I beg leave to call the attention of the House and the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] to the fact, that while it does contain much that is argumentative, much that may be called demurrer, which is never allowed at all in an impeachment case, which was never introduced into the proceedings of an impeachment case—for there never was a demurrer entertained by the Senate in an impeachment case, none ever entertained in the House of Lords of England; there is no such note of record; it does not lie; special pleading is unknown to the whole proceeding—yet this answer of the President to the eleventh article of impeachment, in its last clause, does expressly deny, and is therefore simply a plea of not guilty—it expressly denies that he committed a crime. As to form, it is nothing; substance is everything. This is the clause which the gentleman overlooked when he raised his objection:

"And this respondent, further answering the said eleventh article, denies that by any means or reason of anything in said article alleged this respondent, as President of the United States, did, on the 21st day of February, 1868, or at any other day or time, commit, or that he was guilty of, a high misdemeanor in office."

I say that by the parliamentary law it is the same thing as if he had said he is not guilty of the crimes and misdemeanors alleged against him in manner and form as charged. Forms are nothing; substance is everything. The replication is of the substance, and it is no departure. I would like to see somebody go into the Senate and prefer a demurrer to the replication. I would like to see Andrew Johnson do that, and thereby confess the averments of the replication. No such rule as that stated by the gentleman obtains, because, as he knows right well, the demurrer admits everything that is well pleaded; and in this replication, instead of a departure, the averment is made over again that Andrew Johnson is guilty of the several high crimes and misdemeanors alleged against him in the articles. Now, a demurrer, if it would lie, would be simply a confession of guilt; that is all.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, I am willing that all the time which can properly be given for debate should be so occupied by gentlemen desire. I suppose there will be about an hour for debate. I therefore demand the previous question, and when that has been seconded I will yield all of the time allowed for debate to other gentlemen, and largely to the minority side of the House, if they choose to avail themselves of it.

The SPEAKER put the question on seconding the demand for the previous question, and declared it agreed to.

Mr. CHANLER. I call for a division.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] that instead of demanding the previous question he leave the matter open, with the understanding, which may be had by unanimous consent, that the vote be taken on adopting the replication at five minutes before one o'clock.

Mr. CHANLER. I rise to a point of order, that while the House is dividing debate is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

On seconding the previous question there were—ayes 88, noes 22.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered.

Mr. BOUTWELL. In accordance with a promise which I have made to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD], I yield him ten minutes.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I presume that the exception taken by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] to the replication has reference to making it what it really ought to be as a replication to the answer of the President. I think, however, that that is a question which the court may determine. It seems to me that the question whether the replication is sufficient or insufficient is a matter which probably belongs more appropriately to the Senate to determine—a question for the managers and the President's counsel to discuss before the Senate at the proper time.

I think, however, it is very desirable that the House, in whatever action it may take with reference to this procedure, should exercise the utmost care, and that so far as we are represented by these managers we should at all times reserve the right to instruct and direct the managers. I would myself take exception to the phraseology of the replication where it refers to the prior action of this House as being "in the name of all the people of the United States." Sir, we know that that is not the fact. There is not a man in this House who can rise in his place and seriously and candidly declare that the people of the United States have ever authorized the House of Representatives to act upon this question, or that any member of this House was ever elected upon any such issue. Therefore, it is false in fact that the House, in this action, is representing all the people of the United States. Sir, we have had no representation made to this House from any portion of the people of the United States in favor of this procedure, except by a handful of office seekers who expect to derive personal advantage from the result.

Now, sir, I take occasion to say that these managers represent the House of Representatives and only the House of Representatives; and in representing this House they are our agents. We are responsible for their action, and they are responsible to this House for their action. We not only have the right to direct and control them, but I believe that we have the right to criticize their action, as I propose to do on this occasion. Now, sir, upon the first day of the sitting of the court, one of the honorable managers, acting, no doubt, in pursuance of what he deemed to be his duty, took it upon himself to bully the Senate of the United States sitting as a high court. The honorable manager from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] told the Senate that he wanted to see whether the Senate would observe its own rules; and yesterday the same honorable manager undertook to criticize severely, and in my judgment improperly, the decision of the Chief Justice of the United States sitting as the presiding officer of that court. Now, sir, it will not do to say that that gentleman alone is responsible for this; it will not do to say that the managers alone are responsible. They represent and speak in behalf of the House of Representatives of the United States.

Therefore it is, sir, I, as one member of the House of Representatives, desire to enter my protest against any action, against any language, against any conduct on the part of either of these managers not sufficiently decorous and proper, and not commensurate with the dignity and gravity of the occasion.

Again, sir, the managers yesterday assumed the right to say that to-day at one o'clock they would present their replication. Who authorized the managers to so declare to the Senate? Is this replication the replication of the managers on the part of the House of Representatives in the absence of authority? It may be the act of the managers, but in the absence of our action it is not of the House, and it was an assumption for the managers to declare to the Senate that at one o'clock to-day they would present this replication.

Why, sir, a Baltimore paper of to-day contains this replication; so that before being presented to the House it is given to the public. Do gentlemen who have been selected by the House to represent us in the Senate constitute the House of Representatives for this purpose? I do think, in a procedure of this magnitude, of this importance, of this gravity, where gentlemen are selected to represent us, it is but decorous and proper they should defer to the House in a matter of such grave importance before assuming authority or taking for granted what the action of the House may be on any subject.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to criticize this paper. It is upon its face a mere form of law. It is a mere pro forma procedure, which, I have no doubt, considering the antecedent events, is proper, and is such a replication as this House, under the circumstances, ought to pass; but I do contend that at every step of this procedure it is the duty of the managers to consult the House. It is the duty of the managers to come to the House for instruction and information. It is the right of this House to have absolute control of this proceeding from its incipient steps to its conclusion. Therefore it is, I desire to say, that in the further prosecution of this cause the managers will rely upon the House, that they will conform to the action and preserve the dignity of this House in the prosecution of this case, and that they will report back for instruction when important questions shall arise.

Mr. BUTLER rose.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I yield to my colleague indefinitely.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I understand the objection of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] to be to the replication that it professes to reply in the name of all the people of the United States, and therefore as it does not reply in his name, as he does not agree to it, therefore it is not a good replication. If that is so, sir, there would be an end to the prosecution.

Mr. WOOD. That was not my statement. The gentleman has not quoted me correctly. I stated that a portion of the people of the United States does not authorize this action, and therefore it does not represent all of the people of the United States.

Mr. BUTLER. The Representatives of the people usually represent their constituents. But the gentleman has not even the merit of originality in his objection. The form is one which has been used for five hundred years, lacking eight. An objection was made to it once before and only once, when the people of England, smarting under the usurpations and tyranny of Charles I, not having any provision as we have by which that tyrant could be brought to justice, stepping outside of their constitution, but in a perfectly legitimate manner, as I understand and believe, brought Charles to justice. When proclamation was made that they were proceeding in the name of all the people of England there was one adherent of Charles I got up and said no; all the people did not consent to it. So the gentleman has at least a precedent for what he has done; and I wish we could follow out the precedent.

Mr. WOOD. And behead the king.

Mr. BUTLER. It was the great inquiry who made that objection, and they tried to find him out for the purpose of punishing him. [Laughter.] But, as he concealed himself, they could not find him. It afterward turned out to be a woman, [laughter,] the wife of General Fairfax, who "ratted" on that occasion from the rest of the Commons of England. [Laughter.]

Another thing. It is said that the replication is published in the Baltimore papers. I pray to take issue as to the fact. This replication was ready, aye, it was corrected in form, at fifteen minutes past eleven o'clock. True, it is a formal one, copied in part from the great precedents, so far as they apply, and, therefore, any paper can publish something like it.

Mr. WOOD. If the gentleman will permit me, the managers probably altered it after they sent it to the press, and here it is, with the names of the managers attached to it, in the Baltimore American of to-day.

Mr. BUTLER. And as the names of the managers are not attached to this that ends the question. [Laughter.] When we make a replication we do not attach our names to it, but we expect the Speaker of the House and the Clerk of the House, by order of this body, to attach their names.

Mr. WOOD. You altered it.

Mr. BUTLER. We never altered it at all. This Baltimore paper is one which the managers do not take and do not patronize, either by furnishing matter or reading it after it is furnished.

Mr. WOOD. You should not have deceived the reporter.

Mr. BUTLER. Another thing. It is said we have exceeded our authority in saying to the Senate that we would file our replication to-day at one o'clock. I think we said no such thing. We said that we, the managers, would be ready, with the leave of the House, to file the replication at one o'clock.

Mr. BINGHAM. And expected to be.

Mr. BUTLER. We expected and hoped to be ready, and had no doubt we should be. And if the gentleman will take the same course and wash his hands of this as he did of the former proceedings the managers will be ready as they expected.

As I said, this is a mere formal proceeding. There can be no demurrer, no issues of law, and all the President's answer can amount to is the plea that he is not guilty with a mere stump speech in its belly. [Laughter.]

Mr. WOOD. That is not rhetorical. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER. It may not be rhetorical, but it is true. The truth is rarely rhetorical. It is, however, a parliamentary phrase, first used, to my knowledge, in the Senate on the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill.

Mr. WOOD. The gentleman admits that his statement, also, is not "original."

Mr. BUTLER. I am informed that the Baltimore American in the paper containing this alleged report of the managers. Finding the paper in suspicious company I thought it was the Baltimore Gazette. If it is not the Gazette, I have nothing to say. The American is a very decent paper. I only wonder that my friend has found it there. Now, I trust, we shall not hesitate from any suggestion as to propriety of language or propriety of conduct—

Mr. WOOD. I rise to a point of order. It is now about twelve o'clock, and I would inquire whether the recess does not expire at twelve?

The SPEAKER. It does not; it expired at eleven o'clock.

Mr. WOOD. My point is whether we do not commence Tuesday's session now?

The SPEAKER. We do not. The House of Representatives continues its session of Monday till the final adjournment, even if the session runs for several calendar days. In the great parliamentary struggle on the Missouri compromise the session continued two days and two nights, and the House of Representatives received on Monday a message sent from the Senate on Tuesday.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts has the floor.

Mr. BUTLER. A single further suggestion. I trust the House will receive no lecture on propriety of conduct or of language from a gentleman who stands as yet under its censure for violation of all parliamentary rules.

Mr. WOOD. The highest compliment in my life.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE.]

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at eleven o'clock and fifty-nine minutes and three quarters a. m., Tuesday, March 24,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 24, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's legislative proceedings, but before concluding was interrupted by Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with at least to receive a message from the House of Representatives.

No objection being made the further reading of the Journal was dispensed with.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 882) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had directed its Clerk to return to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the bill (H. R. No. 658) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1869, and for other purposes, with the amendment of the Senate thereto.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating correspondence in relation to the propriety of making a present of clothing and tobacco to the chief of the Kaloshian Indians and Aleutian priests on the Aleutian Isles, in Alaska; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented resolutions of the constitutional convention of South Carolina in favor of granting to that State the proceeds of the sale of certain lands sold by the Government for taxes due to the United States for the support of public schools in that State, and further recommending the granting of the prayer of the accompanying petition of F. L. Cardoza and B. L. Nash, that certain lands not yet sold by the United States be allotted to destitute and deserving citizens of South Carolina; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HARLAN presented the memorial of Captain Jonas P. Levy, for payment of money due him under the treaty between the United States and the Republic of Mexico, of February 2, 1848, and an act for the relief of Jonas P. Levy and José Maria Jarrero, approved August 3, 1854; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 458) to abolish the office of superintendent of exports and drawback, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. CRAGIN. The Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 462) making appropriations for the expenses of the trial of the impeachment of Andrew Johnson and other contingent expenses of the Senate, for the year ending June 30, 1868, have had the same under consideration and instructed me to report it back without amendment and recommend its passage; but as this is an appropriation bill, although it is quite important that it should be passed at once, I move its reference to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 216) to authorize the Secretary of War to place at the disposal of the Lincoln Monument Association damaged and captured ordnance, reported it without amendment.

PRESENTATION OF BILLS TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As there seems to be but little, if any, morning business, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 366) regulating the presentation of bills to the President of the United States and the return of the same. Let us see if we cannot get that disposed of.

The motion was agreed to; and the consideration of the bill was resumed as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to amend the bill by striking out the last section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The section proposed to be stricken out will be read.

The Secretary read the last section of the bill, as follows:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the time mentioned in this act shall be computed by excluding the day on which a bill may be presented to the President and including the tenth day (Sundays excepted) thereafter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope that section will not be stricken out.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, it is the second section that I wish to strike out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The second section of the bill will be read.

The Secretary read the second section, as follows:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That every bill which, having passed both Houses of Congress, and having been presented to the President, as provided in the Constitution, shall not have been returned by the President with his objections thereto to that House in which it originated within the time herein defined and declared shall be a law; and it shall be the duty of the President in such case immediately to deliver such bill, so having become a law, to the Secretary of State, who shall receive and proceed with the same in the same manner as may be provided by law for bills signed by the President, and to certify thereon, and in the promulgation thereof, that such bill has become a law for the cause aforesaid.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, which is to strike out the section just read.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. DAVIS. On the passage of the bill I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire to inquire of the Senator who has this bill in charge whether the provision is retained that messages shall be filed with the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That the bills shall be returned to the Secretary or Clerk with the messages.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I should like to know how the Secretary can make entries and make up a Journal when the Senate is not in session. I can understand that when the Senate reconvenes the Clerk may hand to the President of the Senate, just as any member might or any outsider might, the particular paper, and it may then be presented to the Senate, and it may be entered in the Journal. But this bill contemplates that our Secretary shall make and keep a Journal when the Senate is not here at all, when there can be no Journal of its proceedings.

Without entering into debate on the other features of the bill, which were discussed on a former occasion by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] and by other members, I will say that I think that portion of the bill, at least, ought to be omitted. The transmission of a message in the manner proposed to the Secretary of the Senate must go for nothing for any constitutional or legal purpose, and the bill ought, therefore, to provide, if passed at all, that this message be transmitted to the Senate in the usual manner. How can you by law charge upon the President, under the Constitution of the United States, the duty of communicating with the Secretary of the Senate or communicating with any one else except the Senate itself? I do not care to enter into debate, but I wanted to suggest this point before the bill was passed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not wish to occupy time except to answer fairly the suggestion of my friend from Pennsylvania. His opposition to that clause of the bill to which he has referred is really an opposition to the whole principle of the bill. The bill proceeds upon the principle that the Congress of the United States is in session after it commences on the first Monday of December, for instance, all the time, until it adjourns itself as a Congress definitely and finally; and it therefore proceeds upon the included principle that when we adjourn over each body from one day to another Congress is still sitting in session, although the particular components of it are distributed all over the city; but still it has its members and its officers; the one House has its President and the other its Speaker. The language of the Constitution is that the President shall return a bill within ten days after it is presented to him "unless the Congress by their adjournment prevent its return;" that is the language of the Constitution. Now, what is an adjournment of "the Congress?" The Constitution says that the Congress is composed of a Senate and of a House of Representatives associated together for political and legislative purposes; and it is that associated body which represents the whole law-making power of the Government whose adjournment it is that is to prevent the return of a bill. Another clause provides that he shall return the bill to that House in which it originated; and the same Constitution provides that either House may of its own motion adjourn for three days. Now, then, if one House adjourns for three days, and the bill is to be returned to that House, is it an adjournment of the Congress? Of course not. Then can he not return the bill to that House during those three days although it is not sitting? If he cannot it is equivalent to saying that he is bound to return the bill within seven days, or else it must become a law in spite of his opposition, when, perhaps, it was only passed by one majority.

The fault in the argument against this bill is in considering that the adjournment of one House to a definite time, either with or without the consent of the other House, as the Constitution may permit or provide, is an adjournment of Congress, the law-making and legislative power of the country, a consolidated body in legal contemplation when the concurrent act of the two Houses is requisite to the perfection of a measure. If that be the nature of each House it is still a House and a body, although it does not sit every moment of time, and it has an officer who, for all purposes with which the law may clothe him, represents that body in a mere executive and ministerial point of view.

Now, what do we provide? We provide that the President may, at any time within the ten days, if he wishes, return a bill with his objections though the House in which it originated may not be sitting actually in its Chamber, although, in contemplation of law, it and the Congress of which it composes a part is in session; that is to say, if a bill be returnable to-day, if this be the tenth day, and we choose for any reason, as we frequently do, to adjourn almost upon the moment of our assembling, that the President may still exercise, in a manner regulated by law, his constitutional prerogative of returning the bill, with his objections, to this body—because it is still a body—it may punish persons for contempt of its authority just as well committed after it has adjourned, for the day, as it is called, as before.

What, then, do we provide? We simply provide that he may communicate with this body while its active operations are in a state of suspense from one day to another, or from one day to two or three days or a week, as the case may be, by filing the paper that the Constitution gives him a right to file within that time with the responsible officer whom the law designates to receive it; and then all that is required of that officer is that he shall enter upon his Journal, which is a book that the rules of the Senate and the Constitution require to be kept—not any daily entry of proceedings, not an ideal thing, but an actual book, the book of record—that he shall enter in that book of record, under the date upon which the bill is returned, the fact that it is returned with the message. Then, when we meet on the next day, whatever that day may be, when the Journal of the last day's proceedings is read, you find the official entry, the record of the clerk that the law requires him to make, that on such a day this bill, with the accompanying message, was returned. Is there anything irregular or illegal in that when the law has once fixed it? I certainly fail to perceive it. And I may say that this measure met with the careful examination of the members of the Judiciary Committee, composed of gentlemen of my friend's own party as well as of my own; and inasmuch as it did not involve—perhaps I ought not to say "inasmuch"—

Mr. JOHNSON. It was not a party measure.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was about to say that, inasmuch as it was not in any sense a party measure, we felt that we were investigating it on all sides without any bias, which sometimes misleads men in the investigation of a case, and I believed we concurred unanimously not only in the constitutionality of the measure but in its eminent propriety as a measure of regulation for these cases that must frequently otherwise occur.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, the Constitution provides that the Senate shall keep a Journal of its proceedings, of what it does itself. In another clause it is provided that when the President returns a bill with his objections that message thus containing his objections shall be entered upon the Journal of the Senate. The fact of receiving such a message and the entry of that message upon the Journal must, in the very nature of the case, be when the Senate itself is in session.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is begging the question.

Mr. BUCKALEW. The Senator says I beg the question. I refer to the express language of the Constitution. The Journal is to be kept by the Senate, and it is to be a Journal of what it does, a Journal of its proceedings. What is a proceeding of the Senate? The reception of a message from the President of the United States is a proceeding by the Senate; it is an act by the Senate itself. The entering of the message upon the Journal is the act of the Senate itself, though it is done by the Secretary of the Senate. It is done in the presence of the Senate, and it is the act of the body itself for that reason. I think, therefore, it is manifest that under the Constitution of the United States this Journal and the entries upon the Journal are matters which relate to a session of the Senate, an actual session, the personal presence of the body, and that it is not competent for the Senate to commit to one of its own officers, or to any officer of the Government, or to any citizen, the performance of a duty which is by the Constitution charged upon itself and to be performed by itself. I do not know that by multiplying words I can make my meaning more clear than I have by the statement already submitted.

Mr. JOHNSON. There was some little difficulty in the committee on the question—not much—and I think that we all came to the conclusion that it was within the power of Congress to adopt a measure such as the one before you now. The supreme court of New Hampshire, composed of very able men, and in whose constitution there is a like provision to the one involved in this discussion, except that the number of days is less, being five, I think, there instead of ten, came to the opinion, and they have acted upon it ever since, that the bill might be returned to an officer of the body, although the body was not in actual session. The honorable member from Pennsylvania gives a literal interpretation to the words of the Constitution, and exclusively literal. He says that the Senate is to keep a Journal; the message is to be returned to the Senate and is to be entered upon its Journal, and that those words necessarily imply that the Senate must be in session at the time, or otherwise there would be no evidence at all that the Journal was one which the Senate authorized. The answer to that is, that if we pass a law which empowers the clerk to receive it and enter it, it is received and entered under the authority of the Senate. And so of the other House. So, then, it depends upon the question whether you are to give a literal interpretation, one strictly literal, to the clause, or give an interpretation to it which complies with the spirit of the provision.

There are difficulties in a literal interpretation which will occur to any one who reflects on the subject. The Senate adjourn from Friday over to Monday; very often from Thursday over to Monday. The ten days expire, say on Friday or on Saturday. There is no Senate in session. What is the President to do? If he does not return a bill within the ten days it is a law; and he has no authority to return it at all unless he can return it on Friday or Saturday, and on neither day, according to the assumption that there has been an adjournment from Thursday, is the Senate in session. If the honorable member from Pennsylvania is right, then, in a case of that description, the President would be compelled to return it within a period less than ten days, or it would become a law in spite of his returning it on the last hour of the tenth day. We thought that did not at all comport with the object of the provision, and, as I have before said, came to a very satisfactory opinion, so far as the committee were concerned, that there was a power to pass such a bill as this, and that it was expedient to pass it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have listened with a great deal of care to the arguments against this bill by gentlemen in whose judgment I have great confidence, but I have not been able to concur with the view they have taken of it. I think that in the practice of Congress there has arisen a practical question of difficulty that must be provided for. It has come to be the habit of Congress, and of each branch of Congress, to take recesses. Those are clearly not adjournments within the meaning of the Constitution, as I think. Then a case of that sort must be provided for, and I think it is proper that by law we should settle that which is not settled perhaps definitely by the Constitution. Now, I think it is proper for Congress to say explicitly that a recess is not an adjournment; that a recess for a term of days by the two branches is not an adjournment; and especially a recess of either branch for a period less than three days is not an adjournment, and to provide what shall be done with a bill that is returned from the President during that time. It is simply a declaration on the part of Congress that it is still in session, and a provision whereby a bill may be returned. In that view, I support the measure.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I wish to make one other remark. When this subject was up before I spoke upon the point now made by the Senator from Vermont—the case of an adjournment by one House of Congress when the other remains in session, or when the consent of the other House has not been obtained. I do not understand that in that case we are precluded from making some regulation, either the regulation proposed by this bill or some similar regulation appropriate to the case. The provision of the Constitution is that the bill shall be returned within ten days unless Congress, meaning both Houses, by their adjournment prevent its return. Now, sir, that will not apply to the case of an adjournment to a period not exceeding three days by one House; and if there be any regulation of law necessary to provide for the case of an adjournment of one House merely I should not interpose any objection.

But the argument of the Senator from Vermont goes beyond this illustration which he has made. He argues that, no matter for what period of time Congress shall, in fact, adjourn, although it may adjourn for a period of eleven months, still the ten days will not expire. Take the case which happened last year. The two Houses of Congress adjourned over somewhere about the 1st of April, and provided for an additional session in the month of July. The two Houses reassembled pursuant to that adjournment in July and entered upon a session because there was a quorum in each House. After sitting a short time Congress again adjourned over until the month of November, and then reconvened and held a short session during the latter part of that month. If the reasoning of the Senator from Vermont be correct a bill sent to the President on the 30th of March, or say one day before Congress adjourned in the spring, would not have fallen necessarily by the adjournment over to the month of July; and we might provide by law, if the Senator be correct, that in such a case that bill should remain in the hands of the President until a period of three or four months of adjournment had elapsed, and then, when we met here, transmit it to both Houses of Congress.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will pardon me, I beg to remind him that the Constitution requires that he shall return the bill to the body in which it originated in ten days, which, I suppose, the Senator construes to mean ten calendar days.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Of course, ten calendar days.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then we cannot provide for his holding it any longer time.

Mr. BUCKALEW. But, according to the argument of the Senator, Congress may make provision based on the assumption that its adjournment before the expiration of ten days will have no effect.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not make any such argument. My argument is based on the proposition that a concurrent resolution of each House permitting the other to adjourn its session for a number of days is not an adjournment of the Congress that the Constitution provides for as preventing a bill becoming a law.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I am not speaking of a case of consent given by one House to the adjournment of the other. I am speaking of the fact in the case to which I have alluded, to wit, the sessions of 1867, which were held by regular adjournments of the two Houses, two adjournments carrying a session continuously from the 4th day of March, when the Fortieth Congress convened, down to the first Monday of December, when the second or regular session of that Congress commenced.

Now, one objection which applies to the bill and the argument by which it is sustained is that it is against the practice of the Government. From the time that Congress first convened together in 1789 down to this time it has been held, and held uniformly, that if the two Houses of Congress adjourned by a concurrent resolution before the expiration of ten days from the presentation of a bill to the President a bill which should then be left in his hands would fail. We know cases where bills have failed under such circumstances. They have failed upon repeated occasions, not only during recent years, but far back in former times. This bill is based on the idea that that practice was incorrect, that it was not founded upon a sound construction of the Constitution, to wit, that if Congress shall not be in session, if it shall have adjourned before the ten days expire, the bill, if not returned, fails to become a law, it expires by virtue of that clause of the Constitution which says in express language that it shall not under such circumstances become a law of the United States.

This bill proposes, in the absence of both Houses of Congress, to provide a substitute for the House to which the bill is to be returned. Instead of being returned to the House in which it originated, as the Constitution says, this bill proposes to enact that it shall be returned to the Secretary here alone, not in the Chamber of the House at all, but possibly without the building, or anywhere in Washington city, or anywhere in the United States, or, if you please, in some remote foreign country, if you can suppose so extreme a case as that; and that upon the paper or engrossed bill being given to that particular person it shall be considered that it has been returned to the House in which it originated. Why, sir, can anything be more absurd? Can anything more flatly contradict common sense, deny the plain fact? Can we constitute our Secretary into the Senate, and can we make the Clerk of the House of Representatives the House for the purpose of doing any official act whatever? You propose that he shall receive the communication from the President as if he were the Senate or the House; that he, sitting anywhere, responsible to nobody, with no check upon him, shall make up a Journal as if he were the Senate or the House for the occasion.

I grant you, Mr. President, that where one House adjourns within the stated limit of three days without the consent of the other, you may presume that it is a case not within the limitation of the Constitution, which says that if the bill is not returned within ten days it shall not become a law, because that provision is to be taken in connection with the other provision that is connected with it, which is that the Congress by its adjournment shall have prevented its return. I would construe that that one House by its adjournment within the period of three days would not prevent the return of the bill, but that it might be returned to the House when it reconvened. Perhaps you might make some regulation of law for that case; but why pass this bill in opposition to the practice of the Government from the beginning, and in opposition to the practice which we know actually prevented bills becoming laws under General Jackson, under Mr. Lincoln, and under Mr. Johnson, by which any adjournment of the two Houses by concurrent resolution before the ten days had expired induced the defeat of the bill if the President did not return it before the adjournment? Here, then, you have not only the plain signification of these clauses of the Constitution, but you have the practice of the Government itself; and to get away from both these considerations by such a provision as that which we have in the bill before us seems to me almost farcical. It is an attempt by statute to create an individual a substitute for the Senate or for the House for the performance of plain, clear, imperative duties charged upon such House. If anything can violate both the letter and the spirit of the Constitution, it seems to me it must be such a bill as this.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I quite agree with the ground taken by the Senator from Pennsylvania. It does seem to me that it is absurd to say that we can make the delivery of a bill to the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, or the Speaker of the House, if you please, to be the return of the bill "to the House" in which it originated. The Constitution says that when a bill is presented to the President, "if he approve, he shall sign it; but, if not, he shall return it with his objections to that House in which it shall have originated." It contemplates that the bill shall pass from the custody of the President to the custody of the House in which it shall have originated; and we have no power, in my judgment, to say that it shall be sufficient to return it to the President of the Senate or the Speaker of the House or to the Secretary or Clerk. Suppose we say that he shall return it, if you please, to the Secretary and he may lay it before the Senate; suppose he loses it or he refuses to return it to the Senate, I ask you what is the remedy in that case? What has become of the bill? The Constitution does not contemplate such a condition of things. It provides that the President shall not return that bill to a subordinate officer, but that it shall pass from him to the custody of the Senate or of the House of Representatives, according to the House in which it shall have originated. The Constitution says so; and if we are bound to observe it in any respect certainly we are bound to observe it in this respect. If we can resolve or enact that the Secretary shall stand instead of the Senate, and place the bill in his custody, we can dispose of any other provision of the Constitution by similar construction.

Mr. President, I believe that the true construction of the Constitution is this: that the failure of the President to return a bill so that it shall not become a law will only prevent its becoming a law by the final adjournment of the two Houses; that is to say, the adjournment of Congress. If the Senate adjourns over on the tenth day the President is not even presumed to know that fact, and the adjournment over that day will not defeat the bill or make it a law. My opinion is, that the reason of the Constitution is given in the concluding clause, that it is the final adjournment which causes the failure of the bill if he does not return it within ten days and there is a final adjournment before the ten days expire. If on the tenth day the Senate is not in session, but it is in session on the eleventh, it is, in my judgment, a compliance with the spirit and with the reasoning of the Constitution to send the bill here on the eleventh day. But to send it to the Secretary, as was said by the Senator from Pennsylvania, at his office, or on the street, or at his hotel, or to the President of the Senate at his rooms or at a party, is not a compliance with the Constitution. The Constitution does not mean that. I think it would be safer and I think it would be better to enact simply that if the Senate or House of Representatives shall not be in session on the tenth day, there being no final adjournment of Congress, it shall be sufficient if the bill shall be returned on the eleventh, twelfth, or fifteenth day, when it shall actually be in session. It would be just as good for the private Secretary of the President to retain a bill as for the Secretary of the Senate; just as much a compliance with the provision of the Constitution; and it would be just as satisfactory to my mind for the President to retain it during the odd days as for the Secretary of the Senate to do so.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that the bill is not founded upon the correct principle in that respect. I agree that it is the final adjournment of Congress, of both Houses, that was intended to defeat a bill. That is the spirit and meaning of the Constitution; and if we start out with that as a key, we shall find that it makes no difference whether the bill be returned on the eleventh or twelfth day, if that be the first day that the Senate or House shall be in session after the ten; but to say that it may be returned to a subordinate officer, to the Secretary or to the President of the Senate, or to the Speaker of the House, and that that shall be a compliance with the Constitution, it does seem to me, in the language of the Senator from Pennsylvania, is absurd.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 29, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cameron, Cattell, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Drake, Edmunds, Essenden, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Howe, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Tipton, Van Winkle, Williams and Wilson—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, McCreery, Morton, Norton, Saulsbury, Vickers and Willey—11.

ABSENT—Messrs. Chandler, Ferry, Fowler, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Nye, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Thayer, Trumbull, Wade and Yates—14.

So the bill was passed.

ADMISSION TO IMPEACHMENT TRIAL.

Mr. SHERMAN submitted the following order for consideration:

Ordered, That the order of the 10th of March instant, relative to admission to the galleries, be suspended until further order, and that the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate shall take special care that order shall be observed in the galleries during the trial of the impeachment now proceeding; and he is hereby authorized to arrest and bring before the Senate any person who violates the order of the Senate; and he shall take effective measures to secure admission to the diplomatic gallery, the ladies' gallery, and the reporters' gallery to those only who are entitled to admission thereto under the rules.

Mr. CONNESS. I object to the consideration of that.

Mr. SHERMAN. I only ask that it lie on the table for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed order will lie over under the rules.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 350) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the prompt settlement of public accounts," approved March 3, 1817.

The message also announced that the House had adopted a replication to the answer of the President of the United States to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him, which would be presented to the Senate by the managers on the part of the House.

LINCOLN MONUMENT ASSOCIATION.

Mr. CONNESS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution No. 216, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs this morning.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. R. No. 216) to authorize the Secretary of War to place at the disposal of the Lincoln Monument Association damaged and captured ordnance. It proposes to authorize the Secretary of War to place at the disposal of the Lincoln Monument Association, incorporated by act of Congress, approved March 30, 1867, damaged and captured guns and ordnance, out of which to cast the statues of the principal figures surmounting and to be incorporated in the structure; but no metal is to be thus appropriated until the voluntary contributions actually in the hands of the treasurer shall amount to $100,000.

Mr. GRIMES. I inquire whether that is intended to include anything except bronze cannon?

Mr. CONNESS. Unquestionably not.

Mr. GRIMES. Then that word had better be inserted.

Mr. CONNESS. They cannot use anything else.

Mr. GRIMES. They may not be able to use anything else in the construction of their monument; but it includes all damaged ordnance, as I understand, which would amount to millions of dollars.

Mr. CONNESS. Put in the words, "brass or bronze."

Mr. GRIMES. I move to insert the word "bronze."

IMPEACHMENT OF PRESIDENT JOHNSON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour has arrived when the chair must be vacated, that the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States may preside over the trial of the impeachment of the President of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore vacated the chair.

On the adjournment of the Senate, sitting for the trial of the impeachment, at three o'clock and twenty-eight minutes p. m., the President pro tempore resumed the chair.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope not. There is unfinished business that ought to be disposed of. I hope we shall go on with the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ANTHONY. On that motion I wish to say that when the Senate adjourned last the unfinished business was the consideration of the report of the select Committee for the Revision of the Rules, and I hope we shall go on with that.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved and seconded that the Senate do now adjourn. The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I renew my motion for an executive session.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope not.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope we may proceed with executive business.

The motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 350) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the prompt settlement of public accounts," approved March 3, 1817; and

A bill (H. R. No. 832) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business, and after an hour spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 24, 1868.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

By unanimous consent the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The House resumed the consideration of the business pending at the adjournment, being the replication to the answer of the President to the articles of impeachment and the resolution relating thereto reported by the managers, upon which Mr. ELDRIDGE was entitled to the floor.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. It would seem from the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] that this matter is never to cease to be a subject of levity. In the impeachment of the President the proceedings from the beginning up to this hour have been treated, not only as a mere matter of form, but as a subject for trifling and for amusing those who happen to give their attention upon the House of Representatives.

The gentleman from Massachusetts tells us that when the question was raised in England whether an impeachment was in the name of all the people of England some one was heard to exclaim that it was not, that that individual did not assent, and he said that it was understood to be a ranting old woman. Well, sir, it is not necessary for old women to come here to rant, for we have plenty of ranters upon this subject in the House of Representatives.

Mr. BLAINE. On which side?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman from Maine asks me on which side. I should suppose he knew, coming right from that quarter.

Mr. RANDALL. He is a very fair specimen himself.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Yes, he is a very fair specimen himself. I adopt that remark.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts undertakes to say that this replication has been prepared with reference to the answer of the President, that it is a mere formal matter, and that they only gave notice in the Senate that they would probably be prepared, with the consent of the House, to file this replication at one o'clock to-day. Now, that may be the understanding of the gentleman from Massachusetts, but we had the statement of the leading manager, Mr. BINGHAM, of Ohio, on last evening to the contrary, when he desired that the House should authorize the managers in their discretion to file just such replication as they should see fit. I read from his remarks:

"The managers, anticipating the answer which has been presented by him, are prepared, as soon as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] may come in, to present, for the consideration of the House a general replication to the answer which the President has filed to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him. I have made some inquiries since I left the Senate Chamber, but have not been able to ascertain with certainty where the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] now is."

Now, sir, there can be no other construction put upon that language than that before the managers had ever heard a word of the answer of the President they had prepared in form a replication to that answer. They do not consider the facts of the case. They do not look at the President's declarations and answer them either specifically or generally; but they prepare and present to this House an answer in form before they are informed what the answer of the President is to be.

Now, sir, I said last evening that I did not desire the managers of this impeachment proceeding—much as I respect them as individuals, much as I have confidence in them as gentlemen—to answer in my name upon their own discretion. Every one of these managers was known to have convicted the President, without regard to evidence, without regard to the answer, without regard to the defense, when they were appointed. The gentleman from Ohio tells us that—"It is, in short, a traverse to all the material allegations in the answer; a denial of matters and things set up."

Is the impeachment of the President so much a matter of form that whatever he may answer, whether he answer truly or falsely, the managers are to deny his answer? Has the subject of impeachment become so much a matter of form that whatever may be said by the President in response, whether it be a confession or a denial of the charges, it is to be denied by the managers before the answer comes in? Is this the form and is this the proceeding by which you are to remove the Chief Magistrate of this great nation? Suppose the President had come in and confessed many of the facts charged, (and I understand that he does admit many of the facts that are charged in the articles against him,) do the managers consider it proper and that they are authorized to deny those? Are they prepared, as the gentleman from Ohio said they were prepared, in advance with a general denial of all matters and things set up by the President? If the managers are prepared thus recklessly, thus without regard to the truth or falsity of the allegations, to deny whatever the President may say, I do not want those gentlemen to file an answer for me; I do not wish them to be authorized to act in my name, even at the hazard of being styled by the gentleman from Massachusetts a ranting old woman.

Now, sir, the President has spread out in extenso facts covering the entire charges contained in the articles. So far as he has undertaken to state facts and not conclusions, so far as he has undertaken to give a version of what has transpired of the facts and circumstances upon which the articles are founded, I believe he has stated God's truth, and I believe that the majority of this House to-day believe that what he has stated is true. Why, then, should not the House, with frankness and sincerity, come forward and meet and admit upon the record whatever the President has stated which is true? We are acting upon our oaths of office, upon our honor as Representatives, and are not expected by the people we represent to deny or withhold the truth. We are not hired attorneys, but our interest and that of our constituents and the highest interest of our country demand that we should develop the truth and act upon it. Why should we here, a House of Representatives, impeaching the President of the United States, deny all that he may state, whether it be true or whether it be false? Why should we not come up and meet the case, admit such facts as are true, consider the answer clause by clause and fact by fact; wherever we can find that the President has stated the truth admit in our replication that he has done so? Why send forth to the country a false replication denying those things which we know to be truths? Why should we tell the country that all the President has said is a lie, when we know that the major part of the answer is true?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. A question? Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman state, as a lawyer, who has, I know, looked into the precedents upon this point, whether he can point out any case which has been tried except upon the general issue of not guilty?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. It matters not—

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. And whether any other issue can be made, and whether in this case any other replication could have been filed than that which has been presented to-day?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] tells us that the answer of the President is an unprecedented answer. He tells us that it has not ordinarily been the case that the respondent comes in and specially denies the charges made against him. Now, if that be unprecedented—and it is certainly admitted here, the managers admit that it is correct practice, that the President may so state the fact, may so plead—then why is it that we may not, in our replication boldly and fairly and honestly and truthfully meet the President upon the statement, and admit such facts as he states to be true, and which we know to be true, which we cannot deny? Certainly there can be nothing in the answer that can require us to answer a falsehood. Why not, then, narrow down the trial by answering the truth? Why not thus lessen the necessity for taking up the time of the House and causing expense to the country? Would not the course for which I contend narrow the issue, and save calling a multitude of witnesses? Whenever the President states a fact which the witnesses will prove, which we know they will prove, what is the necessity for putting in a denial and putting the President and the country to the expense and trouble of calling witnesses to prove that fact? Why not the managers consider the answer of the President fact by fact, statement by statement, paragraph by paragraph, and deny only such things in the answer as they know they can prove to be false?

Mr. HIGBY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

The SPEAKER. The ten minutes allowed to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] have expired, and the gentleman from Massachusetts is now entitled to the floor.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I will yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. HIGBY] for a question, if the gentleman from Massachusetts will allow me time to reply to it.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Very well.

Mr. HIGBY. I desire to ask the gentleman if he is in a great hurry to have the President tried?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman from California [Mr. HIGBY] is continuing the same levity and insincerity which has been practiced all the way through.

Mr. HIGBY. Not at all.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I will say to the gentleman that I am anxious to save expense to the country. I care not, so far as I am individually or personally concerned, whether the trial be hurried up or delayed. But I would have just as few facts as possible to be controverted by testimony. I would act with truth and in good faith. To admit truth is good faith, and that would be good practice, too; and that I am in favor of.

Mr. HIGBY. I am glad the gentleman has made that declaration.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, of the managers, [Mr. WILLIAMS.]

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] seems to be of the opinion that this case is to be tried upon the technical rules of pleading which are applicable in the trial of cases in courts of common law. I beg leave to remind him that it has been already openly confessed by the President's counsel themselves, who, doubtless, well understand their case, that a case of this sort is to be tried, not by the rules which prevail in the common law courts, but by the law of Parliament itself. The gentleman will also remember the emphatic declaration of one of the leading counsel of the President made before the Senate—I think I do not misquote the declaration—that they thanked the managers for the remark that they intended to try this case without reference to artistic rules, and upon such great principles as had been heretofore laid down and recognized as a part of the law of Parliament. The counsel, I say, thanked one of the managers for the expression of that opinion, and joined in the declaration that it was no case wherein a demurrer would be proper.

And now, sir, I desire to say a word in regard to the pleadings. They are something peculiar. The counsel for the defendant are doubtless learned, and as we all know, very ingenious men, who have come here, fresh from their practice in the courts, for the purpose of trying this case. They have put in a series of answers having very much the character of an answer in chancery. There is no plea; there is no demurrer. In this particular the answer filed by them has, I think, no precedent. Now, what are the managers under these circumstances to do? It stands confessed, as I have remarked already, by the defendant's counsel themselves, that a demurrer in a case of this sort would not be proper. The gentleman from Wisconsin admits, if I understand him correctly, that there is no such precedent. We come, then, before this House upon the hypothesis that there is but one issue to be tried; and that is the general issue of guilty or not guilty.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman allow me a further suggestion? I made no point with reference to the insufficiency of the answer, or the insufficiency of the replication. My position is this: That the President having gone on and stated the facts, covering specifically the ground of the charges against him, we ought to meet him fairly and confess or admit such facts as we cannot controvert by proof, thereby narrowing the issue, saving expense to the country, and avoiding the necessity of calling a large number of witnesses to testify with regard to facts which we cannot deny.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman, then, expects us to follow the President in the answer which he has made, and to put in a special replication precisely as we would do in a case in the common law courts.

Mr. CHANLER. I rise to a point of order; that the answer made by the President is not properly before the House.

The SPEAKER. This question, with regard to the replication, necessarily involves a consideration of the answer; and the latter is therefore before the House.

Mr. CHANLER. The answer has not been presented to the House or read in our presence. The House has not received that answer in any official form.

The SPEAKER. When the answer was read in the Senate, the House, in accordance with its own resolution, was in attendance there for the specific purpose of hearing the proceedings. It is, therefore, to be presumed that every member of the House was present and heard the answer read.

Mr. CHANLER. I beg to correct the Chair. The House was at the bar of the Senate as a Committee of the Whole, and the Speaker was there as a Representative from his State, not as Presiding Officer of the House of Representatives. Hence he is now assuming a fact which has not come to his knowledge as Presiding Officer of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point made by the gentleman on the ground that the House takes official cognizance of all proceedings in the Committee of the Whole as well as in the House; whether the Speaker or the chairman of the Committee of the Whole presides does not affect the question.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Wisconsin takes occasion to complain of the language of the chairman of the managers in regard to the preparation of this replication. The gentleman maintains that because the chairman said that we would be prepared on behalf of the House to submit the replication at one o'clock to-day, therefore, we have prejudged the case. He charges that we have already decided in favor of the President's conviction. I beg the gentleman to answer whether upon the same sort of evidence he has not prejudged the case by declaring in favor of the President's acquittal. In this particular he stands upon precisely the same platform as ourselves, with this difference: that we in this question represent the House, while he ought to stand unaffected as one of its members.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I voted against the articles—all of them—believing them to be untrue.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. Exactly; so the gentleman has as much prejudged the case in favor of the President's innocence as any of the managers or any other member of the House can have prejudged it in favor of the President's guilt.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. My point was that they had prepared their replication in advance, anticipating the President's answer.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. Anticipate the answer! What other answer, I ask the gentleman as a lawyer, could have been made to the plea of not guilty, or that substantially equivalent, to wit, guilty? Can he name any other? Did he expect us to depart from the parliamentary practice to enter upon a long series of special pleas as he would have done as a lawyer in a civil cause? That would be precisely playing into the hands of the President and his counsel, whose object, I assume, and I do not think I speak uncharitably or without the book, is nothing more nor less than delay. Is the process of technical proceeding to be formed in a great cause of this sort where the interests of the nation, its very life, I may say, are involved? Does the gentleman want delay? Does he hope to perpetuate this examination down until the close of the term of the President, as was suggested significantly by the gentleman who sits at his own side in the debate on the articles of impeachment? Why, sir, we were threatened in advance we could not put this case through before the expiration of his term, and I know there was a general feeling in the country of that sort, and there may have been at one time a feeling in this House of that kind. And we have evidence, I think, it was the expectation of the President himself from outgivings which seemed at all events to be semi-official that the case could be prolonged indefinitely in this way.

Why, I ask gentlemen, may not this replication have been prepared in advance and without hearing the case of the President when there was no other, he must confess himself, which could have properly been made in order to join the issue in this cause? I have asked them what other than a general replication could be put in? If so, why is it necessary to wait for the answer.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. If the gentleman will allow me, I have answered repeatedly that he might by replication confess such facts the President has stated which could not be denied by evidence and only deny such facts as he could disprove.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. Exactly; the gentleman comes back again and urges the special plea. The plea is one in confession and avoidance, and we are expected to make a special reply—a special reply on every answer. I have examined the precedents to some extent, and I find no case but this in which the party has failed to put in, in connection with his answer, the plea of not guilty. Here it has been avoided, whether purposely or not I do know.

I have some doubts myself, as I am constrained to say, whether we should not have gone back to the Senate and compelled the accused to put in a plea of not guilty in form. I have deferred to the judgment of my colleagues in the expression of the opinion disclosed in this replication that, inasmuch as there could be no issue, the President himself was in default if he failed to put in this plea, and we might take the whole of the answer as a substantial plea of not guilty.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Let me say one word to the gentleman from Pennsylvania and only a word. The point I endeavored to make was that the House of Representatives, through their managers, having accepted the answer, the special answer, put in by the President, they are bound by that answer and it was their duty to reply to it specially to deny or confess the facts as stated.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I have asked the gentleman for a precedent, and I ask again, in which any motion of this sort has been entertained?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is there any case on record where the managers of an impeachment allowed such an answer as the President's to stand?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Illinois will answer the gentleman on that.

I desire to say on another point that what the gentleman has said is only a rehearsal of what has been declared by other gentlemen on the same side of the House that the facts stated in the President's answer are true—they are, to use his emphatic language, God's truth. I do not think God recognizes any truth of that sort. [Laughter.] Does the gentleman undertake to say that the speeches charged to have been made by the President at St. Louis, at Cleveland, and at Washington were not true?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The President says he did not make them in the form in which they are charged.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. He denies that he made them as they are charged; the gentleman affirms that that denial is true, and therefore that the President never made any such a speech. I put it to him whether he believes it himself? [Laughter.]

Mr. LOGAN. I ask the gentleman to yield to me a moment.

Mr. BOUTWELL. For a moment.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire merely to answer the remark of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Wood,] that no managers ever made such a replication. In the trial of Warren Hastings a committee was appointed to examine the Journal of the House of Lords, and they reported, from an examination of three centuries, that no demurrer or exception could be found as having been taken to articles or answers. There is no precedent except that the articles are to be answered, and then the general replication is put in. That the gentleman will find to be the law, so far as usage is concerned, in impeachment cases.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Woodward,] and at the close of his remarks I shall feel it my duty to ask for a vote.

Mr. WOODWARD. I have no desire to embarrass this proceeding, but as the managers have made their report to the House and we are now being consulted, I suppose it is proper for any member of the House to point out to the managers any difficulties that may occur to him in this proceeding. I do it with no disposition to embarrass the gentlemen or this proceeding, but, if possible, to give to our record something like that legal respectability to which it is entitled.

It is said by the managers that this is not a case for special pleading, and that there are no instances of special pleading on record. But will gentlemen please to remember that they are pleading specially? They have pleaded specially in their articles against the President, and the President has pleaded specially in answer to those articles, and now these gentlemen come in to reply specially to that plea. It is too late, therefore, for them to talk about this being a case for special pleading.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. A single question. Does the gentleman consider an indictment or declaration in the nature of special pleading?

Mr. WOODWARD. Undoubtedly. Mr. Speaker, I am amazed at some things. Does not my colleague know that all pleading is an alteration between the parties litigant for the single purpose of presenting and developing an issue? That is the only object. I do not care whether you call it general or special, indictment or declaration; the whole purpose of the science of pleading is to bring out an issue. That is done by the mutual alterations of the parties, and until those alterations result in an issue there is nothing to try. That is horn-book law.

Now, I am not quarreling about what you may call it. Here is the President of the United States arraigned on a bill or an indictment to which he has put in a plea, and we are now maturing a replication to that plea. Now, in regard to the eleventh article, I ask the attention of lawyers in this House, who are now being consulted, to what the President has to reply to. You will remember that the article charges him with indulging in undue criticism of Congress and its legislation, speaking of them with disrespect. I give the substance; I do not pretend to give the charge in full. Now, what does the President say in answer to that charge? I will read the material portion of his answer to that charge:

"But this respondent, in further answer to, and in respect of, the said allegations of the said eleventh article hereinbefore traversed and denied, claims and insists upon his personal and official right of freedom of opinion and freedom of speech, and his duty in his political relations as President of the United States to the people of the United States in the exercise of such freedom of opinion and freedom of speech, in the same manner, form, and effect as he has in this behalf stated the same in his answer to the said tenth article, and with the same effect as if he here repeated the same; and he further claims and insists, as in said answer to said tenth article he has claimed and insisted, that he is not subject to question, inquisition, impeachment, or inculpation, in any form or manner, of or concerning such rights of freedom of opinion or freedom of speech or his said alleged exercise thereof.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman—

Mr. WOODWARD. Wait a moment, if you please.

Mr. BINGHAM. I only want the gentleman to read the last line.

Mr. WOODWARD. I am replying to gentlemen. I say that there the President has planted himself upon his freedom of opinion and freedom of speech. He denies that that is an impeachable offense. And what says the Constitution of the United States?

"Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or prohibiting the freedom of speech or of the press."

Now, Mr. Speaker, if this Congress can make no law prohibiting the President from doing precisely that which he is now impeached for doing; if we could make no law upon the subject which he might not violate without being impeachable therefor, then, in the name of Heaven, how are we now going to impeach him for exercising that freedom of speech which the Constitution secures to him? He claims that he has only exercised his constitutional right of freedom of speech. What says the replication? "A general replication," the gentleman says, as if he had pleaded not guilty. But he has not pleaded not guilty to this eleventh article. He has confessed that he has indulged in criticisms on Congress, and he has planted himself upon his constitutional right to indulge in such criticisms. Now, what is your replication?

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman will find by referring to the last lines of the answer that the President says he is not guilty.

Mr. WOODWARD. I have eliminated the substance, the point, the pith of his reply to this eleventh article.

Mr. BINGHAM. You have omitted the real answer.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me a word?

Mr. WOODWARD. If I have an opportunity to say a word in reply.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I cannot yield further.

Mr. WOODWARD. I have no desire to consume time.

Mr. BOUTWELL. If we can have general consent of the House that the replication may be considered as adopted at five minutes before one o'clock, without the yeas and nays, I am willing that the debate shall go on until that time.

Mr. WOOD. We shall insist upon our right to have the yeas and nays.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Then I ask that the question may be now taken.

The question was upon adopting the following resolution:

Resolved, That the House hereby adopts the replication to the answer of the President, as now submitted by the managers.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Upon this question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 116, nays 36, not voting 37; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Butler, Cake, Churchill, Reader W. So the motion was adopted.

Mr. BOUTWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I offer for adoption the following resolution, upon which I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate by the Clerk of the House informing the Senate that the House of Representatives has adopted a replication to the answer of the President of the United States on the articles of impeachment exhibited against him, and that the same will be presented to the Senate by the managers on the part of the House.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. BOUTWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has commenced, and reports are in order from the Committee of Ways and Means.

REFUNDING OF DUTIES.

Mr. SCHENCK, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported back, without amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 881) refunding duties paid under protest on the importation from France of a bell donated for the use of St. Mary's Institute and Notre Dame University, Indiana.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to refund to Rev. Edward Sorin the amount of duties paid by him under protest to the collector of the port of New York, in 1867, on a bell donated and imported from France for the use of St. Mary's Institute and Notre Dame University, institutions incorporated by the State of Indiana for literary and philosophical purposes.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope the House will pass the bill at once on the explanation which I shall submit. There is a provision at present in the law that all philosophic apparatus and instruments and various articles for the use of scientific, literary, religious, and benevolent associations shall be imported free of duty. The metal of which the bell referred to in this bill was manufactured was composed in great measure of American copper from Lake Superior, and the bell was presented by a foreign religious society to the Sisters of a Catholic institution of learning in Indiana. The Treasury Department decided upon a strict construction of the law that this bell could not come in free of duty. The duties upon the bell have been paid in behalf of this literary institution under protest, and this bill proposes to refund to them, upon general principles and upon the merits of the case, as well as under what might be considered a fair construction of the law, the duties thus paid by them.

Mr. DRIGGS. What is the amount they want refunded?

Mr. MOORHEAD. It is about twelve hundred dollars.

Mr. SCHENCK. It is a little over two thousand dollars. That does not, however, affect the principle of the case nor the reasons of the committee. It was thought by the committee that perhaps by a strict construction of the law this bell, as a casting, might possibly come within the general description of casts that are permitted to come in free for religious, benevolent, and literary institutes; or, if not under that, that under the general term of "instruments" for the benefit of such institutions it might come in free. But, as I said before, under a strict construction of the law, the Secretary of the Treasury has determined that it cannot be received free of duty. This has thrown upon these petitioners the necessity of applying to Congress for the relief which they now pray. There was a case occurred in the last Congress, where relief was extended, that seems to the committee to involve not at any rate more equity than this, but the same principle upon which they would extend relief in this case. It was a case where there had been a statue or a group of statuary presented to the city of New York for their Central Park. It did not come literally and strictly within the provisions of the law, yet the Committee of Ways and Means of the last Congress reported in favor of remitting the duties on an object of art introduced for the public benefit, and Congress, acting upon the merits of the case, at once passed the bill. In that case, as in this, the article was a gift.

The joint resolution of March 26, 1867, provides:

"That from and after the passage of this joint resolution any object of art imported by any individual or association of individuals for presentation, as a gift, to the United States Government, or to any State, county, or municipal government, shall be admitted free of duty, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe."

What led to the passage of this joint resolution was the presentation of statuary to the city of New York for the Central Park. Now, whatever considerations of equity apply in a case of that kind apply, we think, with equal force to this case; for, although here the article was not imported as a gift to the United States or a State or a municipal corporation, it has been imported as a gift to a literary institution—a Catholic college in Indiana. And, if the merits of the institution are to be considered, I may say that almost all the Sisters connected with this college left it during the war for the purpose of going South to nurse our sick and wounded soldiers; and thus the business of the institution was during the war almost suspended. I do not know I ought to occupy the House any further than by stating the case that is before them is one, in the opinion of the committee, carrying merit in itself independent of law, and one which is admitted ought by liberal construction of law to be relieved from this burden. I will read the general provision for the information of the House:

"All books, maps, charts, mathematical, nautical instruments, philosophical apparatus, and all other articles whatever, imported for the use of the United States; all philosophical apparatus, instruments, books, maps, and charts, statues, statuary, busts, and casts of marble, bronze, alabaster, or plaster of Paris; paintings and drawings, etchings, specimens of sculpture, cabinets of coins, medals, regalia, gems, and all collections of antiquities: Provided, That same be specially imported, in good faith, for the use of any society incorporated or established for philosophical, literary, or religious purposes, or for the encouragement of the fine arts, or for the use or by the order of any college, academy school, or seminary of learning in the United States."

Here is an importation, a gift for a seminary, but it happens to be a bell instead of an instrument of some other kind, and the Secretary doubted whether a bell came within the letter of the law, though it is admitted on all hands it came within its spirit.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXEMPTION FROM TAX.

Mr. SCHENCK, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported back the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 900, to exempt certain manufactures from internal tax, and moved that the bill and amendments and accompanying report be printed, so as to get them up to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

Agreeably to order, at one o'clock p. m., the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole, (Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, in the chair,) and proceeded to the bar of the Senate.

At twenty-five minutes before four o'clock p. m. the Committee of the Whole returned to the Hall, and the Speaker having resumed the chair,

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, said: As chairman of the Committee of the Whole I have to report that the committee have, according to order, attended the trial by the Senate of the impeachment of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States; that the replication of the managers of the House was presented in their presence; that progress was made in the trial; and that the Senate sitting for the said trial adjourned to meet on Monday next, the 30th instant, at one o'clock.

ASSISTANT SECRETARY COOPER.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following communication from the Secretary of the Treasury:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
March 21, 1868.

SIR: In response to the resolution of the House of Representatives directing the Secretary of the Treasury to inform the House whether Edmund Cooper is now performing the duties of Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, or has been at any time since the rejection of his nomination by the Senate of the United States, and if so, by what authority of law, I have the honor to say that Mr. Cooper was on the 2d day of December last, in consequence of a vacancy caused by the resignation of W. B. Chandler, Esq., authorized to perform the duties of Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, in pursuance of the act of Congress approved February 13, 1795, and that he has continued to perform the duties of that office from the time when he was so authorized to the present, the period for which the vacancy may by law be thus supplied not having yet expired.

I deem it proper to add that the action of the President in this regard is in accordance with many precedents which have arisen in this Department both before and since the passage of the act of February 20, 1863, the constant understanding having been that the act of 1795 had not been repealed by that of 1863, but still remained in full force. The case of Maunsell B. Field, Esq., is especially deserving of attention as being in all material respects similar to that of Mr. Cooper. Mr. Field was on the 1st day of October, 1863, authorized by President Lincoln, at the request of Mr. Secretary Chase, to perform the duties of Assistant Secretary of the Treasury during the absence of George Harrington, Esq., at that time the incumbent of the place. Mr. Field not being an officer of either of the Executive Departments whose appointment is vested in the President. He performed the duties of the office from the time he was so authorized until the 18th of March, 1864.

I am, very respectfully,
H. McCULLOCH,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker House of Representatives.

On motion of Mr. SCHENCK, the communication was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

FRAUDS IN PRINTING CURRENCY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with a resolution of the House of the 17th instant, in regard to the regulations for the detection of frauds in the printing of postal and fractional currency; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

GOVERNMENT LANDS IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a resolution of the constitutional convention of South Carolina approving the petition of certain citizens of South Carolina relative to certain lands belonging to the Government; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

EXEMPTION FROM TAX—AGAIN.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, just before the House went into the Committee of the Whole and proceeded to the Senate I had the floor for the purpose of reporting a bill from the Committee of Ways and Means, and, not anticipating that we should return so soon I consented that the bill which I was then prepared to report for the relief of certain manufacturers from taxes should be printed with the amendments of the Senate and the further amendments of the House. On that account I am not prepared to go on with the consideration of the bill to-day. I am willing to yield the floor for the accommodation of gentlemen who may desire to present other matters, with the understanding that the committee may have the floor to-morrow morning.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. What is the regular order?

The SPEAKER. The morning hour, to which the Committee of Ways and Means are entitled.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. How much of the hour remains?

The SPEAKER. Fifty minutes.

Mr. SCHENCK. If my suggestion is not agreeable to gentlemen, I will move to adjourn now, and go on to-morrow with this bill. Or if the bill can be taken up while it is at the printer's I am willing to do that. But I suppose that is not practicable.

The SPEAKER. That cannot be done.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then I will yield to my colleague, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

IOWA WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is a report from the commissioners appointed to examine into the war claims of the State of Iowa, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, together with all the testimony and vouchers in the case. They are all in the hands of the committee. The report itself will occupy only about ten or fifteen pages. I ask that it be printed and recommitment to the committee.

By unanimous consent the report was accordingly ordered to be printed and recommitment to the Committee on Military Affairs.

HARPER'S FERRY.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on Military Affairs Senate bill No. 186, providing for the sale of the lands, tenements, and water privileges belonging to the United States at and near Harper's Ferry, in the county of Jefferson, West Virginia.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of War to advertise and sell by public auction the lands, tenements, and water privileges belonging to the United States at and near Harper's Ferry, except as hereinafter provided, in such parcels as shall, in his opinion, be best adapted to secure the greatest amount of money therefor, on a credit of one and two years, taking bonds of security from the purchasers, the proceeds to be applied as follows: 1. In defraying the expenses of making such sale. 2. In refunding to the United States the principal sum of purchase money paid for said lands, tenements, and water privileges by the United States and for the erection of buildings thereon. 3. If any surplus remains he shall deliver the same to such agent as the Legislature of the State of West Virginia shall appoint to receive the same, but upon condition that such surplus shall be received by the State of West Virginia to be set apart, held, invested, used, and applied as a part of the school fund of that State, as provided in the tenth article of the constitution of West Virginia and for no other purpose. And on making such sale of the property, or any part thereof, the Secretary of War is required, on receiving the purchase-money, to execute all the necessary deeds to the purchasers on behalf of the United States.

Section two directs the Secretary of War to convey by deed to Stover College, in West Virginia, certain portions of the aforesaid property heretofore assigned by the War Department to the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, for educational purposes, and all such portions as have heretofore been set apart by proper authority for religious and charitable purposes.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object to that bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I thought the bill was before the House.

The SPEAKER. It was not. It was merely read for information.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object to the provisions of this bill. If members have attended to the reading of the bill they will see that instead of this money coming into the Treasury, to be appropriated by us in various ways as we may see fit, this bill makes an appropriation of a certain amount of it to be determined on by parties over whom we have no control.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman can move an amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I cannot move such an amendment as I want to now.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I think that the bill in this form would be an economical measure, because under it there will be somebody interested in having the property bid for and sold at a price something near what it is worth. I think that if it should be passed in this shape, West Virginia would perhaps be interested in seeing that the property is bid up high enough to cover the United States claim so that they may get something for themselves.

The SPEAKER. The bill is not before the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will withdraw his objection.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. No, sir; I object.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is the objection of one member sufficient to defeat the reception of the bill?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is it not a report from the Committee on Military Affairs?

The SPEAKER. It is; but that committee is not now called for reports.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the bill be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled an act (S. No. 350) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the prompt settlement of public accounts," approved March 3, 1817; and an act (H. R. No. 832) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869; when the Speaker signed the same.

TITLE TO INDIAN LANDS.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire and report whether public lands sold under treaties with Indian tribes are held by a valid title, and whether such lands can be sold except in pursuance of a law duly enacted by Congress.

Mr. ALLISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARINE FORTIFICATIONS.

Mr. HIGBY. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the concurrent resolutions, which I send to the Clerk's desk, for the purpose of reference to the joint select Committee on Ordnance.

The Clerk read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the Secretary of War be directed to advertise not less than thirty days for proposals to ascertain the cost of constructing one of Ryan Hitchcock's revolving iron forts at the entrance to the bay of the city of New York.

And be it further resolved, &c., That the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy be directed to organize a board, consisting of the General of the Army and the Admiral or vice admiral of the Navy, to inquire into the utility and practicability of the Ryan Hitchcock mode of marine fortification, with authority to make such experiments as they may deem proper.

Mr. ROSS. I object. We have got guns enough.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. PILE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 966) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi river in Madison county, Illinois; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

CAPTAIN GEORGE WRIGHT.

Mr. ELIOT, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a joint resolution (H. R. No. 246) directing the Secretary of State to present George Wright, master of the British brig J. & G. Wright, a gold chronometer, in appreciation of his personal services in saving the lives of three American seamen wrecked at sea on board of the American schooner Lizzie F. Choate, of Massachusetts; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution directs the Secretary of State to cause to be procured and presented to George Wright, master of the British brig J. & G. Wright, of St. John's, New Brunswick, a gold chronometer, in token of the appreciation by the Government of the United States of his humane and successful efforts in rescuing from death three American seamen on board the wreck of the American schooner Lizzie F. Choate, of Gloucester, Massachusetts, wrecked at sea on the 14th of February, 1863.

Mr. ELIOT. I will simply state in regard to this joint resolution that from the evidence laid before the committee they were satisfied that the conduct of this British master was such as to call for a proper recognition on the part of the Government of this country. He was master of the brigantine J. & G. Wright, and in the course of his voyage they encountered the wreck under circumstances which made it exceedingly perilous for any person to leave the vessel commanded by Captain Wright. It was ascertained that there were three persons on the wreck, which was entirely dismantled. The sea was running so roughly that the mate of the brig declined to leave the vessel for the purpose of going to the wreck. Under these circumstances Captain Wright himself went in a boat and at great peril of his life succeeded in rescuing from the wreck three American seamen and returned them to their homes. It was an act which we have always been glad to recognize. This joint resolution is in the usual form, simply authorizing the presentation to him of a chronometer, in token of our appreciation of his gallant act.

The joint resolution was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed unanimously.

Mr. ELIOT moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was not agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed an act (S. No. 366) regulating the presentation of bills to the President of the United States and the return of the same, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

HYGEIA HOTEL—FORTRESS MONROE.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Military Affairs a joint resolution in relation to an extension of the Hygeia Hotel, at Fortress Monroe, Virginia.

The joint resolution was read. It authorizes the Secretary of War to grant permission to Henry Clarke, proprietor of the Hygeia Hotel, at Fortress Monroe, Virginia, to enlarge the same; the whole lot on which said hotel is built being about one hundred feet front, and the improvement intended to be made only taking up forty feet of said front; also running the eaves of the roof to make it a flat instead of an inclined one, that being the form approved by Major General Schofield, commanding the first military district; Major General Humphreys, chief of engineers; and General Grant; provided that such enlargement or improvement, and any building hereafter erected by any person or persons upon the land of the United States at Fortress Monroe, shall be at once removed at the expense of the respective owners whenever the Secretary of War shall deem such removal necessary, and that no claim for damages therefor shall be made upon the Government of the United States.

Mr. ROSS. I object.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say that this joint resolution is precisely like one passed a few days ago.

Mr. ROSS. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. Objection having been made, the joint resolution is not before the House.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTORS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will try once more. I ask leave to submit the following resolution for consideration at this time:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the settlement of contested elections for electors of the President and Vice President of the United States, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. ROSS. I object to that resolution.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Ross] allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. ROSS. I will hear it.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is now no law, and there never has been a law, providing what shall be done in case of a contested election of presidential electors. It seems to me it would be a great calamity should the time ever come when one State of the Union, perhaps holding the balance of power, should appear in the Electoral College by two sets of electors claiming to be duly elected, and there was no provision of law to settle the question.

Mr. ROSS. Let the resolution be again read.

The resolution was read.

Mr. ROSS. I withdraw my objection.

The resolution was received and adopted.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SMALL UNITED STATES NOTES.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following preamble and resolution for consideration at this time:

Whereas there is a scarcity throughout the country of notes of a small denomination, both of the national banks and of the United States legal-tender notes, especially embarrassing to the people: Therefore,

Be it resolved by this House, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to issue an amount of United States notes of the denomination of ones and twos sufficient to supply the present deficiency in exchange for United States notes of a larger denomination and in making payments authorized by law.

Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. SPALDING objected.

Mr. BLAINE. It does not increase the circulation.

Mr. GARFIELD. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. SPALDING. I do not.

SURPLUS MARBLE, ETC., FOR CAPITOL.

Mr. DRIGGS. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following preamble and resolution for consideration at this time:

Whereas in the erection of the Capitol of the United States a very large amount of marble has been left over in consequence of imperfections in the material, or by reason of too large an amount having been purchased for the building aforesaid; and whereas much waste and loss is likely to accrue to the Government on account of the scattered and unprotected condition of this property: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be instructed to inquire whether there is not more marble in the open grounds and streets about the Capitol than is required for the completion of the public buildings, and whether the interest of the Government does not require that the surplus marble, and their railing recently removed from the old Hall, and all such other materials as are not required for the above purpose, be sold at public auction, after due notice, to the highest bidder, and to report to the House by bill or otherwise.

Mr. ROSS. I suggest that, so far as the building material is concerned, we need that in Illinois in erecting our new capitol, and it had better not be sold. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object to the resolution?

Mr. ROSS. No, sir.

There being no objection, the preamble and resolution were considered and agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Mr. Speaker, is there any regular order?

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the business of the morning hour.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I would like to get at it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I have a proposition to submit in regard to the consideration, to-morrow, of the bill relative to the taxation of manufactures. That bill would come up regularly in the morning hour; but as I desire that there shall be some few hours allowed for debate upon the bill, if such be the wish of the House, I suggest that by unanimous consent the bill be assigned as preferred business, to come up immediately after the morning hour, thus clearing the way for other committees to report during the morning hour. If this proposition be not assented to, then we shall have to occupy with this bill the morning hour to-morrow.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope that the arrangement proposed by my colleague [Mr. SCHENCK] will be agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. But, Mr. Speaker, I make this proposition with the understanding that the bill will certainly come up immediately after the morning hour. If there is anything in the way of that, I shall insist on the bill retaining its place in the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. It is impossible for the Chair to state with certainty whether anything will interfere with this bill, if it be fixed as the business immediately after the morning hour. If the House should adjourn upon some other business that would interfere; or if the Committee of Elections should call up a question of privilege that also would interfere. But the Chair supposes that neither of those things will occur, and that there will be a morning hour to-morrow.

Mr. SCHENCK. And then this will be the first business after the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. If the House grants its consent. Is there objection to the understanding that the bill (H. R. No. 900) relative to tax on certain manufactures shall be taken up immediately after the morning hour to-morrow?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I believe I must object.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move, then, that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the House (at four o'clock p. m.) adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By the SPEAKER: The petition of Silas M. Garrison, and numerous other citizens of Winston county, Alabama, praying for certain amendments to the homestead law.

By Mr. BENJAMIN: A petition from the cigar-makers of Hannibal, Missouri, in relation to the tax on cigars.

By Mr. DRIGGS: The petition of E. G. Merick, John A. Sloan, and 50 merchants, shipowners, and lake captains, praying for a light-house at Ausable, Lake Huron, Michigan.

Also, the petition of John S. Tully, register United States land office at New Orleans, praying Congress for relief.

By Mr. EGGLESTON: The petition of Henry J. Hunt, asking that a pension may be granted to Mrs. A. Snelling Chaplin.

By Mr. KERR: The petition of Alinzor Clark, for a renewal of patent No. 7134, issued March 5, 1850.

By Mr. KETCHAM: The petition of Sarah E. Ball, widow of James Ball, praying for a pension.

By Mr. O'NEILL: The petition of 82 citizens and firms in the city of Philadelphia, engaged in coffee-roasting and dealing in coffee, complaining that now they are obliged to be the collectors of taxes, and asking either that the additional duty or tax of one cent per pound upon roasted coffee be altogether taken off, or that the said tax be transferred to the coffee in its freshly-imported state, and that such coffee be made to bear the entire tax instead of its being laid, as now, partly upon the green and partly upon the roasted coffee.

By Mr. PAINE: A memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Milwaukee, asking for the enactment of a law to provide that imported merchandise received at any part of the United States and directed by invoice and bill of lading to any other port of entry, may be forwarded for entry to the custom-house of the port of destination without entry, warehousing, bonding, or other delay, at the port of arrival under suitable regulations.

By Mr. PERHAM: The petition of Edmund Johnson formerly captain of company E, thirty-first New York volunteers, for increase of pension.

By Mr. PHELPS: The petition of H. Wittich and others, citizens of Baltimore, Maryland, for such a revision of the revenue laws as will impose an increased duty on vinegar imported into the United States.

By Mr. ROBERTSON: The remonstrance of Thomas Reeve and 130 others, inventors of sewing-machine improvements, manufacturers, dealers, and users of sewing-machines, against the further extension of the patent of Elias Howe, jr. deceased, for improvements in sewing machines, originally granted September 10, 1846, and once extended for a term of seven years.

By Mr. VAN HORN, of New York: The petition of 57 citizens of Le Roy, New York, asking a reduction of taxes and the expenses of the Army and Navy; also a revision of the revenue laws in the interests of our own country.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 25, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's legislative proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 881) refunding duties paid under protest on the importation from France of a bell donated for the use of St. Mary's Institute and Notre Dame University, Indiana, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

IMPEACHMENT OF PRESIDENT JOHNSON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has received and will lay before the Senate resolutions adopted by the constitutional convention of North Carolina, returning thanks for the vigilance with which the House and Senate have proceeded in the matter of impeachment.

Several SENATORS. What are they? Let them be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will be read, if there be no objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolutions passed by the State constitutional convention of North Carolina, March 12, 1868.

Whereas the people of North Carolina, through their representatives in convention assembled, have viewed with not less indignation than apprehension the efforts on the part of the executive branch of the Government to throttle, circumscribe, and overrule its coordinate and legislative branch of the same; and whereas, in the opinion of this convention, success in such efforts would lead to an agrarianism alike dangerous to the liberties of the people and subversive of that good feeling and correct principle of republicanism which should be viewed not only with extreme jealousy and horror, but be marked by the unqualified condemnation of all lovers of good order and stable government:

Be it therefore resolved, That the thanks of the convention are due, and are hereby tendered, to those noble Representatives who have so promptly stepped forth in their power of impeachment to check and correct the evil threatened by the acts of an usurpative Executive.

Be it further resolved, That a copy of these resolutions, duly engrossed, be transmitted to the honorable the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the people of the United States.

Be it further resolved, That this convention tender to Brevet Major General Edward R. S. Canby and the officers of his command its thanks for the bold, fearless, unprejudiced, and manly manner in which they, each and all, have discharged the onerous and delicate duties devolving upon them under the reconstruction acts of Congress.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I object, Mr. President, to the reception of that paper, and for this reason: it purports to be addressed to the Senate of the United States, and the members of the Senate of the United States compose the court of impeachment; and any communication addressed to the members of that court upon the pending subject is improper to be entertained by the Senate, the Senate composing that court, as being an attempt to exercise an influence upon the minds of the judges.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware moves that the resolutions be not received.

The question being put, the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will lie on the table if no objection be made. The Chair hears no objection, and that course will be pursued.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 881) refunding duties paid under protest on the importation from France of a bell donated for the use of the Saint Mary's Institute and Notre Dame University, Indiana, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a memorial of the Lehigh Zinc Company, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 780) for the relief of Martha M. Jones, administratrix of Samuel T. Jones, deceased, without the amendment reported by the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. FERRY. I move that the memorial lie on the table, the matter having been acted upon by the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also presented the constitution adopted by the constitutional convention of the State of Louisiana March 7, 1868; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILSON presented a petition of Philip A. Bolling, a resident of Virginia, praying the removal of political disabilities imposed upon him by acts of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I present the memorial and proceedings of the Board of Trade of the city of Oswego, New York, and also of the common council of that city, praying the favorable consideration of the plan recommended by C. E. Blunt, lieutenant colonel of engineers, to General A. A. Humphreys, chief of engineers, at Washington, for the preservation of the harbor at the mouth of the Oswego river, on Lake Ontario. I move that these papers be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON presented a petition of citizens of Baltimore, Maryland, praying for the passage of a law giving a pension to the soldiers and the widows of soldiers of the war of 1812; which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTER OF ASSOCIATED PRESS.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer a resolution which relates to the order of business:

Resolved, That the Presiding Officer be authorized to admit to a seat on the floor the reporter of the New York Associated Press during the trial of the impeachment.

I learn authentically that the Associated Press have made arrangements to make as full and complete a report of the trial of the impeachment as is possible, and to send every day as much as the wires can take. It is, of course, very desirable for the public interests and very desirable for the Senate that this report, which is the first one that reaches the public and makes the greatest impression, in fact the only one that most people read, should be as full and accurate as possible. I am satisfied from examination that when we come to take testimony, to examine witnesses, it will be impossible for a reporter in the gallery to hear and report with sufficient distinctness to make such a report as we shall wish to go out to the country. The resolution which I offer is not mandatory, but authorizes the Presiding Officer, in his discretion, to assign a seat to the reporter for the Associated Press during the trial of this important matter. I know how reluctant the Senate has always been to extend the privilege of the floor, and I should not ask it for any permanent arrangement; but for this temporary purpose, it seems to me, it would be very desirable.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the resolution be read again.

The Secretary read the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the resolution? No objection being made, the question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. HOWE. Is that resolution just reported?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is just submitted.

Mr. HOWE. I wish it may lie over. If the Senator offering it has no objection I should like to have it lie over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution will lie over.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on the Library, to whom were referred resolutions submitted by Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, for the formation of a library of the Senate for the use of its members and committees and the appointment of a librarian, reported adversely thereon, and also asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the petition of Benjamin Rodgers, praying to be allowed pay as second lieutenant, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 360) to prevent and punish the unlawful use of public money and property, have directed me to recommend that it be indefinitely postponed, in consequence of another bill to the same effect having passed the House.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee, and the bill was indefinitely postponed.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN also from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 787) to prevent and punish the unlawful use of public money and property, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the petition of N. Callan, clerk of the levy court of the District of Columbia, praying that the register of Washington city, the register of Georgetown, and the clerk of the levy court be compensated for their services in preparing ballots and drawing the jurors for the courts of the District, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 177) regulating the rights of property of married women in the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment.

BILL RECOMMENDED.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move that Senate bill (S. No. 378) organizing a commission for the examination and decision of claims in the War Department be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary. There was an adverse report, and I wish the committee to look at it again.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOWARD. I now move to take up Senate bill No. 253, relating to the Central Branch Union Pacific railroad.

Mr. HENDERSON. I hope we shall be allowed to get through the morning business; I have a report in my hand that I desire to make.

Mr. FERRY. The bill can be taken up and laid aside informally.

Mr. HOWARD. The bill can be taken up and laid aside if there are any reports to be made. I wish to get this bill up because we have nearly finished the discussion upon it, and I think we can come to a vote in a few minutes.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to remark that every morning some Senator rises and asks that a bill be taken up, and that the morning business be presented to the Senate after the bill is already before the Senate. In that way Senators who desire to get up business are prevented from doing so; bills are pending during the whole time the morning business is gone through with. The better plan, in my judgment, is to get through with the morning business, and then give Senators an equal chance to get the floor to take up their bills.

Mr. HOWARD. I leave it to the disposition of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan, to take up the bill indicated by him.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Michigan what the purpose is in taking up the bill now?

Mr. HOWARD. To proceed with its consideration and take the final vote upon it as soon as we can.

Mr. CONKLING. At one o'clock there is a special order, as I understand.

Mr. HOWARD. There is more than half an hour between this and that time.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not think it possible to take up the bill the Senator proposes to take up and act upon it finally by that time.

Mr. HOWARD. I think we can do so. I apprehend there will not be much more discussion upon it.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not know what the Senator's view with regard to it is, but I am sure I am not alone in feeling that the vote ought not to be taken upon this bill until there is a little more exact understanding of some facts which, once or twice, when the bill was up, were canvassed and questioned. I wish to submit a few remarks myself, and I know of one or two other Senators who mean to do so. If the idea is to take it up with a view of disposing of it by one o'clock I must say that certainly it cannot be done; and if it is to be cut off by a special order then I think it is hardly worth while to take it up. I have no objection to taking it up at any time when it can be acted upon deliberately; but I do not think it is a bill which anybody ought to seek to press through without a fair hearing.

Mr. HOWARD. It has not been my disposition to press the bill through without a fair and complete hearing; and certainly the Senator from New York has not been deprived of any opportunity of speaking upon this bill, because I think he has consumed more time in his remarks upon it than has been consumed by all other Senators besides. I am entirely willing, however, to submit the question to the Senate, whether they will take up the bill or not.

Mr. CONKLING. I accept, with great humility, the rebuke of the Senator from Michigan as to the length of time I have expended upon this bill; but I beg to say, in mitigation of my offense—I will not undertake to justify or even to excuse it—but in mitigation of the wrong that I have committed, I beg to say that it involves $2,400,000, about seven hundred thousand of which, if it pass, are to be paid by the people whom I represent, or whom I endeavor to represent; and if I have been a little earnest in regard to it, perhaps something will be pardoned to the circumstances and the occasion. I beg to say, further, that I shall consider it my duty to submit some additional objections to the bill before I accept finally what I have been assured by those who are promoting and engineering it, namely, that it is perfectly idle to debate it and utterly idle to oppose any objection to its passage. I am ready to accept the situation, but not that part of the situation, until a fair statement has been made. I adopt the Athenian rule, "Strike, but hear me."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question on the motion of Mr. HOWARD, and declared that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. CONKLING. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 20, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Conness, Cragin, Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Harlan, Howard, Johnson, Nye, Pomeroy, Saulsbury, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Van Winkle, Vickers, Wade, Willey, and Wilson—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cole, Conkling, Corbett, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson of Tennessee, Sherman, Trumbull, and Williams—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Cattell, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Grimes, McCree, Morton, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ramsey, Ross, Sprague, Stewart, and Yates—17.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to make a report, with the permission of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. HOWARD. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive the report, if there be no objection.

TAXATION OF SCHOOL PROPERTY.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to report back the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 389) exempting property in the District of Columbia held and used for school purposes from local taxation, with certain amendments to it. I ask that it be considered now; it is a matter of some consequence, and it will take but a moment.

Mr. HOWARD. Let the other matter be laid aside informally.

Mr. CONKLING. I object to that. I object to any arrangement by which anything shall be passed over informally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no objection the amendment will be read.

Mr. JOHNSON. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made it is not in order, because there is another matter pending.

Mr. HARLAN. If Senators will allow me I will explain in one word what this is. The Senate passed a bill exempting school-houses in this city and Georgetown from taxation. The House has passed that bill with an amendment, and the Committee on the District of Columbia propose to adopt the House amendment with a few verbal amendments. That is all there is in it, and I hope no Senator will object. I understand some of this property is advertised for sale, and it is important that the measure be acted on at an early day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it cannot be considered, there being another bill before the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I desire to make a report.

Mr. HENDERSON. Do I understand that any objection was made to considering the report I presented?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If any objection is made, nothing is in order except the consideration of the bill before the Senate, taken up on the motion of the Senator from Michigan. [Mr. HOWARD.]

Mr. HENDERSON. I understand the objections were withdrawn.

Mr. CONKLING. I made no objection to this bill being considered, but merely to the suggestion that another bill should be passed by informally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] objected.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope we shall proceed with the consideration of the bill taken up.

Mr. STEWART. I desire to introduce a bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive it if there be no objection.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. STEWART asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 463) to provide for a temporary and provisional government for Alabama; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

CENTRAL BRANCH PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill

(S. No. 256) relating to the Central Branch Union Pacific Railroad Company is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. The pending question is on an amendment moved by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL] which will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment proposed by Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, which was in lines twenty-four and twenty-five to strike out the words "for any greater length of road than one hundred and fifty miles from" and in lieu thereof to insert "beyond;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That no subsidy in United States bonds shall be allowed to said Central Branch company beyond the termination of the one hundred miles on which bonds are already authorized to be issued on said line of railroad.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I hope the Senate will give some attention to this amendment; and I should be glad if the Senator who has charge of the bill would accept it without any discussion upon its merits. It seems to me that it challenges the judgment of the Senate on its mere presentation. Does anybody believe that it is necessary now to give anything more than lands in Kansas and Nebraska to build a railroad? and that is all that is proposed to be done by this Central Branch. If this amendment be adopted, it only cuts off the money subsidy and leaves the amount of lands, and even lands in my judgment are not necessary at the present time to secure the building of the road. The road may not be built as quickly without a subsidy of lands, but it would inevitably be built by private enterprise and by private capital. But I waive any objection to a donation of lands and only object to an additional subsidy of United States bonds.

It seems to me, Mr. President, monstrous that the United States should build so many of these Pacific railroads and so many branches, and yet when they get through not own a dollar of them. Private stockholders are to own and control the whole. If we were practicing upon the policy of some of the European Governments of building railroads, holding them, and running them at the expense and for the profit of Government, and thereby providing a sinking fund by which the national debt could be somewhat reduced or extinguished in process of time, that might be very well; but to do that it is now too late. Shall we do what is here proposed, build up a gigantic corporation and make this United States Government, like that of New Jersey, the mere appendage of a railroad company? I say it without intending any offense, for it is known that railroad corporations throughout the country, when they get the growth, capital, and character which we are giving to this one, do control, more or less, the destinies of the States where they are located; they control the politics as well as the business and the finances of States; and for one I do not desire that we shall so nurse and contribute to the growth of a great gigantic corporation that hereafter it may have more sway and power over the destinies of this country than ever the United States Bank had in all its glory.

Mr. President, we have been reducing taxation on the plea that we should thereby compel a reduction of expenditures, and I am informed that before our laws proposed for reducing taxation have gone into effect the receipts of the Treasury for the last month are $10,000,000 below the expenditures. I ask if Senators, in the face of such facts, are going on in the old routine of granting subsidies to every application that may be made for a road between here and the Pacific? for we must be aware that if we grant this there will be a dozen cases that will present themselves with infinitely stronger arguments in favor of them—some of them I may vote for myself—than can be found to support the bill before us. Take the various Territories that are strewn along all the way between our western States and the Rocky mountains and beyond, are they not as much entitled to branches of the Pacific railroad as Kansas and Nebraska? Who will pretend that they are not? I think they are vastly more entitled to our aid; and if they come here with such applications, with our committees, I will not say "organized to convict," but I will say, for experience justifies it in both Houses, that railroad bills sent to the railroad committees are almost invariably returned with a favorable response, and the minority in each House who are in favor of greater economy are not very fully represented on those committees. We do not find upon them many Senators or Representatives representing any portion of the Senate or House who are opposed to these gigantic schemes, at points where public necessity does not seem to justify the outlay.

Mr. President, I have an interest in the success of the measure, and it is so great that if I felt at liberty to vote for the bill I should deem myself compelled to withhold my vote, for I have, in proportion to my means, a large interest in a road that will be fed by this branch, and I could not, in conscience, vote in favor of it; because if I did I should be putting money, as it seems to me, in my own pocket. I trust that if other Senators are here with a like interest they will feel, as I have no doubt they do, an equal delicacy with myself about voting in favor of any such measure.

Now, Mr. President, what I propose is, that we shall strike out all the money subsidy, the provision for additional bonds, and leave the amount of lands donated as it is in the bill. I would not object seriously to the grant of lands, although I think it is altogether too much or more than is absolutely necessary; and if it were to come here independently on its merits I do not see how, at this late hour, we could vote to give even lands in Kansas and Nebraska for a railroad commencing at a point no further west than the Missouri river. I trust the Senate will adopt the amendment proposed by me.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. President, I am not embarrassed, as the Senator who has just taken his seat is, by having any interest in this company, either pecuniarily or locally. I suppose, locally considered, my interest would be adverse to it. I had not intended to say a word in relation to it, but have been appealed to by those who are locally interested to say a few words, which I consent to do very reluctantly. I am not, I will observe, entirely without hope that the Senator who has just taken his seat, as well as the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] may yet vote for the bill. That hope is founded on my conviction that they are just men, and disposed to carry out in good faith the contracts made by the Government with its citizens.

This company, known as the Central Pacific Railroad Company, was authorized to construct a branch of the Union Pacific railroad one hundred miles in length, beginning at St. Joseph, Missouri, or at Atchison, Kansas, and extending westwardly to a point of junction with the branch known as the Union Pacific railroad, eastern division, extending from the mouth of the Kansas river to the one hundredth meridian of longitude. The company having completed the construction of this one hundred miles as provided by law, they claim that they have the legal and equitable right to continue this road up the valley of the Republican river to the one hundredth meridian, and to receive the same subsidy in lands and bonds which the eastern division company would have been entitled to had that part of the line been constructed by the latter company on account of the failure of the said company to construct its branch up the Republican river. The Secretary of the Interior has decided, it is said, that this Central Railroad Company has not this right under the law, and hence the company have applied for the explanatory law proposed in the pending bill.

The Pacific Railroad Committee think they are entitled to the relief claimed. The Senator who has spoken and other Senators have expressed an adverse opinion. That we may have a clear comprehension of this question it may be well to recur to the provisions of the Pacific railroad law enacted in 1862, its supposed defects, and the remedies proposed in the law of 1864. In this mode, I doubt not, the true intent and meaning of that provision of the latter law which is in dispute can be readily ascertained. Every Senator, perhaps, will remember that under the provisions of the law of 1862 a company was organized to construct a railroad westwardly, beginning on the one hundredth meridian and terminating on the eastern boundary of the State of California, with authority to build a branch road eastwardly from the one hundredth meridian to the Missouri river. The same act authorized a company organized under the laws of California to build a road from the Pacific coast to the eastern boundary of that State, so as to connect with the first-named road. It also authorized another company to build a road from the mouth of the Kansas river, in a north-west direction, to the one hundredth meridian, to connect with the main trunk line; and still another company to build the road now under consideration from the town of Atchison, on the Missouri river, for one hundred miles interior to a point of connection with the last-named branch road on or near the Republican fork of the Kansas river.

The company proposed to be incorporated by the law of 1862, organized some time in that year, but did little work; the other companies referred to also accepted the provisions of the law, but did very little until the year 1864, for the reason, as they said, that the law was found to be defective, if not totally impracticable. They, therefore, applied for remedial legislation. The law of 1862, they alleged, was defective in various particulars, which they presented to a standing committee of this body, and which were intended to be removed by the law of 1864. The first evil complained of was that the subsidy was not large enough. By the law of 1862 bonds to the amount of $16,000 a mile were granted for each mile of the road from the Missouri river to the Pacific, making no special provisions for the interior and more difficult part of the road. That law also provided that twenty or twenty-five per cent. of this subsidy should be retained by the Government until the final completion of the whole work.

The companies also complained that they had no mode of condemning private property across which the lines of the road and the branches might be located. They complained, moreover, that they were unable to raise money to build these roads, because the several companies holding the franchise were disconnected organizations. The company chartered by the law of 1862 told us that their road began two or three hundred miles west of the Missouri river, on the one hundredth meridian, and terminated one or two hundred miles east of the Pacific coast. It would require, perhaps, $100,000,000 to construct that line. It began at no business point and terminated nowhere. When they were told that other companies had been organized to construct the connecting links, the California end of the line and the line extending to the Missouri river, through Kansas and Nebraska, they replied that they had no assurance that those companies would ever proceed with the construction of their sections of the road to a final completion, and that they might be thus left without either an eastern or a western connection.

Each of the other companies complained in the same way. Gentlemen were here from California saying, "We can build our part of the line; we can raise money to build this line if we have an assurance that we are to have an eastern connection. But we have no assurance that after we shall have invested forty or fifty millions of money in our part of the road the company chartered by this law will ever complete the main trunk line and give us a connection with the railroads east to the Atlantic." And so the eastern division company in the State of Kansas assured the committee that they could build their part of the line; but to construct a railroad up to the one hundredth meridian and there terminate, without a possible western connection, would be a waste of treasure, promising neither a return of interest or principal. So, also, this company now appealing to the Senate for relief said that they could build their line as proposed in the law; and, as a part of the whole enterprise, it would be a valuable franchise if each of the other companies should build their respective sections so as to secure communication with the Pacific; but that without this connection the investment would be worthless, and that they had no sufficient assurance that the other companies intended or were able to go on in good faith to a successful conclusion of this great enterprise.

The law of 1864 was intended to remedy these defects. The clause of the preceding law granting subsidy was modified so as to increase the amount of Government bonds from $16,000 to $48,000 per mile on the mountainous portions of the road; and across the valley, between the Rocky mountains and the coast ranges, from $16,000 to $32,000 per mile; and that clause authorizing the withholding of twenty or twenty-five per cent was repealed so that the companies could receive the whole subsidy stipulated as the work proceeded. Another provision authorized these companies respectively to secure the condemnation of private property over which the roads were to be located; and then, to remove the material defect—for that was the great evil complained of—to secure to each company a possible connection all the way through, from the valley of the Missouri to the shores of the Pacific, and to secure, if possible, harmony of interest between these several companies and railroad capitalists throughout the country, the committee framed a section providing for a consolidation of any two or of all these companies as one organization, to complete the whole line and branches; but Congress had no mode of coercing a consolidation; they could only provide for a voluntary consolidation of these companies; Congress could not compel them to unite; and each of the companies had doubts whether the other companies would agree to a harmonious union on just and equitable terms. The committee, therefore, framed an additional clause providing that if this consolidation should not occur, and if any of the companies, either an individual company or a consolidated company of two or more of them, should fail to build its part of the line, the company constructing the part of the line assigned to it might take up the work at the end of its section and build the whole work through; the object being to enable the company in California, if they built their section of the road in good faith to the eastern side of that State, to take up the work if they should reach that point first and build eastward until they came through to the Missouri river; or the Kansas companies, either of them, if they built in good faith their part of the work, and the main company or any other of the companies authorized to build any part of the line should fail, to do it in their stead; so that no one of these companies should be at the mercy of the others or any one of them, so that any company putting in its money in good faith and constructing the work should not be compelled to lose the money thus invested on account of the bad faith or pecuniary disability of another company, but that it might make a further advance of means and build the links of the road which had been assigned the company or companies in default.

This is what Congress, in passing the law of 1864, intended to do, for the reasons I have assigned. It may be that the law was not very well drawn; and if so I am perhaps more responsible personally than any other member of Congress. It so happened that the chairman of our committee [Mr. HOWARD] was absent from the city when that bill finally passed both branches of Congress. There were differing votes of the two Houses; the bill was referred to a committee of conference on their disagreeing votes, and it so happened that I was a member of that committee on the part of the Senate, and was made chairman of the joint committee, and after meeting and agreeing on the various points of previous difference the committee directed me to draw up the amendments which were agreed upon and deemed necessary in order to cure these defects in the original law. I endeavored to do so; succeeded, I now fear, but indifferently, judging from the tenor of the arguments to which I have listened. I fear the language of the law is somewhat ambiguous, and that its meaning may not be perfectly clear, especially to the minds of those who were not personally conversant with the facts to which I have referred. But in the minds of those conversant with these facts there can be no doubt as to the intention of Congress when the law of 1864 was passed. To all such the design of that bill must be perfectly clear.

Now I come to the arguments that have been presented by Senators who have differed from this view. It is said that Congress could not have intended this central branch to be a part of the through line, because this line, extending from Atchison westward for one hundred miles, as provided for originally, would not have reached to the line of the branch road extending from the mouth of the Kansas river up to the one hundredth meridian along the Republican river by some forty or fifty miles. On this point I would remark that I hold in my hand a map made at the General Land Office, drawn from the official surveys, showing it to be just about one hundred and eight miles due west from the town of Atchison to the channel of the Republican river. If any Senator is curious he will see that, computing the townships, which are generally a little under six miles across, the distance is about one hundred and eight miles.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How far from St. Joseph by way of Atchison?

Mr. HARLAN. It is a little further. Hence no adverse conclusion can be legitimately drawn from the provisions of the law limiting subsidies on this branch to one hundred miles, for this must be construed in connection with another clause providing that these branches should be so located as to enable it to make the connection within the limits indicated. Then, to make that more sure, if greater certainty was possible, another clause was put in providing that these several branch lines should be located subject to the approval of the President of the United States. It being about one hundred and eight miles due west from Atchison to the channel of the Republican river, every Senator will perceive that it was practicable to make the connection within the limits named in the law; it is clear, therefore, that what we have heretofore ascertained to have been the intention of Congress was perfectly practicable; that these parties, by the construction of one hundred miles of road, could have secured their connection with the main trunk line had the Eastern Division Company built its road up the Republican river, as provided in the law of 1864.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Allow me to ask the Senator what the word "limits" in the clause of the law to which he now alludes referred to? What are the "limits" meant by that expression?

Mr. HARLAN. The limits in relation to this road would be, of course, the limit of one hundred miles extending from the eastern terminus to the western terminus, or the point of connection with either the main line or some one of the branches.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to make an inquiry? If that be the meaning of this law, will he explain how the Iowa road could possibly have connected with the eastern division, the purpose being to connect with the main trunk, when it would have been compelled to cross the main trunk in order to get down to the eastern division at all?

Mr. HARLAN. Why, Mr. President, the company incorporated by the law of 1862 was required to build the eastern branch from the one hundredth meridian to some point on the west side of Iowa, to be fixed by the President of the United States, so that practically there was no difficulty, however there may have been an ambiguity in the language of the law itself.

Mr. CONKLING. My trouble is this: according to the Senator's construction of the act it applies to what is now called the eastern division, and it was compelled to so locate its road that the Iowa road and this road of which he now speaks, among others, could connect with it within their respective number of miles. If that be so, does it not make nonsense of the section, because would it not require the Iowa road to run across the very road which ultimately it was to connect with, in order to get a connection with this road which would bring it back upon that route which it had thus crossed?

Mr. HARLAN. Not at all, as it seems to me.

Mr. POMEROY. The Iowa road referred to is the Sioux City road. That had to make connection before it got to the one hundredth meridian.

Mr. HARLAN. The Sioux City road was not limited to any definite number of miles, but was to be built from Sioux City so as to connect with the main trunk line on the one hundredth meridian or with the so-called Omaha branch at some point east of the one hundredth meridian, the length of the line being subject to the result of engineering; and so with the main Iowa line, so called, from the one hundredth meridian to Omaha, the length of that line would depend, of course, on the result of engineering. Hence there may be a surplusage of language in describing what was intended in the law when it says, "so that the several lines may form their connection within the limits indicated;" but, if so, it applies surely to this one branch, the number of miles of which was definitely fixed. This was one of the lines or branches named, and it was entitled to a connection within the limits specified. This connection was practicable, and the law of 1866 made it the duty of the President of the United States to supervise the location of these branch roads so as to put it beyond the power of one of these companies to so locate its line as to render a connection impracticable for any other of the lines named.

I have the law before me; I aided to frame it; I cannot be mistaken, I think, as to the meaning of the phraseology. I am certain that I do not misunderstand the original design of those who framed it. But the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] says that if these parties have the legal right why do they not go to the courts for a remedy instead of coming to Congress? Well, sir, it is a sufficient answer to say that they have a choice of remedies; before the courts to secure a correct construction of the law, in a judgment or decree, in some case involving the rights of individuals; or before Congress, to secure the passage of an explanatory act. They have chosen the latter course for reasons satisfactory to themselves, and as Congress is competent to act, is able to remove all ambiguity, and as the Senate has taken jurisdiction there is no good reason for dismissing the case if a remedy as complete and perfect were attainable elsewhere.

But the Senator alleges that this company has already received vast subsidies from the Government; that they need no additional aid to enable them to secure ample returns for the capital invested; and, therefore, if the legal rights of this company are not absolutely clear and imperative, the remedy sought should not be granted; that these gentlemen have no just claims to the sympathies of members of Congress. He enumerates their assets in glowing words. He says they are entitled to twelve hundred thousand acres of land, a large tract of Indian lands, $16,000 per mile of Government bonds, and $16,000 per mile in their own company bonds, making, in the aggregate, $32,000 per mile of bonds which they have received already to aid them in the construction of the one hundred miles now completed.

Well, sir, the whole amount of land has been ascertained to be much less than was supposed by Congress when the bill passed—the Government lands amounting to but about two hundred and thirty thousand acres on the one hundred miles, and the Indian lands are not in the nature of subsidy, they having been paid for under a contract with the Government at a higher rate than they would have commanded from any other purchaser; and the $32,000 of bonds per mile is a debt owed by the company, not money due to the company; the company, in the construction of this road, has contracted a debt represented by bonds to the amount of $32,000 per mile.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the unfinished business now in order is the report of the select Committee on the Revision of the Rules of the Senate. That report is now regularly before the Senate.

Mr. HOWARD. I suggest that it be laid aside informally for a few minutes. I think we shall be through with this bill very soon.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think we had better take up the rules. We shall get through with them in half an hour, I think.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is one rule that I have delayed introducing separately, in the hope that the Senator from Rhode Island would have it passed, and that is to protect the morning hour from interruption.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is in these rules.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope we shall adopt the rules to that extent. I presume that will excite no debate.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let us take up the whole report.

Mr. HOWARD. I propose that the rules be laid aside for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the railroad bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope not. The Senate a year ago came to the conclusion that the rules should be revised for the orderly and convenient transaction of its business, and it intrusted that duty to a committee. We have given considerable attention to it and have prepared a report which has been read once as in Committee of the Whole, and I believe no amendments were suggested, though I think there are one or two amendments which certain Senators have to suggest that will lead to no debate. I presume we can get through with that report in half an hour; but if it takes all the day it ought to be taken up. That business is the regular order, and cannot be laid aside without a formal vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order will be passed over informally, by unanimous consent, if there be no objection.

Mr. ANTHONY. I object.

Mr. CONKLING. I object to its being passed over informally.

Mr. HOWARD. I move, then, that the unfinished business be laid aside, and that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the bill we have had under debate.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will state that I have been trying for five or six weeks to get up this report, in season and out of season; and now, if the Senate gives it the go by, I shall think I have discharged my duty and so will my associates on the committee, and leave the matter in the hands of those who think the rules require revision.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not think the Senator ought to put us in that condition. I am disposed to allow my colleague [Mr. HARLAN] to go on and complete his remarks, and not cut him off in the middle of them; and, therefore, I shall be compelled to vote against the Senator's proposition.

Mr. ANTHONY. But the motion is to lay the report of the select Committee on the Rules aside for the purpose of continuing the consideration of the subject upon which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARLAN] was speaking. I have no objection to his finishing his remarks. I do not wish to cut him off in the middle of them.

Mr. CONNESS. Let us finish the bill and get it out of the way.

Mr. ANTHONY. That I object to. If it can be understood that the Senator from Iowa shall finish his remarks, and that then we shall go on with the unfinished business, I have no objection to that. I wish to extend every courtesy to him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can only be continued by unanimous consent. Objection is made, and therefore the question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg to say that I make no objection to the honorable Senator from Iowa completing his remarks. My objection was to going on with the bill.

Mr. FERRY. There is a motion before the Senate.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the motion is that the unfinished business be laid aside informally for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of this bill until it is finished then I object. If the motion is by unanimous consent to allow the Senator from Iowa to complete his remarks, I assent with great pleasure. Gentlemen can take either course.

Mr. HOWARD. My motion is to postpone all other orders and proceed with this bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then I object, and call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the unfinished business and all prior orders be postponed for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the present bill, and on that question the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. POMEROY. I think we can complete both these measures to-day. I was a member of the committee that reported these rules, and I am anxious, as the Senator from Rhode Island is, to consider them; but that is a subject relating simply to the rules of the Senate, which can be considered at any time during the day, but as we are upon the bill I think we had better complete it.

Mr. CONNESS. Is this discussion in order after the yeas and nays have been ordered?

Mr. ANTHONY and Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly it is.

Mr. POMEROY. Remarks are as much in order after the yeas and nays are ordered as they are before. My point is that I am desirous of passing both measures to-day.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not believe that the bill now under discussion can be completed in two days. I believe these rules can be disposed of in an hour probably; I have no doubt of it.

Mr. POMEROY. I think they can, and I think the bill can be, too.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am one of the committee who reported these rules, and I think it right to say that the committee believe, unanimously, that the adoption of these rules will be a great advantage to the orderly progress and dispatch of the business of the Senate; that we shall save a great deal of time and avoid a great deal of confusion, if they are once adopted, every day.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is, if they are observed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. When they are once adopted we will try to have them observed. It appeared to us, therefore, that the consideration of the rules was in the nature of a matter of privilege, and that every Senator, whatever bills he may have in charge, ought to give way far enough to have the rules improved, if they can be, so as to facilitate the passage of just such bills as this and all others that ought to be acted upon and to pass. Now, to say that a bill of this kind shall override the consideration of these rules, when we all know that this bill will lead to further discussion at considerable length—I do not mean unfair and improper length, but further fair and proper and reasonable discussion—it appears to me is asking too much; and I appeal to the Senate to decide whether it is willing to consider these rules or whether it is not, because we want to be rid of the responsibility of having them in charge.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on postponing the unfinished business for the purpose of continuing the debate on this bill, on which question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 17, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Conness, Ferry, Fowler, Grimes, Harlan, Howard, Norton, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sumner, Tipton, Wade, Wiley, and Wilson—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Buckalew, Cole, Conkling, Corbett, Davis, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, McCreery, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Saulsbury, Sherman, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Williams—26.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cameron, Cattell, Cragin, Dixon, Drake, Morton, Sprague, Stewart, Thayer, Vickers, and Yates—11.

So the motion was not agreed to.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move to take up the bill (H. R. No. 658) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1869, and for other purposes, which has been returned from the House of Representatives, with a view to its reference.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I also move to reconsider the vote ordering it to a third reading.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I now move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 601) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1869, reported it with amendments.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 246) directing the Secretary of State to present to George Wright, master of the British brig J. & G. Wright, a gold chronometer, in appreciation of his personal services in saving the lives of three American seamen wrecked at sea on board of the American schooner Lizzie F. Coate, of Massachusetts, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

SUPREME COURT JURISDICTION—VETO.

During the pendency of the report of the Committee to Revise the Rules the following message was received from the President of the United States by Mr. W. G. MOORE, his Secretary:

Mr. President: I am directed by the President of the United States to return to the Senate, in which House it originated, the bill (S. No. 213) entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to amend the judiciary act passed on the 24th of September, 1789,'" with his objections thereto in writing.

REVISION OF THE RULES.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the report submitted by Mr. ANTHONY on the 21st of February last from the select committee appointed to revise the rules of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I rise to move an amendment—not by the authority of the committee or against it; it is a matter that has occurred to me since the report was made. I move to amend the thirtieth rule by striking out in the first line the words "proposing additional appropriations," and by striking out the word "general," so that, if amended in that respect, the rule would read:

No amendment shall be received to any appropriation bill, unless, &c.

If that is agreed to I shall then move to add a qualification at the end so as to permit an amendment to reduce the sum proposed to be appropriated to a smaller one, or to strike it out altogether, or to correct mere phraseology; but at present I merely confine my motion to striking out the words I have named.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. GRIMES and Mr. SHERMAN. Let it be read.

The Secretary read the amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to explain to the Senate precisely the object that I have in view. As I have said, it will need some further words at the end, which I shall offer if this amendment is agreed to; but what I propose to accomplish, and that is what I wish to call the attention of the Senate to, is this: to prevent the loading of appropriation bills with general provisions of legislation, and to confine every appropriation bill to precisely what in theory it is; a lawful direction for the payment of money out of the Treasury, and nothing else. I believe that it is very injurious to the course of legislation and hurtful to the public interest, after an appropriation bill is reported from a committee, to have suddenly an amendment proposed to that (when the nature of the bill, of course, does not call the attention of any Senator to what is proposed) making some alteration in existing law or proposing some new law, and thus forcing through a provision sometimes that one House or the other thinks ought to pass when the other thinks it ought not, because one House is afraid of having the appropriation fail altogether, and is, therefore, in a certain measure, coerced into agreeing to general legislation which it otherwise would not do.

Mr. CONNESS. You propose to protect yourself against the other House in this way?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am not proposing, in reply to the Senator from California, to protect myself against the other House any more than to protect the other House against myself. I am proposing to keep appropriation bills, which are merely a distinct direction for the payment of money out of the Treasury, as I have said, free from the general legislation of the country. I think we have all witnessed in our own experience here the evil that I am endeavoring by this rule to correct. And it is proper to say in this connection, because it does not allude to any proceeding of the other House, that the rules of the other House provide for that thing now. It requires, as I understand, unanimous consent in that body to put a rider on an appropriation bill which shall change the existing law; and I believe it to be a very good provision. Now, what I propose to accomplish is to make our rule conform to that.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to know what the Senator proposes to put on at the end.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I propose to put on at the end a qualifying proposition which shall permit an amendment to strike out one sum and insert a smaller one, or to strike out any words in the bill entirely; strike out a section; reduce or in any way change by not going so far as the bill when it is reported does go; strike out an entire appropriation; reduce the sum; strike out one sum and insert another.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I should like to inquire of the Senator whether under that proposition it will not be in order to strike out a limiting clause, a clause limiting the application or appropriation of money?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Possibly it would; but if the limiting clause is struck out it would be an appropriation for no purpose at all, and the appropriation would then become inoperative entirely. Then I propose, also, of course, to permit amendments which merely correct the phraseology of the bill within the scope of its original design. There is no difficulty in guarding the proposition in such a way as to leave the body perfectly free to exercise its rights of amendment, except the right that now exists of putting on an appropriation bill a new provision of law which has no connection with the bill itself, sometimes no connection with the subject of the appropriation, and which I believe to be injurious and detrimental.

Mr. HOWARD. I ask for the reporting of the amendment as offered by the Senator from Vermont. We did not understand it in this part of the Chamber.

The Secretary again read the amendment.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to know why the Senator does not extend this rule to standing committees. With the Senator's amendment a standing committee can still propose any sort of general legislation to an appropriation bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not at all.

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir; for the rule will then read:

"No amendment shall be received to any appropriation bill unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law or some act or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session, or moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, or in pursuance of an estimate from the head of some of the Departments."

If moved by the direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate an amendment to a general appropriation bill can be made, not in regard to the amount of the appropriation, but any description of amendment, as I understand.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As I have said, I have only advanced the general proposition that we ought to exclude from appropriation bills this sort of legislation; and, so far as I have already gone, I now see—my attention had not been before called to that precise language read by my friend from Iowa in the center of the rule—it only limits this exclusion to propositions made by individual Senators. If the Senate think that is wise, then the next question will be, is it wise, also, to take this right of amendment away from a committee? I think, myself, as to matters of general legislation, when any committee in this body can report a bill at any time—the rules provide that they may report by bill at any time—it would be wise to take this power away from the committees, and if the Senate agree with me in that we can very readily make that proposition. But some Senators might believe that individual Senators ought not to have the power to spring general legislation on appropriation bills while a committee who had the subject under consideration might properly be permitted to report such an amendment. The two things are not necessarily in equal degree of propriety or impropriety, and it will be for the Senate to say, if they agree that it ought to be limited, how far the limitation ought to go.

Mr. GRIMES. I have had a little experience on this subject. I have seen here in this Senate where an appropriation bill, for example an appropriation bill to defray the expenses of the Army has been under consideration, some gentleman connected with the Committee on the District of Columbia has gone around and seen the members of his committee and got their assent to put on a proposition altogether different from that which should pertain to an Army appropriation bill, and overcame the rule in that regard.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That shows that we ought to go further.

Mr. GRIMES. I doubt exceedingly whether we had better tie ourselves with any such provision as this. It sometimes becomes very important, I think, that we should limit or restrain, or enlarge, if you please, or regulate in some way the method in which a particular appropriation should be expended. I have seen, I think very wisely, propositions added to some appropriation bills this year with regard to the excess of appropriations that have lapsed over from last year back into the Treasury. That can be applied to particular Departments, not to all; and in the general manner in which it has been attempted to be applied by the House of Representatives, and to which we, in one or two instances, assented, there cannot be any harm in such a provision in many instances, and great good may be accomplished.

Mr. SHERMAN. When the Senator first offered the amendment I supposed he intended to take away from the committees of this body the power to report amendments to appropriation bills. If so, I shall object to it very strenuously. The Committee on Finance are already considering a number of propositions made with a view to reduce expenditures, with a view to ingraft them upon bills which provide for the expenditures of the current year as the proper place for them. General legislation on these subjects, without the power to amend appropriation bills, would be very difficult, indeed, and the difficulty to get up a small bill by itself would make it substantially impossible.

I do not know that I have any objection to the amendment so far as it is actually proposed, because sometimes the Senate is embarrassed by amendments suddenly sprung upon it by individual members of the body, even where they do not propose to make appropriations; but there may be times of high importance when the Senate may choose to assert its power to declare a principle upon the motion of a single member of the Senate where the committees probably have not had time or formal occasion to consider the amendment. I do not think, therefore, that it would be wise for the Senate to tie up its power over those subjects. The power to propose additional appropriations is already limited sufficiently by the second clause of this rule providing that all such amendments must be sent to the Committee on Appropriations. Thus that committee is enabled to prepare itself in advance to resist improper amendments; but questions of general political power, questions of the reduction of office, or a proposition to repeal or to change a law regulating an office, it seems to me ought to be left open to the action of the Senate. There is no practical difficulty growing out of this rule except that sometimes Senators attach to appropriation bills long discussions about collateral matters. I do not know that that can be avoided.

Mr. CONNESS. That is within the power of the Senate at all times.

Mr. SHERMAN. Usually the Committee on Appropriations can crowd off or defeat those amendments if they are glaringly bad. If a majority of the Senate are strongly in favor of an amendment, there is no reason why it should not be attached to an appropriation bill; but generally the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations can crowd off such propositions unless there is an overwhelming sentiment of the Senate in favor of them. So that, practically, I do not think it would be wise to go further than we have already done in the second clause of the thirtieth rule, which gives to the Committee on Appropriations power to consider all propositions to increase appropriations. The amendment of the Senator would prevent us from increasing the amount proposed. For instance, the Committee on Appropriations may report that $30,000 are required for a particular service. Under this proposition we could not increase the amount without a report of the committee. No member, although his own individual opinion was that $50,000 should be appropriated, could move any amendment increasing or diminishing the sum by the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont, unless, perhaps, by moving some other amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As I said, so far as an amendment moved by any Senator is concerned, I propose, if this be agreed to, if the principle be agreed to so far, to provide at the end of the rule a qualifying clause that any Senator shall have the right to move to strike out one sum and insert a smaller one. As the rule now stands I will say to my friend from Ohio that no Senator, when an appropriation bill is reported, has a right to move to strike out the sum reported and insert a larger one.

Mr. GRIMES. Unless he gives notice.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The rule as it stands only applies to "additional appropriations." It does not apply to the alteration of an appropriation already made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is a question that is open to debate. I have seen it practiced in that way and sometimes in the other.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir; the uniform practice of the Senate is that it has been applied to a new appropriation, because it has always been the custom for a Senator to move to enlarge or diminish an appropriation as he pleases, and I have never heard it objected to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I believe I still have the floor. I simply desire to say that we ought not to tie our hands in this way. The rule, as proposed by the Senator from Vermont, would be evaded by a member of a committee going around and getting the authority of his committee here on the floor, and then, under the rule, he could move his proposition. It is simply to take away from an individual Senator the power of making a motion to amend and requiring it to come from the majority of a committee whose consent can always be obtained informally. I do not see that any good is to be accomplished by it, and I shall vote against it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. In one aspect of the proposition of the Senator from Vermont it seems to me to be desirable, and that is that it shall not be regarded as a proper thing to amend an appropriation bill by general legislation. I do not understand it to go any further than that. That is the rule of the House of Representatives. No Representative, as I understand, is authorized to move any such legislation upon an appropriation bill; and it seems to me that a rule of the Senate in harmony with that rule would be advantageous to us. To that extent I should be very glad to see the proposition adopted.

Mr. GRIMES. Allow me to ask the Senator this question: suppose an appropriation bill comes here from the House of Representatives, as several have during this session, with general legislation ingrafted upon it; under this amendment can we amend that?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. In our committee, I suppose, we could.

Mr. GRIMES. Can we here, in the Senate?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not on the motion of a Senator.

Mr. GRIMES. For example, we had before us the other day the general pension appropriation bill, on which there was a provision abolishing the prize laws in effect and dispensing with the naval pension fund. Could we modify and amend that proposition in the way that we did upon the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] under this amendment?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think we might very properly, because the rule would not restrain us in that direction.

Mr. GRIMES. This rule if adopted?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I had not supposed it would.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The thirtieth rule is confined, as I understand it, exclusively to amendments proposing additional appropriations. It does not go any further than that. Although there are many inconveniences arising from general legislation being put upon these bills, yet, I think, it would not be safe to deprive ourselves of all power in that particular. So far as the rule stands, I think it is well enough with regard to appropriations; and with the addition to the rule that has been lately made, requiring that all amendments proposing new items of appropriation shall be sent one day beforehand, at least, to the Committee on Appropriations, we are perfectly safe, so far as the object of that rule is concerned, which is confined to amendments that propose additional appropriations. Now, then, the only question is whether we propose to make a rule which shall cut off at once all legislation from appropriation bills which does not have particular reference to appropriations.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Unless reported by a committee.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Unless reported by a committee. I do not see the necessity of that, because it may very frequently happen that it may be necessary to do that; and I do not know why it should be confined to a committee. Possibly, on the last night of a session, when people are in a hurry to get through, when the annoyance is sometimes very great of propositions to amend by general legislation, such a restriction might be advantageous. It might be very convenient at that time to have a rule of this sort here; but I do not think that would make up for the inconveniences that might arise from cutting off all opportunity from Senators to make such suggestions as they saw fit with reference to matters to be placed upon the bills. It very frequently happens, as every Senator knows, that important matters, quite important matters, cannot be carried through in any other way than on an appropriation bill, and the result is that they are very frequently moved and put on at the close of the session.

I have known cases where very great injury has been done in that way, and I have known cases where great good has been done. But, after all, I think it will be better to leave it to the discretion of the Senate and to the watchful care of the Committee on Appropriations, who, of course, will have their eye upon everything that is proposed under such circumstances, rather than to tie our hands by any iron rule which shall prohibit anything of that sort. I therefore am rather opposed to the proposition of my friend from Vermont, and feel disposed to stand by the old landmarks with which we are familiar, and submit to the inconveniences rather than to, perhaps, make a provision which will result in preventing much good.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not know that I understand the amendment; but if I do I do not see how it changes the rule from what it now is. You may move to strike out the words "proposing additional appropriations" and also the word "general," and then how will it read?

No amendment shall be received to any appropriation bill, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law.

Well, you cannot do so now, for the rule now reads:

No amendment proposing additional appropriations shall be received to any general appropriation bill, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or some act or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session, or moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate.

If it be amended as is proposed a standing committee can still move an amendment. Of course, by the last provision of this rule, an amendment to an appropriation bill must be referred one day beforehand to the Committee on Appropriations. I think it is better myself that our appropriations should all be in one bill. That is better than that each committee should have an appropriation bill by itself. I think each committee should put its appropriations on a general bill, so that when we open the law containing the appropriations for this year we can see the appropriations in one act.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend will permit me to correct him. I think he is obviously mistaken in supposing that the amendment I now propose does not change the meaning of the rule. As the rule is reported, if my amendment be not agreed to, any member of the Senate, when an appropriation bill is under consideration, can move any amendment that does not propose an additional appropriation; that is, he can move any amendment proposing legislation changing the law of the country, and not providing for the payment of money. That is what I desire to avoid; and therefore I submit to him—it is not necessary to submit it to those gentlemen who think so now—that if the amendment is adopted it will make that change. One man who, as the rule now stands, may move a section which provides for general legislation, if the amendment be adopted cannot do it; that must be confined to a committee. That is an important change, and I called it fairly to the attention of the Senate to see what they thought about it.

Mr. POMEROY. I admit what the Senator says. I thought the Senator undertook to say that committees would not be allowed, if this amendment was adopted, to move their respective amendments.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, no.

Mr. POMEROY. If the Senator only means that individual members of the Senate, if this amendment should pass, will not be allowed to move general legislation by way of amendment to an appropriation bill, if that is the object of the amendment, I have no objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONNESS. I desire to call attention to the last rule, rule fifty-four, which reads, the suggestion originally coming, I think, from the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN:]

"All resolutions calling upon the President or any of the Executive Departments for information shall be referred without debate to the appropriate standing committee, which shall report on the same, with an estimate of the probable expense of furnishing the information called for."

I do not object to this rule because I feel that it affects me, for I have offered very few such resolutions and do not propose offering many; but it appears to me to be a restriction that the Senate proposes to impose upon itself by a rule which will be particularly binding and offensive to a minority of the Senate, no matter what political party that minority belongs to. While it is now in the power of a majority of the Senate to vote down a resolution offered by the minority, and it is very frequently done, or else the resolution is so amended as to take the point from it, this proposes additionally to refer the resolution for inquiry or information to a standing committee, where there is a party majority, and where it may be kept interminably, if deemed necessary or politic. If information is asked for it is a fair presumption that information is needed; but, in place of facilitating that information, this rule proposes to put the demand for light under a bushel, with a prospect of its being kept there.

Mr. ANTHONY. Contrary to Scripture.

Mr. CONNESS. My friend, who is chairman of the Committee on Rules, suggests that that is contrary to Scripture. Yes, sir; it unfortunately is.

I know that in the absence of this rule resolutions for information very often lead to a considerable abuse. Information is called for which has already been spread before us, or which is not of great utility, which leads to considerable embarrassment at the Departments and the employment of clerical force rendered necessary to the performance of other duties. But that is one view of the case. The abuse that the adoption of this rule will create and lead to I think is the greater of the two. In my opinion no such restriction ought to be placed upon calls for information. It would be but a reasonable presumption that there is good judgment enough and independence enough in the Senators present when a call for information is presented to determine whether it ought to be made, whether the resolution should be adopted. But if it is a resolution for information touching the Post Office Department, under this rule it will be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and their regular meeting may be a week off. It necessarily waits that length of time, while the Senator calling for the information ought to have it before that time has passed, and then it may go over for want of there being a quorum at the committee meeting that morning. It amounts, in other words, to a suppression; that is really what it will lead to—an effectual mode of suppressing calls for information.

Mr. ANTHONY. There is, undoubtedly, force in the objection which the Senator from California makes to this rule. I agree with him in all that; but I differ from him in thinking that the other side does not present a greater abuse than the adoption of this rule will. It is true that delay will be caused by sending calls for information to the appropriate committees; but it is also true that almost any information which a Senator wants he can get without a formal resolution of the Senate. By addressing a note to the head of a Department or the head of a bureau almost any information which a Senator really desires can be obtained.

Mr. CONNESS. Then, if the honorable Senator will permit me, why not change his rule so that it shall read "that no resolution calling upon a Department for information shall be in order unless the Senator offering it shall first have called upon the Department for the information and been refused?" Then there would be sense in the rule.

Mr. ANTHONY. I would hardly like to adopt that proposition. I think that would be placing the heads of Departments in rather an unpleasant situation, throwing on them responsibilities that they ought not to have. The abuse of this practice has been very great, indeed. I have been told by a head of Department that at a previous session of Congress all the clerical force in his Department could not have answered the calls for information that were sent from one House and the other of Congress.

Now, it is fair to presume, it is very courteous to presume, as the Senator does, that every call for information is well considered and receives the deliberate attention of the Senate; but we know very well, in practice, that a call for information is almost always passed as a matter of course. A Senator offers the resolution. Somebody objects, or asks "What is it?" The answer is, "A mere resolution of inquiry;" and that is the end of it. Nobody hears what it is; nobody cares what it is; and when it is passed it is found that information is called for that will take half a dozen clerks months to prepare—clerks whose services are required in the ordinary transaction of the public business, and perhaps the information is already before us. Of the two evils, I think the existence of this abuse is a greater evil than the mode which is provided in this rule to prevent it, although I quite agree with my friend from California that there will be some evil either way.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator from California is mistaken in supposing that this rule was adopted on my suggestion. I made no suggestion whatever to the committee with reference to any of the rules.

Mr. CONNESS. That was simply my recollection.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have occasionally spoken on this matter heretofore, and called attention to these abuses. With regard to a great many of the resolutions calling for information, they are such as nobody has any objection to, and from their very nature would not occasion any particular expense in answering them. Therefore I think perhaps it might not be quite necessary or quite wise to make a general rule that every resolution whatever shall be referred to a committee. I think, however, those should be referred to a committee to which attention might be called by any Senator as probably involving considerable expense. I therefore suggest to the committee whether it would not be well to amend this rule—I am decidedly in favor of the principle of it, for I think there have been very great abuses—so as to have it read in this way:

All resolutions calling upon the President or upon any of the Executive Departments for information, shall, upon motion of any one Senator, be referred without debate, &c.

So that, if there is a motion to that effect, it may go to a committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That will be practically the same thing as the rule now; for if a Senator wishes to obtain information that he thinks evidently ought to be granted, all he has to do is to ask unanimous consent to have the resolution put on its passage, and then it goes without a reference.

Mr. ANTHONY. The rule can be suspended by unanimous consent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It amounts to the same thing.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know but that such a provision would meet the case. Unquestionably there would be no objection to a great many of these resolutions, and the answers to them would not involve expense; but my experience is such as to satisfy me that some rule of this kind is absolutely necessary to prevent useless waste of time and of money in calls for information, not intentionally, of course, on the part of anybody, but arising from the fact that a Senator cannot tell, when he calls for information sometimes, how much expense it is to occasion, and how much time is to be wasted necessarily in preparing the answer. It is frequently made ground of complaint by Senators that they do not get answers to resolutions, when it is impossible for the Department, within what would appear to be a reasonable time, to prepare the answer. I have seen great heaps of documents and folios, in answer to a resolution trying to get at a single fact, laid upon the table, which were utterly useless, and cost hundreds of dollars to compile. I really hope that this rule will be adopted.

Mr. HOWARD. I inquire whether it is in order to strike out the fifty-fourth rule entirely? The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in order.

Mr. HOWARD. Then I make that motion. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan moves to strike out the fifty-fourth rule, in the following words:

54. All resolutions calling upon the President or upon any of the Executive Departments for information shall be referred, without debate, to the appropriate standing committee, which shall report upon the same, with an estimate of the probable expense of furnishing the information called for.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, such an inquiry is always made under the vote of the Senate, acting in public, in the face of the world. This rule proposed appears to be a novelty introduced by the committee to whom the subject of the revision of the rules was referred. I believe that there is no precedent for it in the rules of any legislative body. There may be; but if there be, I have not seen or heard of it. I believe that the public interest will be best served by allowing perfect freedom of inquiry into the conduct of every public officer, whether the officer be the President of the United States or any head of a Department.

Sir, I can see how this rule would operate very injuriously, and I think very unfairly, in reference to the minority of the Senate. A member of the minority rises and offers a resolution of inquiry, which may be perfectly just and fair in itself, and necessary for the enlightenment of the body; but it may contemplate some disclosure that would not be so pleasant to the majority. If the question were taken in open Senate by yeas and nays as to the propriety of making the inquiry, there would be some chance, at least, that the resolution would be adopted, and thus the facts contemplated be disclosed; whereas if the resolution should be referred to a standing committee of the Senate, made up as that committee would be, a majority of them, in accordance with the majority of the Senate, the resolution would run, in most cases I should fear, a very great chance of being totally smothered in committee, or at least reported against, so that the information might not be obtained. I think, whatever might be the consequence of passing such a rule as this, as it is a novelty, and I believe entirely without precedent in legislation, it ought not to be adopted. These are the grounds upon which I move to strike it out.

Mr. GRIMES. As the rule now stands the Senate, by a majority vote, can refuse to call for any information that may be desired without assigning any reason at all. If you adopt this rule and have the question of the inquiry referred to a standing committee of the Senate, as in the case of printing public documents, and they report that the information will be inexpensive, then you take away from the inexorable majority its excuse for refusing to furnish the minority with the information which they desire. If, on the other hand, it turns out that the expense will be large and that the information that is sought will not compensate for the expense, then the Senate will have some information before it upon which to act. It appears to me, therefore, that it is no particular advantage to the minority to strike this rule out. If I were in the minority I would prefer that it should stand, because then the apology would be taken away from the majority for refusing to give such information as I might desire for the benefit of my constituents or for enlightening the public mind when the expense attending the furnishing of that information would be very slight.

Sensors say that this is without precedent. Why, sir, we do precisely the same thing in regard to printing. If it is proposed to publish any document which a Senator thinks desirable to circulate through the country the Senate does not undertake to decide that question until its mind has been enlightened by the report of the Committee on Printing, and the rule is almost inflexibly observed. I do not know that there is any greater departure from principle in this instance than there is in that instance. I therefore am in favor of the rule standing as reported by the committee.

Mr. DAVIS. It appears to me that this is rather a difficult subject to regulate properly; but, at the same time, I am very decided in my opinion that this rule ought not to be adopted. I believe that the reference of calls for information to a committee will be made use of as the means of stifling information and concealing it from the minority of the body. The Departments are the hot-beds in which abuses generally originate, and the evidences of abuses are found there alone as a general rule. When there is a perfect harmony between the majority in the Senate and the head of a Department, and, especially, if the head of a Department be a favorite, although he be guilty of abuses and corruption, there will always be a disposition on the part of the majority to screen him by withholding the information that may be asked for in a resolution.

Now, Mr. President, there is an example at this time existing. There is a certain head of Department here who is called the Carnot of the late war. There never was a more arbitrary, oppressive, or lawless head of a Department in this Government than that same gentleman; and never a man, in my judgment, who has perpetrated more of abuse and more of outrage. On the 20th of January last I submitted a resolution asking for information from that Department in these terms, which was passed by the Senate:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War furnish the Senate with the names of vessels of all kinds purchased by the War Department or any bureau or officer connected with that Department during the late war of rebellion, the tonnage and amount paid for each vessel, the amount of contract price and its date."

"Also the names of the vessels of all kinds hired or employed in the same way and by the same authority during the said war, the tonnage when given, and when not given the size or description of each, the value when specified, and when not specified the value by estimation, with the amount paid by the day, month, or other term, with dates for each time. The price for which any of the foregoing vessels were sold by the Government, giving dates of sale, terms, and times of payment. And in every case the names of the party or parties from whom any such vessel or vessels were purchased or hired, and to whom they were sold."

That resolution for information has received no response. This infamous Secretary at the head of the War Department, in the absolute-ness of his power, disregards this call, as he disregards law and every other obligation that ought to be sacred and ought to be obligatory upon an officer of the Government, but acts just according to his will and pleasure. For two months this resolution has received no response. This Carnot of the War Department has not deigned to answer it. He was "the Government" during the war. He did, or refused to do, what he chose then; and now, being restored in the manner in which he has been restored to his office, he thinks that he has a double security for his lawless administration of that Department to what he had during the exigencies of the war.

Mr. CONNESS. Will my friend from Kentucky permit me to interpose a question here?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to know, as the Senator has lacked that information from the recent head of the War Department, why, since the change, he has not called upon the other Secretary of War, General Thomas? [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS. Well, sir, the other Secretary is laid up in ordinary by the influence of the honorable Senator himself and his associates. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNESS. We thought he was very ordinary for the position.

Mr. DAVIS. If he had been in office and had the control of the archives, and was the one to respond to a resolution of this kind, I have no doubt we could have had the information long ago.

But, Mr. President, I admit the difficulties of this subject; that calls are very frequently expensive and inconvenient, and require a great aggregation of force and increase of expenditure to meet them; but I am for just such a rule now as I would be if I was in the majority in this Chamber. I am for the rule of justice and reason for all times, without regard to minorities or majorities. Whenever there has been an abuse of power in a Department, and that Department has been guilty of corruption, of making improvident contracts or permitting it to be done, I want the revelation to be made to the Senate and to the people of America. I do not care who it touches, and who is blasted or who is protected by such information. I want a pure and honest administration of the Government in all of its Departments and services without regard to the Presidency and without regard to the incumbents who fill the Departments or any other officers of the Government. Where there are abuses of power in relation to contracts—and I am informed that if this resolution is responded to truthfully and faithfully it would reveal a most revolting and most shocking abuse of power—I want those abuses of power brought to the light that those who have been guilty of them or those who have suffered them to take place may be held up to their proper responsibility.

I therefore am most happy to agree with my ancient friend, the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD,] for once. [Laughter.] There was a time when there was a general accord between us; but that was in the days of yore. We were then both members of the House of Representatives. But I am struck with the good sense, the justice, and the manliness of his remarks to-day in favor of the rights of minorities. It has been rather my fortune to be nearly always in a minority, and I believe I always shall be, [laughter,] and consequently, I am in a condition to sympathize very strongly with minorities, and with any argument in favor of a minority.

I trust that this additional rule will be voted down, and that the responsibility of refusing or granting these calls shall be brought before the Senate in open session, and be referred to the members of the Senate collectively.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I believe I shall not attempt to reply to what the Senator from Kentucky has seen fit to state with regard to the Secretary of War, calling him the "infamous Secretary of War." All I have to say is, that, in my humble opinion, if he or I ever arrive at the degree of "infamy" which the honorable Secretary of War will have in the history of this country, we shall stand much better than either of us is likely to at present.

Mr. DAVIS. The Lord help us, then! [Laughter.]

Mr. FESSENDEN. Now, Mr. President, with reference to this particular matter, I want to express my obligations to my friend from Kentucky for reading his resolution. It is the best possible illustration that could be given of the necessity of this rule. I have noticed that these calls for general information extending over indefinite periods of time, are usually made, as suggested by somebody, by gentlemen who are disposed to quarrel with the Secretaries. I remember that at about the first of the present Administration the calls upon the Secretary of the Treasury from the other side of the Chamber for information about cotton matters, &c., were very frequent and very voluminous, covering great length of time and great multitudes of transactions. Of late, however, the calls upon the Secretary of the Treasury come from this side of the Chamber, while the calls on the Secretary of War are confined to the other. So it works generally; and, therefore, I agree that all these matters which are exceptional, perhaps, are rather matters of the minority than otherwise.

But, sir, after all, that does not answer the difficulty. The difficulty really arises from the inability of Senators to get at the facts they want in a narrow compass, from their not being familiar with the Departments and the records of the Departments, and knowing what they intend to do and what they exactly want. Consequently, they draw resolutions covering great lengths of time and great multitudes of transactions in order to get at a few facts which a little inquiry would enable them to get without a resolution. The object of this rule, as I understand it, is to prevent the difficulties that arise from that source. I before remarked that I had seen great piles of useless paper on our Secretary's table frequently, which, after they got there, the member calling for them made no use of whatever. He had accomplished his purpose; he had got the information printed at the public expense, and whether it amounted to anything or not did not seem to make any great difference.

Now, what has the Senator from Kentucky read as an illustration? A resolution covering the whole period of the war and all the transactions of the quartermaster's department in various sections of the country and of the War Department proper with reference to vessels. Why, sir, I undertake to say that if the whole force in the Department had been busily at work from the time that resolution was introduced, upon that single thing, down to the present moment, they would hardly have been able to accomplish it. It could not have been done in the time that has elapsed since then by any possibility. With the great number of books to be examined, and the great number of accounts to be looked at, and everything to be drawn off, covering the immense transactions of the quartermaster's department during the whole period of the war, it could not have been done in the time that has elapsed, and it will cost an immense deal of money, comparatively speaking. As my friend from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] remarks, in order to get that information you must examine every quartermaster's account for every month during the war. It is impossible to get at that information in any reasonable time. I do not think it could be got at under six months.

Is it reasonable to complain of the Secretary because such a resolution has not yet been answered? I undertake to say, with my slight knowledge of those matters, that it could not have been answered in the time that has elapsed. Another thing: I do not remember when the present Secretary, the Secretary now holding office, came back to the Department; but, according to my recollection, it has not been a very long period. Whether he was there when that resolution was passed or not I do not know. I suspect not, however; and for a period since he has been there he has been hardly recognized; and the last time since he has been back in the Department he has not been recognized at all by the executive government. What control he may have I do not know. But the Senator should inquire before he makes such charges and before he exhibits a resolution of that kind as illustrating the neglect of the Department to answer. I say again, that, in my judgment, it would be perfectly impossible in the length of time that has elapsed, with all the force that the Department could possibly spare upon it, to have come anywhere near answering the questions the Senator put or give the information he desired, from the very nature of the business itself and from its voluminous character. That resolution is one that it would be eminently proper to send to a committee to examine, to make inquiries about, if the Senator before he offers it will not condescend to make inquiries. He knows what facts he wants with reference to the matter.

I do not see any danger arising from the adoption of this rule. I have more than once spoken of it in reference to single resolutions that have been offered. I do not know that it is very often that such resolutions come up; but when they do they ought to be examined into. Taking the time that is bestowed by clerks upon calls of this very character that come from these two bodies, I should not be surprised if the absolute expense of them was $100,000 a year. I think it worth while to make a little inquiry about them.

But it is said that when such a resolution is sent to a committee there is danger of its being stifled. There is no difficulty about that. If a member of the minority sends a resolution to a committee, and the committee do not report it, all he has got to do is to call for it in open Senate and ask why the committee do not report it. I have that faith and confidence in the gentlemen composing this Senate as to suppose that when a matter of business is sent to them they will make a business report upon it, without reference to whether it is to affect one side of the Chamber or another, one party or another. I have never seen any disposition to stifle things in that way; and I do not believe that it exists. If it appeared that there was undue delay, Senators might make their complaint, and they have the same advantage of it before the country; and that is, that their attempt to get information for the benefit of their constituents has been stifled by a majority; and they can appeal to the record to show it; and they will have just as much advantage from it probably, and more than they would have from the information itself when they got it; because, after all, these things generally turn out to be mere bugbears. It is very seldom that anything is developed to the prejudice of the Departments. I believe, as a general rule, so far as my observation has extended, the affairs of the Departments of this Government, under all parties, have been conducted with integrity. Occasionally there has been an exception.

There is a disposition on the part of the minority always to complain of the majority, and to suspect fraud and injury; at any rate to charge it; but when you come to investigate it, it very seldom turns out that you cannot rely with perfect safety upon the high character and the sense of responsibility of the eminent men who are placed at the heads of Departments, let them belong to what party they may. That has been the result of my observation and experience. I believe it is true, and I hope it will always continue to be true in this Republic. I see no danger, therefore, from the adoption of this rule. I think it will save a great deal of money and a great deal of annoyance.

Mr. HOWARD. Before the Senator from Maine takes his seat, I wish to ask him a question. The rule which I move to expunge requires the appropriate committee to whom the matter shall be referred to "report upon the same," that is, upon the call, "with an estimate of the probable expense of furnishing the information called for." Does the Senator suppose that in most cases it will be practicable for such a committee to make any estimate of the expense?

Mr. FESSENDEN. An approximate estimate. By simply inquiring at the Department, the Department could answer at once how long it would take and the number of clerks it would require to be employed upon it. There is no trouble about it, practically.

Mr. HOWARD. Let me call the attention of the Senator to a single call for information that I made myself at the commencement of this session. I called for the correspondence between the Government of the United States and that of Great Britain in reference to the joint occupation of the island of San Juan, in Puget's sound. Of course I knew but very little concerning the state of the negotiations, nor did I know what amount of manuscript it might be necessary for the Department to furnish in response to the call. Does the Senator suppose that a committee of the Senate, in such a case as that, would go to the Secretary of State and ask permission to look over the entire correspondence between the two Governments in order to make up an estimate of the cost of responding to the call?

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir. If it was sent to a committee of which I was a member, I should address a note to the Secretary of State, send him a copy of the resolution, and ask him how many clerks it would probably take, and how long, to furnish the information required.

Mr. HOWARD. That might be done, undoubtedly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There would be no trouble about it.

Mr. HOWARD. But after all, Mr. President, I see no ground of attacking the old rules because a compliance with such a call may lead to expense. That seems to be the burden of the complaint of the Senator from Maine. Undoubtedly, there are cases in which useless expense is incurred; but is it not one of the incidents of a free government? Is it not one of the inseparable consequences of a perfectly free inquiry upon all matters connected with legislation and with our public affairs? Is it possible to avoid it? Do not the people pay their money readily for such information? Is it not, after all, one of the most indispensable qualifications of a member of Congress to be fully and completely informed upon all subjects of public concern on which he may be called to act in his legislative capacity?

It seems to me that the scheme of the committee to narrow down our expenses in reference to these calls for information is totally impracticable; and I would not, if I could, carry out the ideas which seem to be entertained by the honorable Senator from Maine. Give us perfectly free inquiry, such as we have had always from the commencement of the Government down to the present time. It is what we need, and it is what the people need. If money is unnecessarily expended for such a purpose, it is not our fault nor the fault of the people; but it is the fault of the frame of Government under which we have the good fortune to live, if it can be called a fault.

I hope, sir, as this is an entire novelty, one which is entirely without precedent in any State government, and has never been resorted to by our own Government hitherto, that we will not embark upon this experiment of being penny-wise, while at the same time it will turn out that we are pound-foolish.

Mr. DAVIS. I concede the high authority of the Senator from Maine upon all subjects on which he chooses to give information or to express his opinion to the Senate; but in relation to the matter of the resolution which I read a few minutes ago I have authority that is higher, with me at least, than that of the honorable Senator from Maine. I am assured by an officer, one of the best and most efficient officers in the Department, that it would require but a very short time to give all the information that is asked for in that resolution. I have no doubt myself that that officer could put a clerk to work, and in less than one week's time he would furnish accurate and reliable information upon every head of the resolution. I do not entertain any doubt of it from the information that I have received from one of the officers.

I am furthermore assured that if the resolution was fully responded to it would disclose contracts of sale and of hire at a rate of sale and of hire, and worthlessness in the vessels sold and hired, and also sales made by the Government of vessels that were of a good quality at prices that would demonstrate to any unprejudiced mind that there was corruption or the greatest negligence and inefficiency in this part of the public service. I do not believe, where books are properly kept, that it requires the length of time that we frequently hear intimated to give information that is asked for by Senators.

Mr. GRIMES. I inquire of the Senator if that officer of whom he speaks informed him that the Department kept books which showed the facts embodied in this inquiry?

Mr. DAVIS. He told me that it would not take long to give the information I wanted; and that was sufficient for me.

Now, Mr. President, here is an exceptional service in the War Department. What has the Secretary of War or the War Office or the War Department to do, properly, with the purchase of vessels? It may become necessary, and has no doubt become necessary, and has often been proper; but it is rather an exceptional part of the service attached to the War Department, belonging particularly and peculiarly to the Navy. So far as the War Department has been attending to business of this kind, purchasing vessels, hiring vessels, selling vessels, and all that sort of thing, I am assured by an officer in whom I have the highest confidence that all the information sought for by the resolution, if a particular bureau or office of the Department had been asked, could have been given in a very reasonable time. But there is no response, no reply to it. If instead of appealing to the Carnot of the War Department, according to the usage and custom of the Government, there had been a rule of the Senate that authorized me to appeal directly to a particular subordinate officer, I could have got this information long ago, without much trouble, delay, or expense, I have no doubt.

But the honorable Senator from Michigan suggested intrinsic difficulties to the execution of this rule, if it should be adopted. How can the different committees speak of what would be the approximate cost and the time for answering calls on particular subjects in the different Departments? The committee would have to go there and explore each Department and each bureau and each office, and ascertain the extent of the entries of records there, before they could give even an approximate judgment as to what would be the cost of answering such calls and what would be the time and the additional force that would be required. I think, with the honorable Senator from Michigan, that the matter had better be left where it has been from the beginning, and that each call should be left to be passed upon and adjudged by the Senate upon the proper responsibility of Senators in open Senate.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish to say simply a word upon the suggestion made by the honorable Senator from Maine when up touching this rule, as to the course that would be pursued under it, namely, that a committee would address the proper Department and get an estimate of the expense involved in the inquiry. There, sir, would be its greatest abuse. If the resolution called upon the head of a Department who did not want to make the reformations asked for the estimate of expenses might be put at such a rate as would discourage the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They would lie about it!

Mr. CONNESS. The honorable Senator from Maine says they would lie about it. Well, sir, the honorable Senator, having been once the head of a Department, may be the best judge of whether they would or not.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I mean that is the charge the Senator makes. I do not say it is so. He says distinctly that they would make such a report as would discourage action; that is, an untrue report. That is nothing but charging them with falsehood.

Mr. CONNESS. I would not say that the Senator was sensitive, because it is not sensitiveness that caused him to make the response that he did. He was fairly caught in his own trap, and I have nothing to say in reply to it. I did not, however, intend to say that the head of a Department would tell a falsehood; but we know that in connection with these matters there is a certain amount of elasticity that might be practiced; and I hardly think the honorable Senator would like to state to the contrary.

Mr. FESSENDEN. As the honorable Senator appeals to me, I will state—

Mr. CONNESS. No; I did not make an appeal to the Senator.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will state that in a matter of verity I do not plead guilty to any elasticity of conscience. The Senator speaks for his own conscience, I suppose, not for mine.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, I have already said that I never had any experience as the head of a Department. How can I speak from my own experience?

Mr. FESSENDEN. You spoke of elasticity of conscience.

Mr. CONNESS. Nor have I attributed the elasticity suggested to my honorable friend. I rather think that if the honorable Senator lacks any of the graces it is the grace of elasticity, and particularly in the direction that I have indicated. I concede, in other words, entire truthfulness to my friend.

But I rose also to take exception, in a friendly manner, to some very broad statements made by the honorable Senator from Kentucky when last up. His resolution, to which he alluded, calls for information from the War Department touching contracts for the hire and sale of vessels; and in that connection the honorable Senator incidentally condemned the practice of hiring and selling vessels by the War Department.

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir; the honorable Senator mistook me. I did not condemn it.

Mr. CONNESS. I understood the honorable Senator to say that all that class of business more properly belonged to, or came under the head of, the Navy Department.

Mr. DAVIS. I said it was exceptional to the War Department.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, it was not exceptional to the War Department. The War Department necessarily did very much of it during the war. All that related to the transportation of troops, in the hire and purchase and sale of vessels, devolved upon the War Department. In this connection the Senator undertook to say that if he had been furnished with the report called for he could reveal transactions discreditable to the head of the War Department. Upon that I take direct issue with the honorable Senator; and although I know, and we all know, which of the two Secretaries of the War Department, the real or the bogus one, our friend's affections and affinities go to—

Mr. DAVIS. Will the Senator allow me—

Mr. CONNESS. When I finish my sentence I will give way to the honorable Senator. I, nevertheless, have that confidence in the sense of justice of the honorable Senator to believe that he would not, knowingly, charge even the present head of the War Department with a wrong.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the honorable Senator now permit me?

Mr. CONNESS. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVIS. The honorable Senator in attributing to me any inclination whatever to either of these honorable Secretaries does the Secretaries or myself great injustice. I never had any such feeling toward either of them. I never was in the presence of either of them but once each; and I assure the honorable Senator that toward both of them I have no feelings whatever but those of repugnance. [Laughter.]

Now, in relation to what I expect to establish by the proof—of course I do not know personally that it would establish; but my information is that it would reveal an administration of the War Department in relation to these particular transactions that would be calculated to bring upon it the highest discredit.

Mr. CONNESS. I can readily understand, and so can the Senate, the truth of what the Senator says, that he regards both of these functionaries with equal repugnance. We know by a long experience that the real Secretary of War is very cordially disliked by the honorable Senator; and we also know that innately and instinctively the Senator despises a pretender. Consequently, he can have no particular regard for the ad interim Secretary.

Mr. HOWE. Ad interim. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNESS. Ad interim, the honorable Senator suggests. Very well; you can have it either way. But what I rose to say was this: that one of the best acts of Edwin M. Stanton as Secretary of War was in bringing to prompt arrest and condign punishment the perpetrators of frauds upon the Treasury in the very branch of service to which the Senator's resolution alludes and relates. One of my first experiences when I arrived here in 1863, with a commission as United States Senator, was in this very connection. Some gentlemen visited me claiming to be constituents of mine, and claiming that they were prevented by an order of the Secretary of War from going to Fortress Monroe where they had property, and asking me to interfere in their behalf. After making a considerable statement, I visited the Secretary of War, but not until I became pretty well satisfied from the statement of the parties themselves that they were engaged in connection with illicit proceedings. However, I visited the Secretary of War. I found that it related to the celebrated case, well-known by the Senate, and which was afterward investigated by the Senate, of Captain Hunt, who had been arrested by the Secretary of War and imprisoned in the Old Capitol prison. Without going into the exact particulars of the case, with which I am pretty familiar, I will say that I quit it, being convinced of the promptness, the fairness, and the justice with which the Secretary had acted in the case and in like cases; and I added then, that if I were in his place and had the power, I would have exacted a very much severer sentence against those malefactors.

I desire the Senator to understand something about this branch of the service, and so I will state what that case was. There were quartermasters necessarily intrusted with the purchase of vessels to transport troops, munitions of war, and supplies from point to point by sea; and there were superintendents of transportation; and then there were collusions gotten up between these quartermasters and the superintendents of transportation. The superintendent of transportation would condemn a vessel purchased by his confederate, the quartermaster, and the quartermaster upon such condemnation would offer the vessel for sale, and sell it in such a manner as that it might be purchased by a third party to the transaction and a confederate at a very low rate. Then, with a coat of paint, or some other means of changing the outer aspect of the craft, she was relet or resold to the Government, being offered to another officer. It was simply impossible for the Secretary of War, being here at Washington involved in the immense outlays and intricacies of the Department that he was then at the head of, to become immediately and instantly acquainted with the subtleties and schemes of these men intent on but one purpose, and that was to enrich themselves in that period of great public excitement and concern at the public expense. But so soon as information came to Mr. Stanton he laid his strong hand upon each of those malefactors and put them in a public prison, against which acts, from time to time, my honorable friend, in behalf of the rights and liberties of the individual citizen, cried out in stentor tones. I have no doubt that my friend really is an advocate of individual rights and a fair administration of law; but I have no doubt either that he has often allowed himself, and in this very connection, to condemn prompt and decided action necessary to suppress frauds under the circumstances that I have detailed, when, if he had been acquainted with all the circumstances of the case, he himself would have gone further, and had he the power, have ordered the villains to be shot.

Now, sir, it has been rather in order to attack the head of the War Department. I have rarely, I think I have never, spoken a word in this body in his defense. It was my good fortune, however, when I came here first, to be introduced favorably to that honorable gentleman; and it has also continued to be my good fortune to have uninterrupted relations with him to the present hour. I necessarily went to his Department with much public business, very often with business that I would like to have had done and consummated according to the requests made by constituents and friends of mine. But, sir, from the day that I first met him as a public officer to the present hour he has constantly challenged my admiration by the exact rectitude and impartiality of his judgments in connection with the propositions that I submitted to him. Nothing for favor, nothing for partiality, nothing for friendship, but everything for justice and for the country and for a faithful administration of the law. That, sir, is how I found that officer. And in the very connection that the honorable Senator asked for this information, while another man in his place with less will, less natural probity, and less courage would have paltered with the thieves and the thieving would have gone on, he reached out the strong hand of power and crushed them and their schemes so soon as he could possibly get information of them. Such, sir, has been my experience and such is my opinion of him.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN obtained the floor.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope the Senator from New Jersey will allow me to appeal to Senators on both sides of the Chamber to let Mr. Stanton alone, and go on with these rules.

Mr. CONNESS. Well, Mr. President, I felt that it was my duty, and due to the Secretary of War to say what I have said.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator's speech was very proper and very timely, and I listened to it with pleasure; but the Secretary of War has been sufficiently vindicated, and I hope we shall now go on with the consideration of these rules.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have but a word to say in reference to this rule; nothing in reference to Mr. Stanton. I think that this is a very important rule; and that it is very important that it should not be adopted. I think that the rule would virtually stop all inquiry. If one offers a resolution for inquiry on any subject it is to be referred to a committee. That committee may not meet for a week after the member makes the motion; and then, after the information is obtained, it may be another week before the report can be made; and thus ten days or a fortnight will elapse necessarily, and the time and the occasion for which the information is wanted will have passed.

But the important objection to this rule is, that it strikes at a most valuable principle. I agree with the Senator from Maine that the Departments of this country have generally been managed with integrity and care; and I believe that it is in some degree attributable to the fact that they are always subjected to this free inquiry on the part of Congress. And if the expense of this supervision and inquiry is, as is said, $100,000 a year, I believe it secures to this country incidents worth millions a year, and I would not destroy it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We had better abolish the taxes if we can get our money so easily.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. A principle is worth more than money. You might better abolish the tax bill than abolish the principle which lies at the foundation of this Government, namely, that the President and every Department shall be subject to the inquiry and free investigation by the representatives of the people. The rule proposed would destroy entirely the principle that the people shall investigate all the departments of this Government, because it would delay the investigation until the occasion had passed, and would be subject to the political opinions or biases of whatever committee it was referred to, and be circumscribed and limited by the question at every turn, "What will it cost?"

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think there is no doubt that these rules must lead to an extended debate; and I move, therefore, that their further consideration be postponed for the present, and that the Senate take up the message from the President which has just now been announced.

Mr. ANTHONY. If we cannot come to a vote on the rules, I have no objection to laying them aside informally for the purpose of having the veto message laid before the Senate. But my opinion is that we are ready to vote on this proposition, and there is no other question to be presented.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I believe there are other amendments to be offered.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let us take a vote on this proposition at any rate. If there be further debate I shall not object to the Senator's motion.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well; I withdraw my motion for the present with a view to allow the vote to be taken, if there is to be no further debate.

Mr. ANTHONY. If there is to be further debate, I shall not insist.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan to strike out the proposed fifty-fourth rule.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If no further amendment be proposed, the rules will be reported to the Senate. [A pause.] The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, has had under consideration "standing rules for conducting business in the Senate of the United States," as reported by the select committee on that subject. These rules are still open to amendment. If no amendment be proposed, the question is on the adoption of the rules as reported from the Senate acting as in Committee of the Whole.

The rules were adopted.

On motion of Mr. ANTHONY, five hundred copies of the rules were ordered to be printed.

SUPREME COURT JURISDICTION—VETO.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the veto message.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The message is on the table, and will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

I have considered, with such care as the pressure of other duties has permitted, a bill entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to amend the judiciary act passed the 24th of September, 1789.'" Not being able to approve all of its provisions, I herewith return it to the Senate, in which House it originated, with a brief statement of my objections.

The first section of the bill meets my approbation, as, for the purpose of protecting the rights of property from the erroneous decisions of inferior judicial tribunals, it provides means for obtaining uniformity by appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States in cases which have now become very numerous and of much public interest, and in which such remedy is not now allowed. The second section, however, takes away the right of appeal to that court in cases which involve the life and liberty of the citizen, and leaves them exposed to the judgment of numerous inferior tribunals. It is apparent that the two sections were conceived in a very different spirit, and I regret that my objection to one imposes upon me the necessity of withholding my sanction from the other.

I cannot give my assent to a measure which proposes to deprive any person "restrained of his or her liberty in violation of the Constitution, or of any treaty or law of the United States," from the right of appeal to the highest judicial authority known to our Government. To "secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity" is one of the declared objects of the Federal Constitution. To assure these guarantees are provided in the same instrument, as well against "unreasonable searches and seizures" as against the suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, unless when, in cases of "rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it." It was, doubtless, to afford the people the means of protecting and enforcing these inestimable privileges that the jurisdiction which this bill proposes to take away was conferred upon the Supreme Court of the Union. The act conferring that jurisdiction was approved on the 5th day of February, 1867, with a full knowledge of the motives that prompted its passage, and because it was believed to be necessary and right. Nothing has since occurred to disprove the wisdom and justness of the measure; and to modify it as now proposed would be to lessen the protection of the citizen from the exercise of arbitrary power and to weaken the safeguards of life and liberty, which can never be made too secure against illegal encroachments.

The bill not only prohibits the adjudication by the Supreme Court of cases in which appeals may hereafter be taken, but interdicts its jurisdiction on appeals which have already been made to that high judicial body. If, therefore, it should become a law it will, by its retroactive operation, wrest from the citizen a remedy which he enjoyed at the time of his appeal. It will thus operate most harshly upon those who believe that justice has been denied them in the inferior courts.

The legislation proposed in the second section, it seems to me, is not in harmony with the spirit and intention of the Constitution. It cannot fail to affect most injuriously the just equipoise of our system of Government; for it establishes a precedent which, if followed, may eventually sweep away every check on arbitrary and unconstitutional legislation. Thus far during the existence of the Government the Supreme Court of the United States has been viewed by the people as the true expounder of their Constitution, and in the most violent party conflicts its judgments and decrees have always been sought and deferred to with confidence and respect. In public estimation it combines judicial wisdom and impartiality in a greater degree than any other authority known to the Constitution; and any act which may be construed into or mistaken for an attempt to prevent or evade its decisions on a question which affects the liberty of the citizens and agitates the country cannot fail to be attended with unpropitious consequences. It will be justly held by a large portion of the people as an admission of the unconstitutionality of the act on which its judgment may be forbidden or forestalled, and may interfere with that willing acquiescence in its provisions which is necessary for the harmonious and efficient execution of any law.

For these reasons, thus briefly and imperfectly stated, and for others, of which want of time forbids the enumeration, I deem it my duty to withhold my assent from this bill, and to return it for the reconsideration of Congress.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 25, 1868.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill returned by the President of the United States, with his objections, pass, the objections to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I ask that the consideration of the message be set for tomorrow, at one o'clock. The Senate will recollect the circumstances under which this bill passed. There was no opportunity to debate it in the Senate. I waited here until nearly five o'clock that day, when the Senate went into executive session. I had given a general attention to all the bills having reference to the Supreme Court which were pending in the two Houses; and it was my desire, as one member of the Senate, to express my opposition to the measure contained in the House amendment to this bill as it originally passed. While the Senate was in executive session, I think, information of the adoption of the House amendment to this bill was communicated to the Senate. The Senate came out of executive session into open session, and then the bill was taken up after most of the Senators or a large number of them at least had left, not suspecting that any business of that importance would be taken up at so late an hour in the evening.

In view of these circumstances, I hope that the honorable Senator from Oregon will consent that this matter be made the special order for to-morrow at one o'clock, with a view to give Senators who are opposed to the measure some opportunity of investigating it. I have had no such opportunity myself. I have had no information, and no belief until this morning that there would be a veto message of the bill; and therefore I have made no particular research, and have not indulged in such particular reflection as would justify me in claiming the attention of the Senate upon it at this time. I should like to have an opportunity to be heard upon the measure. It is one of great importance, and I think it deserves mature consideration.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky moves that the further consideration of the bill and message be postponed until to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. BUCKALEW. If there is no opposition to that motion I do not care to speak at this time.

Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. STEWART. There is opposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to postpone.

The question being put, it was declared to be carried in the negative; and a division was called for.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, before the division is had, I wish to say one word. The question is on the proposition to postpone the consideration of this measure until to-morrow. I wish merely to say that I hope that will be done. As one member of the Senate, I have, in one way or other, not been able to examine this bill as thoroughly as I would desire. All Senators will concede that it is an important measure; and it is known, as has been suggested by the Senator from Kentucky, that the bill itself passed the Senate under rather unusual circumstances, under such circumstances that our attention was not called to it. It excited no debate on its passage; and now the granting of one day to look into it is certainly not hazardous to the public interests. Perhaps it may be proper for me to suggest that it is understood that the Supreme Court of the United States has declined to take any action upon any case that is now before it under the act proposed to be repealed until the will of Congress upon this particular bill shall finally be known. If that be so, and I suppose there is no doubt about it, there is no occasion to hurry the consideration of the bill; and it leaves just one single question for the Senate to consider upon this particular application; and that is, whether there shall be such time given to Senators to examine the measure as is ordinarily allowed on important questions.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suppose the Senators are aware that there is very little time in which to consider matters of legislation before the impeachment trial commences. Although there is nothing, as it seems to me, involved in this bill except simply repealing an act that was passed last year affecting the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court—a matter which is clearly within the rightful power of Congress—yet it is of such a nature as to open a wide and boundless field of discussion if Senators are disposed to occupy that field. I am not, of course, disposed to press this matter unreasonably; and I will now propose that if a vote can be taken to-morrow upon the question—

Mr. JOHNSON. Or the next day.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I say to-morrow. If we can have any assurance that the vote can be taken to-morrow I do not know that I shall have any objection to its going over.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Say the day after to-morrow. I wish to be heard very briefly. There is no purpose of delay.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am sure that the honorable member from Oregon has no desire to force this bill through to-day, if he is satisfied that the public interest does not require it, and if he is further satisfied that those who think the bill ought not to pass sincerely desire an opportunity of investigating it, and I presume he is satisfied upon both points. I speak knowingly when I say—and I do not regret, for one, that the Supreme Court have come to that determination—that as long as this bill is pending it is not their purpose to dispose of a case which has already been argued, and which is before the court under the authority of the act which the bill upon your table proposes to repeal. It has, I know, been urged upon them that they should disregard the pendency of this measure and proceed to announce whatever decision they may have formed, if they have formed any, upon the case which is before them; but they have determined, as they have done upon former occasions, not to pursue such a course. I recollect, certainly, a case of that description, and the honorable member from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] will, when I remind him of it, agree, I think, that my recollection of it is accurate.

During the pendency of the territorial government of Nevada cases were decided in the superior court of the Territory, and brought up, as they could be by the law at that time, to the Supreme Court of the United States. While they were pending in that court the Territory became a State, and was admitted into the Union as a State. The law admitting it as a State did not provide for the continuance of the cases that were before the Supreme Court of the United States upon writs of error prosecuted to the territorial court or appeals from that court. There were one or two cases of very great importance. I think the honorable member from Nevada was counsel in one of those cases, and he or his associate counsel made a motion in the Supreme Court to dismiss the cases then pending upon writ of error to the territorial court, upon the ground that there was then no Territory of Nevada, and that the law under which the State had been admitted into the Union did not provide for the continuance of those cases. It was very evident, as I thought at the time—I was not counsel on either side—that the dismissal must have been ordered, and I have no doubt they would have been dismissed if the decision were then pronounced. They involved a large amount of property, as I understood; and application was made to Congress, or action was proposed without any application by some member of this body, and, perhaps, by myself, to cure what we supposed would be the injustice of dismissing the cases under the circumstances by passing a law giving the court jurisdiction to decide upon them. The measure was pending here for some time.

I think the honorable member from Nevada opposed it upon constitutional grounds. I endeavored to satisfy the Senate, and, as the result proved, the Senate was satisfied, either because of what I said or of what others said, that it had authority to pass such a law, and the law was passed. The court during the whole of that period were ready to deliver an opinion sustaining the motion to dismiss, but they held up that decision until Congress should have an opportunity of deciding whether jurisdiction should continue or not. The honorable member from Nevada, in the Supreme Court, either by himself or his associates, argued against the constitutionality of that legislation, but the court sustained it, and the motion to dismiss was overruled, and the cases went on to be heard upon their merits. How they were decided I do not recollect.

Now, if the court thought, as, in my judgment, they very properly thought, that it was their business to await the determination of a measure of that kind then pending in Congress, it was equally their duty—and I am glad that they so considered it—to forbear deciding the case now before them under the provisions of the act of 1867 when they knew that there was pending before Congress, in point of fact, a law passed by Congress repealing the act under which the case came before the Supreme Court, and they have withheld their decision. That being so, there can be no necessity whatever for hastening the determination of Congress upon the particular measure now before us. No possible mischief can result from postponement.

Then, if the sincerity of those who are opposed to the particular measure was not (as I am sure it will be) admitted, the next objection would be that the debate would be unnecessarily prolonged. I am satisfied that such will not be the case; and, speaking for myself, I know that if I take any part in the debate it will not be to consume time. I am satisfied that no member of the Senate who thinks that the act ought not to be passed will address the Senate merely for the purpose of delay and to prevent the majority, if there should be a majority for the measure, from expressing their opinion in a reasonable time.

I submit, therefore, to the honorable member from Oregon, that we may come to an understanding that the vote upon this measure shall be taken on the day after to-morrow. We do not meet until twelve o'clock, and the hour until one is, or ought to be, occupied with the usual business of the morning hour; and then there may be other business pending during a portion of the day, so that the arrangement I propose will afford a very short time to enable Senators who desire to participate in the discussion to take part in it. I feel some desire to do so myself, but I am not now prepared to do so in a way in which I should like to appear before the Senate in discussing a measure of this kind, if I discuss it at all. I hope, therefore, that the proposition will be acceded to—that the measure shall be passed over until to-morrow, with the understanding that the day after to-morrow it shall be decided.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, when this bill came back from the House of Representatives with the second section as an amendment, it has already been stated that the Senate had arrived about at the hour of its adjournment; it was near five o'clock; a number of Senators had left, and those who remained were fatigued and anxious to adjourn. It was under these circumstances that, upon the reading of this amendment, I called attention to its character and submitted a motion to postpone the question until the following day. Very much to my surprise, sir, that motion was rejected; postponement was refused, and the amendment was presently put to a vote. I asked for an explanation of it from the honorable Senator who had the bill in charge. He made none, except simply to state that it was an amendment repealing the act of 1867 and restoring or leaving the law to stand on the act of 1789. I asked for time, that the law which it was proposed to repeal might be read. That opportunity or that time was not afforded me.

All that I understood about the amendment was that it was one to repeal the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, so far as appeals from the circuit courts were concerned in cases affecting personal liberty. The effect of the amendment upon the great case pending in the Supreme Court I did not fully understand, although I supposed it had application to it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator permit me to say a word?

Mr. BUCKALEW. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This discussion has sprung up on a proposition, as I understand, as to when the vote on the measure shall be taken. I propose that the bill shall go over until to-morrow, if that is desired by Senators, with the understanding that a vote shall be taken to-morrow at five o'clock. I do not make this proposition with reference to any action by the Supreme Court. I am not advised particularly as to what the Supreme Court do or do not intend to do; and, of course, I shall not be governed in my action by that consideration. But it will be necessary, if this bill is passed by the Senate, that it shall go to the House of Representatives, where it must, of course, be more or less discussed; and I wish so to provide that, if possible, it may be passed through both Houses this week, because the next week will be taken up with other business, and the legislation of the country cannot proceed. If that will be satisfactory—and I am sure the friends of this bill will give the gentlemen on the other side a very large proportion of the time in which to discuss the subject—I propose to let the bill go over until to-morrow, with the understanding that the vote shall be taken by five o'clock. I would agree to continue its consideration for a longer time if I thought the action of the other House could be had before the commencement of next week.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I will come to that question in a moment, Mr. President. The statement has been made, and very extensively published in the newspapers of the country, that this amendment was voted on in the House of Representatives, and was concurred in by the Senate, without any person understanding it in either House except gentlemen who were concerned in proposing the amendment, and who desired its enactment. I have stated the facts as they took place in the Senate to show that, so far as I was concerned, there was no lack of vigilance in relation to this measure; that I did all I could to procure delay upon it in order that it might be thoroughly examined; and I called for the yeas and nays on the question of concurring in the amendment, and recorded myself against it; but as the question came up just at the time of adjournment, when the Senate was thin and fatigued, and I, myself, exhausted, it was impossible at that time to enter upon the debate; and by the refusal of the Senate to give me any time whatever for its consideration it was impossible that any gentleman should enter upon its discussion. At all events, so far as I am concerned, I disavow altogether, for myself, the imputation which has been so extensively published throughout the country, that members of the Senate who are now opposed to the enactment of this particular measure were in fault, either with regard to the attention which they bestowed on the subject or with regard to any effort to procure its due consideration.

Now, sir, the measure having passed under the circumstances I have mentioned, I am not at all disposed to become a party to an agreement such as the Senator from Oregon speaks of, now, before anything has been done in the way of debate upon the bill, to fix an arbitrary limit for debate under circumstances unprecedented, as far as I know, in the history of measures in this body. After debate has gone on upon a measure to a certain extent, when members of the Senate think it has been sufficiently debated, it is occasionally our habit by mutual understanding to fix some time when the vote shall be taken. Now, the Senator asks that this shall be done before we enter upon its consideration at all. I object to the introduction of this new practice, not so much because I desire delay upon this bill; I do not intend to speak upon it at length, and I do not suppose the gentlemen opposed to it generally intend to speak at length or to occupy any unreasonable time; and, so far as I understand their views, they will be perfectly content to conclude this subject at all events within the next two sittings of the Senate. That will afford ample opportunity to send the bill to the other House on Friday.

There will be, doubtless, a Saturday session of both Houses, so that there will be no lack, no want of time for disposing of this matter. My desire is that we shall simply postpone it for the present, and let the debate go on to-morrow and come to an end to-morrow, if an end can then be attained; and, if not, that it shall at all events be concluded on the day following within reasonable time for final action, and this ought to be done certainly in the case of a measure which underwent no debate in either House when it was under consideration originally.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, it is well known that there is important business before the Senate of an executive character; and I think, perhaps, in the present state of this question, there may be a compromise between both sides by proceeding with the consideration of executive business with the understanding that this measure shall be in order at one o'clock to-morrow to be proceeded with; and I would add, also, with the further understanding that a vote should be reached some time in the course of to-morrow afternoon, say by four or five o'clock. I will move, therefore, that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Several SENATORS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Massachusetts is not a debatable motion under the rules which have just now been adopted.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not wish to debate it, but I wish, as a matter of justice, perhaps, to the Senator from Massachusetts, to say that I do not vote to go into executive session with the understanding that we shall come to a vote on this other question to-morrow.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope, then, we shall not go into executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business; and that motion must be decided without debate under the present rules.

The motion was not agreed to; there being, on a division—yeas 19, noes 21.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, as the Senators who seem to be opposed to the consideration of this subject are unwilling to have any understanding in regard to taking the vote and protest against any such understanding, I see no other way but to proceed with the consideration of the measure. I wish, however, in the outset, to say one word in reply to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW] as to the importance of this measure. In my judgment there is no such great importance to be attached to it. It is a bill of very little importance, in my judgment; and I wish to say to the Senator from Maryland that the Supreme Court has not decided that any case is pending before it under the act of February 5, 1867. No such decision has been made, nor do I believe any such decision ever would be made.

The second section of this act repeals so much of an act passed a year ago as authorizes appeals from the circuit courts to the Supreme Court in a certain class of cases, of which class no such case is in the Supreme Court, in my judgment. We had lived ever since the formation of the Government down to 1867 without any law upon the statute-book authorizing an appeal from a circuit court to the Supreme Court in habeas corpus cases generally; there was a special provision for an appeal where a foreigner was arrested and claimed some right under the law of nations, by a statute passed, I think, in 1842. The act of 1867 was not the first act which authorized writs of habeas corpus to be issued by the United States courts. The act of 1789 authorized the issuing of all such writs in cases where persons were deprived of their liberty under authority or color of authority of the United States. Why, then, was the act of 1867 passed? It was passed to authorize writs of habeas corpus to issue in cases where persons were deprived of their liberty under State laws or pretended State laws. It was the object of the act of 1867 to confer jurisdiction on the United States courts in cases not before provided for, and it was to meet a class of cases which was arising in the rebel States, where, under pretense of certain State laws, men made free by the Constitution of the United States were virtually being enslaved, and it was also applicable to cases in the State of Maryland where, under an apprentice law, freedmen were being subjected to a species of bondage. The object was to authorize a habeas corpus in those cases to issue from the United States courts, and to be taken by appeal to the Supreme Court. Now, there is no such case as that pending in the Supreme Court, and there has been no such case pending in the Supreme Court.

That was the object of the statute of 1867; and it is proposed to repeal that provision. When the Senator from Maryland says that this is repealing a law which gives the Supreme Court jurisdiction of a case now before it, and a great case, he assumes the very point in dispute. There is no such case before the Supreme Court, in my judgment, nor has the court decided that there is any such case.

Now, sir, it seems to me that this is not a bill of such vast importance as to require any great delay. Nor is it true, as the Senator from Pennsylvania assumes, that the Senate was very thin when the bill passed. The Senator from Pennsylvania called attention to this bill, and he called for the yeas and nays, and the record shows that thirty-eight Senators voted on the call of the yeas and nays. I think that is about as full as the Senate ordinarily is; larger, I presume, than the average votes in the body. Thirty-two Senators voted for it and six Senators voted against it. The President of the United States in his message—I do not propose to go into the discussion of it at this time—regards the passage of this bill as dangerous to the liberties of the people! Why, sir, the liberties of this people had been pretty well preserved for three quarters of a century without the act of February 5, 1867, in any of its provisions; and all the securities that were ever afforded, until within the last year, are left just as they always have been.

I hope, sir, we may go on with the consideration of this subject now, unless there can be some understanding that we shall get a vote to-morrow.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, my honorable friend from Illinois seems to think that there is no importance in this measure; that it affects nothing and nobody; that there is no case pending in the Supreme Court which this act will affect; that it is a mistake and a delusion on our part to suppose that there is any such case there, under the law of 1867. Well, sir, if he be correct in this, why the great haste for pressing this bill? What does it mean? If there is no case in the Supreme Court to which it will apply, if there is no importance in this measure, why is it pressed?

Sir, I apprehend that the honorable Senator from Illinois is altogether mistaken in the view which he now presents; that this is a very important measure, and that there is a very important case pending in the Supreme Court under the act which it is now proposed to repeal. The honorable Senator himself, as counsel in that court, if I am correctly informed, with other counsel, made a motion to dismiss a case pending in the Supreme Court, or alleged to be pending, under this act, and the court refused to dismiss it. I think the presumption is, when the court refuse to dismiss it and the ground urged for dismissal was that they had no jurisdiction, that the court decided that they had jurisdiction of the case, and that there is a case pending there. We all know, the whole world knows, that this case of McCordle is pending in the Supreme Court, brought up on appeal, under the act of 1867, from the circuit court of Mississippi, and that that case has been argued, argued by eminent counsel, and that it is pending.

It is important because the case involves the constitutionality of the reconstruction acts which confer upon military tribunals the power to try men in civil life without the presentment of a grand jury and without trial by a petit jury, as is required by the Constitution of the United States. It involves the constitutionality of these acts which have been passed by Congress. If there be no such case before the court why does the honorable Senator desire to pass this bill to take away jurisdiction of a case which does not exist? If the honorable Senator does not believe it is an important question to determine whether these acts be or be not constitutional, if he has faith to believe that they are constitutional, and that the court will decide that they are constitutional, why undertake to take away the jurisdiction of the court?

Mr. President, the truth is, and we may as well look it square in the face, it is because men know that these acts will be decided to be unconstitutional. That is the reason why they desire to take away from the court the consideration of the question. The matter has been considered; it has already been argued on both sides; and the court stands ready to decide one way or the other, unless Congress interfere and take away its power to decide. Why this haste to take away the power? Is it because you know that the court will decide your acts to be unconstitutional?

Mr. WILSON. I desire to ask a question of the Senator, if he will yield?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator says that Senators know that the Supreme Court will decide certain acts to be unconstitutional. How does the Senator from Wisconsin know that?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have not said that. My honorable friend is mistaken. I say it is because honorable Senators fear that the court will so decide that they make this effort to take away its jurisdiction.

Mr. WILSON. I understood the Senator to say that we knew it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I did not intend to say that Senators know what the Supreme Court will decide. If I said that, it is more than I intended to say. I say it is because they fear it; because they know that the constitutionality of the measures is devolved, and they fear that the decision will be against their constitutionality that they make this effort to take away the jurisdiction. No other reason can be given.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President—

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will the Senator from Nevada allow me to read a single sentence from the opinion of the court to show that the Senator from Wisconsin has incorrectly stated it?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I understood the Senator from Wisconsin to say that the Supreme Court had decided, on the motion to dismiss an appeal, that the case referred to was a case under the act of 1867.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. No, sir. I said they refused to dismiss it, and therefore I thought the fair presumption was that the court were of opinion that they had jurisdiction of it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Well, sir, I will read what the court itself said, and that will answer the Senator's presumption:

"Another objection to the jurisdiction of this court on appeal was drawn from the clause of the first section, which declares that the jurisdiction defined by it is 'in addition to the authority already conferred by law.'"

"This objection seems to be an objection to the jurisdiction of the circuit court over the cause rather than to the jurisdiction of this court on appeal."

"The latter jurisdiction, as has just been shown, is coextensive with the former. Every question of substance which the circuit court could decide upon the return of the habeas corpus, including the question of its own jurisdiction, may be revised here on appeal from its final judgment."

"But an inquiry on this motion into the jurisdiction of the circuit court would be premature. It would extend to the merits of the cause, in that court."

The point was that that court had no jurisdiction under the act of 1867; and the Supreme Court expressly say that that is a question to be decided with the merits of the cause, and they do not decide it on this motion.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understand the Supreme Court to say that as to the jurisdiction of the court below they do not now assume to pass on that until the case comes up for hearing; but, as to their own jurisdiction, they do say that they have a right to review the whole case and decide whether the court below had jurisdiction or not, as well as every other question involved in the case.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let there be no misunderstanding between the Senator from Wisconsin and myself about the point. The court expressly refused to decide whether the circuit court had jurisdiction under the act of 1867, and that is the very point. If the circuit court did not have jurisdiction under the act of 1867, then, of course, the Supreme Court had no jurisdiction, because the two jurisdictions are coextensive. They refused to pass upon that question expressly. Before the act of 1867 no appeal lay in a habeas corpus case to the Supreme Court. It was the act of 1867 that gave the right to appeal to the Supreme Court. Under the act of 1789 no such thing as an appeal in a habeas corpus case to the Supreme Court was ever known, and so the court had often decided that an appeal did not lie. Then the question was whether in this particular case the circuit court had jurisdiction under the act of 1867 or under the act of 1789, and the Supreme Court said they would not decide that until the merits of the case came up. Now, suppose it appears on the merits that the jurisdiction in the particular case referred to was under the act of 1789, then, as a matter of course, the Supreme Court has no jurisdiction, or the circuit court either, under the act of 1867, and that is an end of the case; and that is just what the court did not decide on this motion.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That confirms just what I stated. The Supreme Court decided that they had jurisdiction of the decision of the court below and the right to review it, and review the whole of it; but the question as to whether the court below had jurisdiction of the case or not they would not decide until they came to decide on the merits.

Mr. STEWART. I suppose, in considering a law of this character, Congress must place it on grounds of public policy and public convenience, as they do all laws. If the act of February 5, 1867, can be construed so as to give appellate jurisdiction in habeas corpus cases generally to the Supreme Court, it certainly must be admitted by all to have been a great blunder. It must have been an inadvertence; for while the Supreme Court is two or three or four years behind with its business and the vast interests of the country there are delayed as they are, and the rights of litigants practically denied, to load it with business of this character that never has been thought of before to the exclusion of other business certainly is legislation that should be at once corrected. I think the McCord case, which has been referred to, is a case in point to illustrate the necessity of this proposed legislation. Here is a case where a party is out on bail, where there is not the slightest inconvenience to him personally; and that case is advanced and several weeks of the term of the court exhausted in long arguments upon a matter of very trifling importance in itself to the exclusion of all other business. It does seem to me that if we have loaded the court in that way we should proceed at once to relieve it in some mode of so much labor.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to ask the Senator from Nevada a question. He states that the court is overburdened with this class of business. How many cases have come into the Supreme Court under this law?

Mr. STEWART. Not very many under this law, but a great deal of time has been occupied.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Do you know of any but one?

Mr. STEWART. I only know of one; but I have heard of several that are in process of preparation for this purpose.

Mr. HENDRICKS. One case, then, burdens the court?

Mr. STEWART. But it consumes time.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will the honorable

Senator from Nevada give way for a motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business? Our friends on this side of the Chamber are perfectly acquainted with the merits of this question and very anxious to vote upon it to-night, while Senators on the other side are not acquainted with it and ask for time. We insist upon going on now, and then we take to ourselves nearly all the time. If that course is to be pursued I shall move an executive session, so as to give time to gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. STEWART. I will yield the floor in a moment. I did not intend to occupy any considerable time. I was about through. I simply wanted to call attention to the fact that we had got along very well since the foundation of this Government—since 1789—without calling on the Supreme Court to attend to this class of business; and in the first instance when it has been undertaken we find that the regular business of the court has been set aside and several weeks occupied by a case of this kind. I think, in view of this fact, it is very proper that we should retrace our steps and correct our mistake, if, indeed, the act of 1867 confers the jurisdiction which it is claimed that it does confer, which seems to me exceedingly doubtful.

Mr. SUMNER. I now renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope we shall go on with this bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Is this question debatable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) It is not debatable.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator from Massachusetts will withdraw his motion for a moment I will make a proposition.

Mr. SUMNER. I withdraw it for that purpose.

Mr. HENDRICKS. We expect, as far as the minority here are concerned, to have a reasonable hearing upon this question. We expect that not as a matter of favor from the Senate, but as a matter of right and as becoming the dignity of the body itself. But we do not wish to protract debate unreasonably; there is no such purpose. We know very well that there is no importance in hurrying this bill through. We know that there is no law enacted by the majority here which is in danger in the Supreme Court, and that this bill could lie, without any danger to any political party or to the country, for three months. The Supreme Court is to conclude the arguments before it on Tuesday next; no new case can then come in to be considered; but, although we know that, we are perfectly willing, as far as I am aware of the judgment of the minority, to come to a vote at a reasonable hour. Senators can see something like what is just about the time to be allowed for this debate from what has already occurred.

It is not just for three or four or five of us on this side or for a dozen Senators on this side to consume all the time. Of the hour that has been already consumed on this subject three fourths of it has been consumed on the side of the majority. We do not wish to take three or four hours and say that that is sufficient. It is not sufficient. It is not right. Now, I am willing to say that we shall come to a vote on the day after to-morrow; I understand all the gentlemen on this side are willing to say that; and if we are not allowed any reasonable portion of the time for debate we shall suffer by it if there is any suffering on the subject. We are willing to say that the vote shall be taken at a reasonable hour on the day after to-morrow, at four o'clock, for example, or, if we can get through with the fair debate to-morrow, we are perfectly willing to come to a vote to-morrow; we have no desire to postpone it. Now, if Senators are satisfied to agree to that—and I think it is a fair proposition—let it be so.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish to interfere with any understanding about this matter; but I desire to inform the Senate that the House of Representatives have acted upon certain amendments to what is called the manufacturers' bill, and I may have to ask the Senate for a little time to-morrow in regard to them and to take the sense of the Senate on one or two of the amendments. It is vitally important that that bill should be acted upon in its final stages this week. I am also charged with a little bill in regard to deposit banks, which I think will excite no opposition.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Does the Senator from Ohio think the amendments to the tax bill are likely to excite much debate? Are they material?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not generally; but I think there is one that is material. There is one which relates to whisky, and that may consume some time, because that subject always excites discussion.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is suggested by some of the Senators near me that we are willing to sit a little later if that bill shall come up, so that I think there is no doubt that we shall reach a vote the day after to-morrow at four o'clock; and I shall hope to-morrow, and I think it probable that we can reach a vote to-morrow.

Mr. SUMNER. Why not to-morrow have an evening session?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Oh, no; that is unnecessary.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not know that. The Senator from Ohio has already indicated two or three measures that he desired to have considered.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think it is quite unnecessary to take any more time in talking about an arrangement. So far as I am concerned, I will not agree to specify the day after to-morrow at four o'clock for the purpose of taking this vote. If the Senators can get through with the discussion of that question to-morrow I shall not object to allowing to-morrow.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will say, with all kindness to the Senator from Oregon, that it is not my opinion that he will facilitate the passage of this bill by his refusal to accept terms that everybody knows are reasonable and fair.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well, sir; you can take your own course about that.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir; and you can take your course.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I propose to do that.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Here is a bill that was gotten through the Senate in a mode that I hope never to see repeated in the Senate again, whatever party is in power, without an opportunity to debate the measure not explained, though it is, as we think, very material in its character; and when we had no opportunity to discuss it upon its passage, now that it has received the veto of the President we ask a reasonable time to be heard. We ask only a reasonable time to be heard, and the Senator is not willing that we should have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If there is no limitation put upon debate in the Senate by agreement I ask the honorable Senator from Indiana if he has not an opportunity to discuss the bill. What I say is that I do not propose to agree to the limitation upon debate which he proposes. Now, of course, if I do not agree to his proposition, he has all the time that anybody can possibly ask in which to discuss the bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That has the appearance of liberality without being liberal. What is the Senator's proposition? That we shall go on to-night with the debate; right now, when he knows that this bill has never been printed. We have never had an opportunity to read it until it came back with the President's veto. It passed here without being printed, and was not printed after it passed. I say that I have never read the bill until it came back with the President's veto. Now, for the Senator to say that we can go on with the discussion is a proposition that has no liberality in it, in my judgment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senate ready for the question on the motion of the Senator from Maryland, to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow?

Mr. JOHNSON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. GRIMES. I wish to know what became of the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That was withdrawn, and the question now is on the motion to postpone.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 15, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Fowler, Grimes, Hendricks, Johnson, McCreery, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Saulsbury, Vickers, and Willey—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Connors, Corbett, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomerooy, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Williams—31.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Cragin, Drake, Morton, Sprague, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—8.

So the motion to postpone was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move that the veto message be printed for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion can be entertained if there be no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I insist on the motion. Surely one objection does not carry over a motion to print the message.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The motion is not in order.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Why?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Another subject is up.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall have no objection afterward.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Wisconsin is not in order because another motion is pending.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. What motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion that the bill pass, notwithstanding the objections of the President.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move, then, that the question be, for the moment, laid aside, so that the message can be printed. I suppose the discussion will go on to-morrow, and it ought not to go on until we have the message printed upon our tables. I propose to lay it aside for the moment until we decide to have the message printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin moves that the pending and all prior orders be postponed for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the motion made by him.

The question being put, the motion was declared to be not agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I must ask for the yeas and nays on that question. Surely the message ought to be printed for our use.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. There will be no objection to printing it to-morrow.

Mr. ANTHONY. What is the question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin, to postpone all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of the motion made by him to print the message.

Mr. ANTHONY. There is no objection to that, I suppose.

Mr. SUMNER. The order to print can be made by unanimous consent. There is no need of taking time with that question.

Mr. HENDERSON. I rise to make an inquiry. Is it necessary, under circumstances such as exist now, to postpone the consideration of the bill and all other pending measures in order to print the message? I thought the message was before the body now. It is hardly worth while to suspend the consideration of the bill in order to receive a motion to print the message.

Mr. ANTHONY. But the printing of the message was objected to, and of course the Chair was then obliged to entertain the motion. I think, if the Senate understands the question, nobody will object to printing the message.

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly not.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. All I asked for was that we have an order to print the message.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair asked if there was unanimous consent to that order and objection was made, and then a motion was made to postpone the pending business to allow the order to print to be received.

Mr. HOWE. Does it make any difference to my colleague or any one else whether the order to print is made now or half an hour later?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not suppose the bill will be disposed of in half an hour.

Mr. HOWE. Does it make any difference whether the order to print is made now or hereafter?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I ask for an order to print. I do not ask that the consideration of the measure be postponed now. All I ask at present is an order to print, so that we can have a copy of the message on our tables. I should like to see it.

Several SENATORS. There is no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the motion made by the Senator from Wisconsin will be entertained. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to know what will be the effect of an order to print? Will it take the matter from the Senate? We do not want to send the bill away.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that it does not take the bill from the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is no objection to an order to print the message.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to print the bill with the message. I should like to see it. The bill has never been printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be printed with the message without a motion.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is satisfactory.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection to entertaining the motion made by the Senator from Wisconsin? The Chair hears no objection. The question is, Shall the order to print this message be entered? The Chair hears no objection, and the order will be entered.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The bill and message together? ["Certainly."]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the passage of the bill, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding. Is the Senate ready for that question. ["Question; question."] The question must be taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is the question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the passage of the bill, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I am in no condition to discuss the question which the measure before us involves. I understood the honorable Senator from Oregon and those who agree with him on the other side of the Chamber as being willing that the subject should be postponed until to-morrow if there was an understanding that the vote should be taken to-morrow at five or six o'clock. I make the motion now to postpone it, subject to that understanding.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have no objection to that if the vote can be taken to-morrow.

Several SENATORS. At what hour?

Mr. WILLIAMS. At any time to-morrow before twelve o'clock at night. I am willing to postpone the consideration of this bill until to-morrow.

Mr. JOHNSON. Very well; that is fair; though I would rather have it the next day.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And I will say that it is only because the impeachment trial is about to commence that I insist on the vote to-morrow.

Mr. JOHNSON. I make the motion then, Mr. President, to postpone the bill until to-morrow, with the understanding that the vote upon it is to be had to-morrow.

Mr. EDMUNDS. At what hour?

Mr. JOHNSON. Any hour the Senate may think proper.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Any hour before twelve o'clock.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Say before six o'clock.

Mr. JOHNSON. Say six o'clock to-morrow. We often sit until six.

Mr. ANTHONY and others. That is fair.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I agree to that.

Mr. SUMNER. Then let us proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Several SENATORS. Settle the other matter first.

Mr. JOHNSON. I make the motion that the bill be postponed until to-morrow, subject to that understanding stated, so far as I am concerned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to postpone.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to add to that motion, by unanimous consent, "and that the vote on the passage of the bill, notwithstanding the objections of the President, shall be taken at or before six o'clock to-morrow."

Mr. GRIMES. I object to that being incorporated in our record.

Mr. EDMUNDS. All the assurance we now have is that so far as the Senator from Maryland is concerned that result can be reached.

Mr. GRIMES. The understanding has been, I believe, always that where a gentleman makes such a statement, and no opposition is made to it on the part of his political associates, it is regarded as embodying the opinion of that portion of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I withdraw my motion to amend, and now I call attention to the observation of the Senator from Maryland, that so far as he is concerned he is willing to take the vote by that time. I do not doubt at all that he will observe it; but I wish to understand from the other gentlemen who are opposed to this bill whether they so understand, or from him, whether he speaks for the others?

Mr. JOHNSON. I have not consulted with gentlemen, but I suppose they would agree to the proposition rather than go on with the debate now. I shall certainly, for myself, consider that if there is no objection made to the understanding on the part of any member of the Senate, they will be esteemed as agreeing to it.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, when such a proposition is made to the Senate publicly, and I do not express my dissent publicly, of course I consider myself bound by it. I would remark, however, that the proposition that the question shall be taken upon this bill to-morrow I am willing to accede to; but I want it distinctly understood that whatever time we choose to appropriate to the discussion of the bill to-morrow, we shall be at liberty so to appropriate it. If we are ready to take the question at two o'clock, be it so; if not, at four; if not ready then, we will go on; but we will take the question some time to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion made by the Senator from Maryland to postpone the further consideration of this bill until to-morrow.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not know that I shall object to the proposition of the Senator from Maryland; but in my judgment it is not a good precedent for the Senate. Ordinarily when a proposition to limit debate is made in this body it is after the debate has progressed for perhaps one or two days, when we see what number of Senators desire to express their views, and know within what probable limits the discussion can be brought to a close. Now, without any debate it is proposed to limit the consideration of this bill to one day. It is almost, in the Senate, equal to adopting the "previous question" of the House, and I regret to see it done. A couple of days would be a fair and liberal opportunity for debate. I do not know that the debate will occupy any considerable time; perhaps not. I consider this an unfortunate precedent, but I shall not object to it now under the circumstances.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland, to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

GREATHOUSE AND KELLY.

Mr. VAN WINKLE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 108) for the relief of Henry Greathouse and Samuel Kelly having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate agree to the amendment of the House, with the following amendment, to wit: strike out the word "five" in the amendment of the House of Representatives, and in lieu thereof insert the word "eight," and that the House agree to the same as amended.

P. G. VAN WINKLE,

A. RAMSEY,

JOHN CONNESS.

Managers on the part of the Senate.

J. F. FARNSWORTH,

T. W. FERRY,

JAMES A. JOHNSON.

Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SUMNER. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 25, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

FRAUDS IN PRINTING CURRENCY.

Mr. CHANLER. I rise to a privileged question, and move to reconsider the vote by which the House referred to the Committee of Ways and Means a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to the regulations for the detection of frauds in the printing of postal and fractional currency.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. CHANLER. I move that the communication be referred to the joint Committee on Retrenchment.

The motion was agreed to.

REMAINS OF HON. W. T. COGGESHALL.

Mr. BANKS. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill suggested by Mr. SHELLBARGER, of Ohio, now absent on account of sickness.

There being no objection,

Mr. BANKS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 967) to provide for the removal of the remains of Hon. W. T. Coggeshall, late minister of the United States at Ecuador, to the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

SMALL UNITED STATES NOTES.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Speaker, I yesterday endeavored to have the House consider a resolution proposing not an expansion of the currency, but an issue of notes in a form suitable to meet the wants of the business community. There is, especially in the West, (and western members who have paid any attention to the subject will bear me out in the statement,) a scarcity of the small denominations, ones and twos, both of the notes of the national banks and the United States legal-tender notes. The resolution proposes to request the Secretary of the Treasury (and he will comply with the request of the House) to issue small notes in exchange for larger ones, and in making payments authorized by law. We shall thus relieve a very great want of the country. I ask the House to allow me to offer that resolution this morning.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas there is a scarcity throughout the country of notes of a small denomination, both of the national banks and of the United States legal-tender notes, especially embarrassing to the people: Therefore,

Be it resolved by this House, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to issue an amount of United States notes of the denomination of ones and twos sufficient to supply the present deficiency in exchange for United States notes of a larger denomination, and in making payments authorized by law.

Mr. ALLISON. I object. It may take up a great deal of time.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It will take up no time.

The SPEAKER. If this is mandatory it must be a joint resolution.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It is a simple request which the Secretary of the Treasury will heed when we make it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I must object to the resolution unless it is provided that the Secretary of the Treasury shall cancel the notes in lieu of which this issue is proposed to be made.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I agree to that, not that I approve of the cancellation of United States notes, but because it is the best that I can do now.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object if that modification be made.

Mr. INGERSOLL. So do I personally, but I would rather have that than nothing.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object to the resolution with the modification.

Mr. GARFIELD. And I insist on the modification.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I give notice, then, that I will offer this resolution when my State is called.

MORNING HOUR.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has now commenced.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. What is the regular order of business after the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. The Pacific railroad tariff of freight, on which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] is entitled to the floor.

EXEMPTION OF MANUFACTURES FROM TAX.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 900, reported back yesterday from the Committee of Ways and Means with amendments.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order, that this bill, imposing a tax upon the people, must be first considered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I call attention to the last section of the amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana makes the point of order that the amendments in the last section contains a tax and must be first considered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The Chair overrules the point of order on the ground that it is now made too late. It ought to have been made yesterday when the report was made and received by the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is the first reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Only the Senate amendments are before the House with the amendments of the Committee of Ways and Means. The gentleman will find that objection to be valid must be made at the time the subject is received.

Mr. HOLMAN. Rule 185 provides that "every such proposition shall receive its first discussion in the Committee of the Whole." These amendments are being read before the House for the first time.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read from the Digest, page 15.

The Clerk read as follows:

"This rule is rigidly enforced, so far as relates to amendments offered in the House or in committee, but it not unfrequently happens that bills are reported which are in conflict with it; and as they are usually received by the House and committed without being read in extenso the conflict is not discovered until they are considered in committee, when it is too late to make the point."

The SPEAKER. When bills are reported they are constructively read in extenso, and the point of order must be made at that time.

The amendments of the Senate and the Committee of Ways and Means were then reported.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. JUDD. By permission of the gentleman from Ohio, I desire to ask the Speaker for information in regard to a parliamentary question. If the House does not concur in the recommendation of the committee to non-concur in the amendments of the Senate, are those amendments then open for amendment?

The SPEAKER. If the House is not acting under the previous question the amendments of the Senate will still be before the House for further amendment.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I would inquire of the gentleman from Ohio if he designs to give us an opportunity to move to concur in the amendments of the Senate?

Mr. SPALDING. I suppose that is in order; is it not?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state, in answer to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] that a motion to concur in an amendment has priority.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I give notice that I will not yield in the midst of any explanation that I may be endeavoring to give to the House. It is impossible to present bills to the House under such circumstances. I say this with the most entire regard for what is due to members of the House and to the House itself. I have no disposition, nor has the committee any disposition, to unnecessarily restrict legitimate inquiry, and I will answer any such inquiries at the close of my remarks.

Mr. MILLER. I desire to ask the gentleman—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio declines to be interrupted, but will answer questions at the close.

Mr. SCHENCK. It is best, perhaps, for the House first to know the position in which we come before it at this time. The committee was desirous to take this bill out of the morning hour with a view of considering it when an opportunity would be had for some three or four hours' debate. The House refused yesterday to permit that; we are now left, therefore, to consider the bill in the morning hour. If we hold the morning hour and run over from day to day through successive morning hours we shall crowd out business which is ready to be presented to the House from other committees. I propose, therefore, acting under this restriction that the House has imposed upon us, to do this: first to explain the bill as briefly as I can in the time that is left of the hour, and to call the previous question before the hour shall end, submitting to any inquiry that may be made in regard to the bill after the explanation submitted on behalf of the committee. After the previous question is sustained, if it shall be, then, in like manner, we propose to allow gentlemen to present their views before the vote is taken, thus securing two hours at least for the consideration of the bill without interfering with the morning hour. I do not know of anything fairer than that.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope my colleague will withdraw his objection, and let us consider it to-day. We ought to have a continuous session on this bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will submit a proposition, that by general consent we go on with this bill until it is disposed of.

Mr. PRICE. What will be the effect of that upon my right to the floor after the morning hour expires on the Pacific railroad bill?

Mr. BANKS. If there can be a session on Saturday for business I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot predict what will be the action of the House in regard to Saturday, but it requires unanimous consent to order a session for debate on Saturday; otherwise that day must be devoted to business.

Mr. INGERSOLL. What will be the effect of continuing this debate during the day on the Pacific railroad bill?

The SPEAKER. It will probably come up after the morning hour to-morrow; but a question of privilege may intervene.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I must object to the proposition.

Mr. SCHENCK. Very well; then I am compelled to go on; and I give notice that before the expiration of the morning hour I shall demand the previous question, so as to obtain action on it to-day.

Now, Mr. Speaker, so far as the bill itself is concerned, it would have been preferred by the Committee of Ways and Means that the bill should have been adopted by the Senate as a clean bill, for reasons which I need not now repeat, because they were fully heretofore explained to the House at the time of the introduction of the bill. The Senate has thought proper, however, to send the bill back to us with certain amendments, thus opening the question whether those amendments shall be agreed to or non-concurred in, or agreed to with amendments, and what else, if anything, the House will think proper to do in regard to the matter of taxation as connected with the bill.

It will be remembered that in the original bill were repealed sections ninety-four and ninety-five of the present law imposing taxes upon manufactures at various grades of percentage, but generally at the rate of five per cent., with the exception of four things contained in section ninety-four, which were reserved from such repeal. Those were gas, distilled oils, certain classes of adulterated wines, and all manufactures of tobacco. The Senate has sent us back the bill without interfering by amendment so far as the three latter subjects are concerned; but, so far as oil is concerned, they have inserted a provision which reduces the tax on distilled oils to one half its present rate. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend to the House not to concur in this amendment of the Senate, and I will state very briefly why. I am not prepared to say in behalf of the committee now just what tax we will impose on oil, although our minds are virtually made up, and our report, so far as that subject is concerned, as constituting a part of the provisions of the general bill which we intend to introduce, is ready. But I will say this: the committee are of opinion that it will not do to relieve distilled oils from all taxation; and that being the conclusion of the committee, they ask this House not to interfere with this subject in this little bill, if they agree with us that oil is one of the subjects to be reserved for taxation, but to take it out from the relief to be given to manufactures, and wait until the general bill covering the whole subject of taxation is introduced, when, as I have before pledged myself in behalf of the committee, gentlemen shall have the fullest opportunity of presenting to the House their amendments and their reasons in support of their amendments, either reducing the tax or taking it off altogether. Distilled oils produce now about five million dollars, and it was because we could get $5,000,000 from these distilled products of petroleum that we were enabled to come to the conclusion that we might relieve manufactures pretty generally, except so far as the tax on sales and other special taxes might be concerned.

I know it will be said this amendment of the Senate is right and just, because this is a taxation of the "poor man's light"—a phrase coined, I believe, and a very ingenious and plausible one, by my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOTFIELD,] and upon which the changes have been rung ever since. In connection with that I desire to relate a little incident which occurred in the Committee of Ways and Means the other day, when we had some twenty gentlemen representing the oil manufacturers of the country appearing as a delegation before that committee. They were intelligent, well posted, full of statistics, and presented their case ably and plausibly. In a paper elaborately prepared, which they read to us, occurred this phrase: "The poor man's light;" and subsequently it was pressed upon us as a matter of sympathy with the poor people of the country that it was wrong to impose a tax at all upon oil which afforded light to all the masses of the people of the country. Struck with the way in which they presented it in this view, keeping back other considerations that I thought probably more impelled them to come before us, this conversation was held. I asked the gentleman who was the spokesman of the party and others who were with him, "What is the price at this time of distilled oil; is it not very low?" "Ruinously low." "What is it?" "That depends," said they, "upon the place of production; if it be near petroleum wells, it is, of course, less than when transported to more distant points." "What is it in the eastern market at this time, taking Philadelphia as the standard?" "Only thirty-eight cents; ridiculously cheap." "What was it this time last year?" "From forty-seven to fifty cents." "Then, gentlemen, it is ten cents cheaper now than it was this time last year?" "Yes." "What was it the year before; sixty or seventy cents or more, was it not?" "Yes, very much higher." "When was the tax of twenty cents a gallon imposed on it? It was in 1864, was it not?" "Yes, it was." "Then, gentlemen, this light for the poor man, this oil, has been going down rapidly ever since the twenty cents tax was imposed upon it, until it has become so ridiculously cheap that light was never afforded at such a rate before!" Well, they rather squirmed under that view of the subject. I say now to gentlemen, as I said to those gentlemen then, if they would throw out of view all this demagogism about its being for the poor man; that they are interested, and say that it is the poor manufacturer that they think is pinched and that his is the interest they represent, then we shall understand each other better.

But the fact is that here is a commodity, used generally for purposes of light, the price of which, under the influence of this taxation, has been brought down and down, until the manufacturers themselves admit that it affords about the cheapest light in the world, and they claim that it is so.

Now, what is the reason it has become so cheap? It may be said that the honest manufacturer is imposed upon, because there are a great many products of illicit distillation of oil sent out upon the country which, as in the case of whisky, bring the price down, so that it is ruinous to the honest manufacturer. Well, that is so, to a certain extent. I have always said that the interest of the honest manufacturer is in all cases precisely the interest of the Government. What then? Instead of being an argument for taking off the tax it ought to be an argument for protecting the honest distiller of oil from these fraudulent products of illicit distillers and mixers.

And I feel now authorized to say that at the beginning of the winter just passed, when these oil men came before us, they all concurred in saying that nothing could better bear a tax than distilled oil. And all they wanted was just this sort of protection. The committee have been for some time past very assiduously engaged in endeavoring to frame a provision in the general bill which we think will have the effect to prevent these fraudulent and dangerous distillations and mixtures of oil.

Now, for this reason, and for the further reason that if oil is to be taxed at all it is better that it shall not be ranked among those things which are now the subjects of entire relief from taxation, but it shall be reserved to be acted upon when we come to act upon the general tax bill—for these reasons the committee have recommended non-concurrence in this proposed amendment of the Senate.

I wish, therefore, to be understood. The committee expect to be compelled, in behalf of the revenue of the country, to lay a tax on oil. And, inasmuch as they will be compelled to recommend that tax, they prefer that the question what that tax shall be, whether the present rate of taxation or a less rate, shall be reserved until they bring in the general bill upon the subject of taxation, and that it shall not be forced into a bill the subject of which is exemption from taxation. So much for the first amendment of the Senate.

Mr. SELYE. Was the tax on oil left out altogether before?

Mr. SCHENCK. Gentlemen ask me whether it was left out altogether before. It was left out of this class. Oil is now taxed at a certain rate. And it is taxed under the ninety-fourth section, which we propose to repeal with certain reservations. We reserve this among other subjects, just leaving it as the law now is until we can take it up with the other subjects to be taxed, and then determine what the tax shall be.

The second amendment of the Senate to the second section of the bill is as follows:

And nothing herein contained shall be construed as a repeal of any tax upon machinery or other articles which have been or may be delivered on contracts made with the United States prior to the passage of this act.

Gentlemen may differ very much in regard to the principle there involved. When contracts have been made for the manufacture of articles, and the fact is that those articles are subject to a certain tax, of course the manufacturers will add so much more to the price they agreed to take for their articles. Every law that is passed raising or lowering the tax helps somebody and hurts somebody. The general principle, as we understand it, is that the Government cannot undertake, except in certain clear and easy ways which exist in some cases, to interfere as between citizens. We leave every man, therefore, when he makes a contract to deliver an article or to purchase an article, to take his chances that the law may be changed. That principle is recognized by the Senate in not interfering as between individuals; but the Senate say that the Government, however, can take care of itself; and as the Government has, particularly, I am told, in the Navy Department, made contracts for certain machinery at a price higher than would have been agreed upon if the tax had not been taken into consideration, therefore it is proposed that the Government shall say to these contractors, "When we remove the tax we take care that you shall not have the benefit of the removal, but that the benefit shall accrue to the Government. In other words, we employ, as between the Government and its contractors, a different rule from that which prevails as between individual and individual." A question may arise whether it is right to make this distinction. We suppose that the Government, having the power in its hands when it legislates, and particularly because it has that power, should put itself upon the same footing with individuals who have made contracts.

But there is another consideration. I do not know that such contracts for machinery have been made by the Navy Department, but I do know that no such contracts ought to have been made; for there is now upon the statute-book a provision that any Department of the Government, when it makes a contract for articles to be furnished, shall have the power to take into account and reserve the taxes which shall be imposed upon the article. Hence, if contracts have been made by the Navy Department without reserving the taxes, such contracts have been improvidently and improperly made. In the seventeenth section of the act of March 3, 1865, it is provided—

"That the privilege of purchasing supplies of goods imported from foreign countries for the use of the United States duty free which now does or hereafter shall exist by provision of law shall be extended, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, to all articles of domestic production which are subject to tax by the provisions of this act."

That is the internal tax. And it was very improper for any Department or officer of this Government to omit to take advantage of this provision, that, in making contracts, the tax might be reserved. But, if there be any cases in which the Government has not taken advantage of this provision, the question is, shall the benefit of the removal of the tax accrue to the contractor or to the Government? I admit, as I said before, that in every case a change of tax, while it benefits somebody, hurts somebody else; but all that the committee think proper to recommend upon this subject is that as the Government had the power to provide for this contingency and did not choose to do so the Government shall take its chances under the law, just as it compels individuals to do.

And, Mr. Speaker, when it is said that there are large amounts of machinery which have been contracted for, I ask gentlemen to bear in mind the fact that if the Government has contracts outstanding for $50,000 or $100,000 or $500,000 worth of machinery, this is but a drop in the ocean as compared with the aggregate amount of the immense number of contracts between individuals which will be affected in this same way. If the Government is going to be affected to the amount of a few thousand dollars, individuals will be affected in the aggregate to the amount of millions. Yet the Government is asked to step in and say that it will protect itself to the extent of a few thousand dollars against chances improvidently incurred, while there is to be no such protection as to the various individuals concerned in contracts. I leave it to the judgment of the House to decide whether we are right in the principle we propose, that the Government shall itself abide by the same rule which it prescribes with regard to contracts of individuals between each other.

The Senate have made a provision in regard to drawbacks which I will in a few words explain. Gentlemen know that now when goods which are subject to internal tax are exported there is a drawback allowed for the tax that has been paid. The Senate have provided that after the 1st of April, which is next week, there shall be no drawback as to these goods from which we remove the tax, nor, perhaps, as to any goods. The House has proposed to allow three months and to provide that there shall be no drawback after the 1st of July next. The object of the House in this was to permit the fulfillment of contracts actually made, where vessels have been freighted and cargoes supplied, but not to interfere, or attempt to interfere, in any other case—to apply, in short, precisely the same rule that was adopted the other day in the case of spirits actually contracted for and distilled with a view to exportation. But the House amendment, as reported yesterday, does not quite accomplish the object intended; and I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to propose an amendment to the amendment of the House. I ask gentlemen to look at the printed report made by the Committee of this House:

That after the 1st of July, 1868, no allowance for drawback on account of internal taxes paid on manufactures shall be made on the exportation of any article of domestic manufacture which is relieved from tax by the provisions of this act.

We then strike out the words of the clause "manufactured after the 1st of April," and insert these words:

Nor shall such allowance be made in any case unless it shall be proved by sworn evidence to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue such articles of manufacture were, prior to the 1st of April, 1868, actually purchased or manufactured and contracted to be delivered for such exportation.

The effect of that will be this: the Senate says there shall be no drawback after the 1st of April. The House proposes to allow the drawback to go on as usual for three months, but to limit it to those cases where contract was actually made, the goods prepared to be exported being also manufactured before the 1st of April—applying the principle which we apply to the case of exported spirits. That is the difference between the Senate and the House.

The House proposes to extend the drawback for three months, and they now instruct me to limit that so it shall not apply to any but those cases where contracts have actually been made, bringing it within that rule which was before established in the case of distilled spirits.

Next comes the amendment of the Senate in regard to putting a tax upon sales of manufactures. Their proposition is a general one, to put a tax upon the sales made by manufacturers above ten thousand dollars of two dollars per thousand, equivalent to the fifth of one per cent., upon the principle that, while we relieve these manufacturers from direct taxation, we must bring them, in order to get a sufficient revenue, within the provisions of those special taxes by which we expect in some degree to make up for the loss of revenue accruing from this exemption.

Now, sir, it has been a great mistake if any body has supposed it was intended, or possible in due consideration for the revenue, to exempt manufacturers entirely from taxation; and this I fully explained when this subject was first before the House. But we do believe we can safely take off, as we propose to do, this heavy tax, which is in general five per cent. on the value of the article manufactured, and put a special tax of ten, twenty, or twenty-five dollars on manufacturers, and add to that a further special tax of a certain percentage upon the sales above a given amount. That is now the law in regard to wholesale dealers and various other persons engaged in the different pursuits in the country. The machinery is prepared, ready to hand, and it is proposed to extend that to the case of manufacturers.

This small tax we have heretofore imposed, and it is a tax of such a character that it will produce, though small, very large results. I remember a gentleman stated to me, interrupting me when I was explaining this matter before the House, this special tax would only amount to some five or six million dollars. I explained then, under the present system, this special tax amounts to $18,000,000; and we have ascertained, if we extend it, a small special tax upon manufacturers like this will add from twelve to fourteen million dollars, thus swelling the $18,000,000 up to $30,000,000 and upward—much higher than I supposed when I first made the calculation running up only to $20,000,000. And I ask gentlemen to stand by the proposition that while we relieve these manufacturers from being thus burdened by a large specific tax upon articles as they are produced they shall enable us to do so by allowing a special tax upon sales, which will, in some degree, put the revenue of the country in such condition as to make us able to allow this exemption to the manufacturers themselves.

We had left this matter to the general bill in which we propose to report it, and did not recur to it when this bill was before the House. The Senate think it best to provide for it in this bill, because they say it may be some two or three months before another general bill can be matured into and become a law, and in the interval these manufacturers will escape taxation entirely on their sales or their manufactures, and then when we come to impose a tax on sales it may seem as if we were getting up a new subject of taxation. The Committee of Ways and Means are impressed with the propriety of consenting to a certain extent to this view of the Senate. We propose, therefore, to agree to put a special tax on now, but to limit it to the articles which are exempted by this bill from taxation. That is in respect to dealers, manufacturers, and all the pursuits and interests of the country which are subject to taxes of this kind on their sales now. We propose to leave them under the law as it at present exists, and, so far as we exempt any of these manufacturers from tax entirely now, we propose to extend the special tax on sales only to those who are thus exempt, so as to put them in the same condition with the rest, and then leave the whole of them to be provided for together when we come to introduce the general bill.

The committee therefore recommend that instead of this special tax on sales being laid on all manufactures, as well those that have been exempted heretofore as all others not otherwise provided for, to confine it to those manufactures which are the subject of legislation by this bill. Therefore we propose to lay it upon those "whose manufacture of any kind or articles produced by them are exempted from taxation by the provisions of this act, and whose annual sales exceed five thousand dollars." We have adopted a standard of $5,000 as conforming to their general bill on the subject. Gentlemen will find when we come to report our general bill that this is but a provision from that bill.

There is one other subject which does not strictly pertain to this bill, but which the committee take this opportunity of presenting for the action of the House, and that is the section which relates to the tax on whisky and distilled spirits. I have already occupied necessarily more time than I intended, but I will present this matter to the House as briefly as I can.

The section which we ask the House to adopt as an amendment to this bill is a section of our general bill, and we ask to have it adopted for the present, as we hope it will hereafter be, as a part of the general bill on the subject of whisky, because of the emergency of the occasion. The Secretary of the Treasury and Commissioner of Internal Revenue come to us and say that the violation of the whisky law is rampant and there is high carnival among the distillers. They are now selling whisky in Philadelphia at less than one dollar a gallon, which is less than half the tax. What is the reason? Because, whether the Commissioner of Internal Revenue or his subordinates have been efficient or inefficient, it is certain that the collection of your tax has fallen into such hands that it is virtually not collected at all. When we come to report our general bill we think we can satisfy the House that the two dollars, or any other tax you choose to impose under two dollars, can be collected. But we shall propose to give the control of this matter to the department of internal revenue, independent of the President and independent of the Secretary of the Treasury, and to say to the Commissioner, whoever may be at the head of the department, "There is the law and there is the tax to be collected; you shall appoint and you shall remove every subordinate, but we hold you responsible for the collection of the tax." But until that is done what can be done now? We can add, perhaps, to the law by taking this section of our proposed law and putting it in force. Accordingly we provide that it shall be a crime, as it has been made heretofore by law, to carry on a distillery with intent to defraud the Government out of this tax, and that it shall be held to be prima facie proof of the commission of this crime if any dealer persists, after a certain number of days, in carrying on his distillery while whisky is at a price in the locality where his distillery is situated below the aggregate of the tax and the reasonable cost of producing the article.

But that is not enough. Where you find a guilty distiller or a guilty manufacturer of any kind I will undertake to find you two official rascals to match him, and, therefore, we propose to extend the provision of the law to the assessors and collectors of the district, and hold them responsible; so that if whisky be sold in any district where it is produced or sold for a less price than the tax upon it the Commissioner shall immediately make an investigation into the conduct of all the revenue officers in such district, and while that investigation is going on shall suspend the two principal officers and deprive them of their pay until it is shown that it is by no negligence or connivance of theirs that the tax is thus defeated. The provision is a stringent one. We hope it will be adopted as a part of the general law. We only propose now to anticipate its adoption, which we hope for in the general law, by taking it out at the request of the officers of the Treasury, and putting it in this law when there is an opportunity to have it go into effect immediately or in twenty days, so as in some degree to anticipate a cure of the evil.

Mr. Speaker, I understand that there are but few minutes left to me, and I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to ask the previous question before closing. I dislike not to afford gentlemen an opportunity of being heard, and I promise them that if the previous question be sustained I will give almost the whole of the hour that will be allowed me afterward to them to make any objections or suggestions or give reasons why the bill as we recommend it should not be passed.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope my colleague will allow me to appeal to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] to withdraw his objection and allow this bill to be considered after the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I am appealed to on both sides—to withdraw it and not to withdraw it. My impression is that the House can vote just as intelligently on this bill after another hour's discussion as after a week's discussion. It is not for the purpose of preventing the passage of the bill, but to facilitate it and hurry it, that I make the objection.

Mr. SCHENCK. I cannot give way for a speech if the gentleman insists on the objection.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I must decline to withdraw it.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then I am instructed by the committee to report some amendments to their amendments, which I send to the Clerk's desk. They are modifications of our amendments.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio intend to allow any other amendments to be offered besides these before he moves the previous question?

Mr. SCHENCK. I will hear the amendments which gentlemen desire to offer.

The SPEAKER. Then, if there be no objection, the morning hour will be extended for the purpose of allowing amendments to be suggested, but not for debate.

No objection was made.

Mr. JUDD. I desire to move to amend the fourth amendment of the Senate by striking out the word "monthly" wherever it occurs and inserting "annually."

Mr. SCHENCK. I cannot agree to that. It is utterly impossible to get along unless we can get our revenue in regularly.

Mr. MILLER. I was going to suggest precisely the same amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I would say to gentlemen that the special tax is to be paid annually. It is the tax on sales which is to be paid monthly.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman allow me to move to insert the word "semi-annually" instead of "monthly."

Mr. SCHENCK. This matter was fully discussed in the committee, and I am instructed by the committee to ask a vote of the House upon the collection of the tax monthly.

Mr. MILLER. It would save a great deal of expense to collect it semi-annually.

Mr. WOOD. I desire, with the permission of the gentleman from Ohio, to move that the bill be recommitted with instructions to report an amendment to the same which shall reduce the duties on foreign importations to the like extent now proposed to reduce the tax on domestic manufactures.

Mr. SCHENCK. I cannot yield for that.

Mr. WOOD. Will the gentleman allow me to explain my proposition?

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not want a tariff attached to this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio has only time to allow amendments to be read. He cannot yield for debate.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I desire to move to insert after the word "petroleum," in the first amendment of the Senate, the words "above the specific gravity of thirty-two;" so that it will read:

Provided, That the product of petroleum, above the specific gravity of thirty-two, and bituminous substances hereinbefore mentioned, except illuminating gas, shall, from and after the passage of this act, be taxed at one half the rates fixed by the said section ninety-four.

That will make the tax on naphtha and benzine the same as that on oil, and will cut off all these frauds.

Mr. SCHENCK. I appreciate the motives of the gentleman, but I am instructed by the committee to insist on not acting on oil now. I think we can do all he wants and even a little more when the general bill comes in.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Allow me to say that if the House should concur in the amendment of the Senate, as they possibly may, it would be a great deal better with the amendment which I propose than without it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not know but that it would be better if the amendment of the Senate should be concurred in, but I hope it will not be. I am afraid it would induce some gentlemen to vote to concur who would otherwise vote to non-concur. I would therefore prefer that the amendment should not be offered.

Mr. BANKS. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means if, when he brings in the general bill, he proposes to reduce the tax on distilled oils?

Mr. SCHENCK. I am not prepared to say now exactly what we shall do; but I do not think we shall lower the tax much, at any rate. But that will be for the House to determine. I assure gentlemen they shall have full opportunity to offer amendments.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SCHENCK. Very well.

Mr. DAWES. There is now a tax of one tenth of one per cent. upon sales. If this bill becomes a law will it affect that tax?

Mr. SCHENCK. Not now.

Mr. DAWES. It does not affect that tax?

Mr. SCHENCK. It does not. We have confined ourselves carefully to this: this bill exempts certain manufactures from taxation, but does not affect the general provision in regard to sales, &c. We have disagreed with the Senate in regard to going over the whole ground, which we have reserved for our general bill, and propose that the tax on sales shall be confined to what we are now acting upon.

Mr. DAWES. Another question.

Mr. SCHENCK. Certainly.

Mr. DAWES. In the amendment proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means it is provided:

If any distiller shall carry on such business in any place or locality for a period of twenty days, during which the market value, in such place or locality, of the kind of spirits produced by him is less by more than ten per cent. than the tax and the cost of producing said spirits, it shall be prima facie evidence that the business is being carried on with intent to defraud the United States.

That is a criminal statute, providing for a criminal prosecution. The term "place or locality" is too indefinite to be used in a criminal statute. I therefore suggest that instead of that term we should say "city or town."

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not know but the gentleman may be right, and if he will go a little further, and say "district, city, town, or township," I think I will venture to consent to such an amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. That change should be made wherever the words "place or locality" occur; they occur more than once.

Mr. HOLMAN. We do not fully understand that amendment on this side of the House.

Mr. DAWES. I suggested that instead of using the words "place or locality" there should be used words expressing something that has limits; either "town" or "city" or "county" or "parish;" perhaps all those terms; something that has defined limits, or no criminal prosecution can possibly lie.

Mr. SCHENCK. As this is a penal statute I think the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] is right in suggesting that there ought to be greater precision; therefore I am willing that where the words "place or locality" occur the words used shall be "district, city, town, township, or parish."

The SPEAKER. That will require unanimous consent.

No objection was made; and the amendment of the committee was modified accordingly.

Mr. BROOMALL and others asked Mr. SCHENCK to yield to them.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] still has my ear, and I beg that other gentlemen will not take hold of it. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWES. I have done, and will let go. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BROOMALL.]

Mr. BROOMALL. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] if there will not be difficulty in carrying out the provision of the section providing a tax on sales, which reads as follows:

And whose annual sales exceed $10,000 shall pay for every additional $1,000 in excess of $10,000 two dollars, and the amount of sales within the year beyond $10,000 shall be returned monthly to the assistant assessor, and the tax on sales in excess of $10,000 shall be assessed by the assessor and be paid monthly as other monthly taxes are assessed and paid.

I cannot understand how that is to be done. It might be done if the sales were the same in every month throughout the year. But, inasmuch as in all branches of business the sales differ every month, I do not see how it is to be done.

Mr. SCHENCK. That is being done now in regard to wholesale dealers and others.

Mr. BROOMALL. That is a tax on all the sales. This provides for a tax on the excess over $10,000 a year. How that is to be got at I do not understand.

Mr. ALLISON. If my colleague on the committee [Mr. SCHENCK] will allow me, I will answer the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BROOMALL.] The law now provides that on the 1st day of May in each year an estimate of the annual sales shall be made. Of course, this latter clause will allow assessors to make an estimate at the beginning of the year, from the condition of the business, of the probable amount of the manufacture. He can examine the last year's books and see what amount was manufactured the year before. There can be no difficulty in relation to it.

Mr. BROOMALL. That, Mr. Speaker, is but guessing. It seems to me that in this way great injustice might be done.

Mr. ALLISON. There can be no injustice done, because there will at a subsequent time be a readjustment, as is the case under the existing law with reference to wholesale dealers.

Mr. BROOMALL. And suppose at the end of the year it should be found that less than five thousand dollars' worth had been manufactured, is there any provision for refunding the whole tax collected, which, in that case, would have been improperly collected?

Mr. ALLISON. That is hardly possible.

Mr. SCHENCK. We have not found heretofore that those who have returned tax have erred in returning too much. In reply to the gentleman, I will say, in general terms, that this provision precisely corresponds with that which has been for a long time in operation with regard to wholesale dealers, and which has not been attended with any such practical difficulty as that which the gentleman apprehends. We simply propose to extend a provision of the existing law. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KOONTZ.]

Mr. KOONTZ. Mr. Speaker, this bill, as I understand, repeals entirely sections ninety-four and ninety-five of the existing law. Among the articles taxed in section ninety-four is cotton. Now, on the 3d of February, 1868, a bill was passed exempting from tax cotton grown in 1867. Now, if I understand the present bill, it repeals the tax on cotton altogether.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman is mistaken about the effect of the act passed last February. It repealed the tax on cotton not for 1867, but for 1868; and if it be the fact that cotton is embraced in section ninety-four, then, if this bill be passed, the result will simply be that the tax on cotton for 1868 will be twice repealed. That is all.

Mr. KOONTZ. But this bill, as I understand, repeals entirely sections ninety-four and ninety-five, while the bill passed last February simply exempts from tax cotton grown in 1867.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman is mistaken in point of fact. We exempted cotton grown after 1867, and if we now exempt it a second time by this bill it will not be any more exempt than it was before.

Mr. KOONTZ. But I understand that the bill which was passed in the early part of this session exempted only the tax on cotton grown during the year 1868, thus refusing to exempt cotton grown thereafter. But if this bill be passed in its present form all cotton grown hereafter will be exempted from tax. That is the way I understand it.

Mr. ALLISON. I think my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KOONTZ] has referred to the wrong compilation of the laws. In the compilation which I have examined cotton is not included in either the ninety-fourth or the ninety-fifth section. Hence it will not be affected by the provisions of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENJAMIN] is seeking the floor to suggest a modification of the bill. He might be stating that modification while the committee are examining this point.

Mr. ALLISON. There is no necessity for further examination. I know I am right. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BENJAMIN.]

Mr. BENJAMIN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] that the penalties prescribed in this bill for a violation of the law on the part of distillers might with propriety be extended to the manufacturers of tobacco. It is very clear that the frauds committed by the manufacturers of tobacco are as flagrant as those committed by the distillers, though perhaps not so enormous in amount. By a slight amendment the penalties provided for in this bill could be extended to the manufacturers of tobacco.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman is quite right in saying that there is a great deal of fraud with regard to tobacco. So there is with regard to almost everything subjected to tax, whether the tax be high or low. There is cheating all round, and a very inconsiderable proportion, in some sense, of our tax is collected. But we propose to apply this provision to distilled spirits because there is at present more fraud in regard to that than as to anything else. When our general bill shall be reported the gentleman will find that we have provided stringently in regard to tobacco and a great many other things. It was only that we yielded to the pressure of the occasion and took a general section out of our law, at the request of the Secretary himself as well as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, to be passed speedily, on this question of whisky, because in regard to that particular class of frauds there is more mischief going on than in anything else in the country.

I will, if permitted, have a letter read from Chicago upon this subject which will be a reply to the gentleman, showing why I prefer not to anticipate general action on this subject. I assure the gentlemen he will find the tobacco men quite as well taken care of when we come to that.

The Clerk read as follows:

"CHICAGO, March 21, 1868.

"* * * * * This place is wholly sold out to the 'whisky ring,' distillers, revenue officers, and all. I do not think there is a worse spot on the foot-stool, and everybody connected with the service is disgraced by the fact that the Department at Washington allows it to continue. I am sick at heart and disgusted with the charges that are made by honest men against those in charge of revenue matters at Washington. We all suffer together—Mr. Rollins, the Secretary, Committee of Ways and Means, Congress, and every honest revenue officer—are each vilified and charged with being in 'cohorts' or friends of the ring. It is too bad, and unless something is soon done to clean out these dishonest officers who are sucking the life out of our public credit we shall see a revolution. I wish I could see you face to face. I am too much disgusted to write as I feel."

Mr. SCHENCK. I have but a single remark further—

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent was only given that amendments might be proposed, and not for a continuance of the debate.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now demand the previous question; I think I have allowed amendments in sufficient number to be proposed.

Mr. JUDD. There was a departure from the unanimous consent in allowing the letter to be read. I ask that the privilege be extended to ask the gentleman from Ohio from whom that letter comes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois should have made his point of order at the time. The Chair seeing this was debate called attention to it. He did not know what it was until it was read.

Mr. SCHENCK. It comes from a man whose duty it is to be well posted. I now yield to my colleague on the committee, who has an amendment to propose.

Mr. MAYNARD. It is a mere verbal amendment. I move to insert "selling" for "being sold."

The SPEAKER. It is a grammatical correction, and if there be no objection it will be considered as agreed to.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. HUNTER. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question.

Mr. SCHENCK. If I am permitted to reply I will not object.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. SCHENCK. As I have said before, if the demand for the previous question is sustained I shall yield to gentlemen to talk about these matters. I have exhausted all the time I want except in reply to gentlemen.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

Several messages in writing were received from the President of the United States, by Colonel Moore, one of his Secretaries; also, a message informing the House that a joint resolution (H. R. No. 226) appointing managers of the National Asylum for Disabled Soldiers, and for other purposes, having been received on the 12th of March, 1868, and not having been returned within ten days, Sundays excepted, has become a law under the Constitution of the United States.

EXEMPTION OF MANUFACTURES FROM TAX.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield to my colleague on the committee.

Mr. ALLISON. The chairman of the committee being somewhat unwell this morning has left the control of the floor to me during his absence from the Hall. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD.]

Mr. SCOFIELD. I desire to ask the House to vote for the first amendment of the Senate, which reduces the tax on rock oil from twenty cents a gallon to ten cents. I understand from the Speaker that the vote will be on the question of concurrence, and all who are in favor of reducing the tax to ten cents will vote "ay" on this amendment.

I understand the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to say that we ought to keep this tax at twenty cents a gallon because oil is cheap. He says it is only thirty-eight cents a gallon at this time. Perhaps it is; but, if so, it is because the business of the country is such and the tax is such that all those who are engaged in its manufacture are forced to throw upon the market the product of their labor at half price. A large number of these men are retiring from the business, not rich, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] says, but in poverty. They are retiring with the loss of all they have invested. Their business is crushed out. The largest refinery in my district, in which a large amount of capital was embarked, owned by Samuel Downer, whom many of the members of the House have seen about these Halls, has closed because he cannot manufacture oil at such low prices and compete with the fraudulent article that is put in market all over the country.

But the gentleman is mistaken in supposing that the oil which he says is selling at thirty-eight cents a gallon comes to the consumer at that price. It averages a dollar a gallon to the consumer. The nature of the article, its explosive and dangerous character, makes it quite expensive. Now, if it is selling at only thirty-eight cents, as the gentleman says, is it fair, is it honest, to lay a tax of one hundred and twenty per cent. upon it?—for twenty cents a gallon on an article selling at thirty-eight cents is one hundred and twenty per cent.

But the gentleman says it is cheap. So is milk cheap. Why do you not lay a tax of one hundred and twenty per cent. on milk? So is cold water cheap. So is the light of heaven cheap. Why do you not tax the light of heaven as they do in England, where they make a man pay for every pane of glass he has in his dwelling. Cotton and wool are comparatively cheap. Why not tax them? This oil is just as much a necessity as food. Spelling-books are cheap, and I would just as soon lay a tax of one hundred per cent. on spelling-books as to lay it on the light by which the boy has to learn his lesson. Bibles are cheap, and you may just as well lay a tax of one hundred per cent. upon them as to put it upon the light by which the Christian studies out the sacred pages of the Scriptures. All the necessities of life are cheap. We could not live if they were not so. Now, why single out this one article of absolute necessity when all the rest are to go free? Why keep up so exorbitant a tax on what the gentleman says I called some years ago the poor man's light? It is emphatically true; there is no rhetoric in that. But, as one of my Democratic friends said the other day about something else, "it is God's truth" that it is the poor man's light. Why class it with whisky and tobacco? If you cannot take the whole tax off from it take off half the tax. Make it ten cents a gallon instead of twenty cents. It should not be left at the present high rate. My colleague [Mr. Woodward] suggests that we tax illuminating gas only seven per cent.—[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. NIBLACK. Will the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Allison] yield to me?

Mr. ALLISON. I am appealed to all around, and I do not see how I can yield to all.

Mr. SPALDING. You promised to yield to me.

Mr. ALLISON. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Spalding.]

Mr. SPALDING. I represent a people largely interested in this matter of petroleum; I think it is the second point in the United States on the question of magnitude; and I know that they have been excessively desirous of having this whole tax abated. They think that that article of industry ought to be relieved as well as most of the others which have been relieved by the bill; but, as a measure of compromise, willing to pay their share of the taxation of the country, they are willing now to accept of the proposition as it comes from the Senate, and to pay one half of the tax that has been imposed upon this article of manufacture. I agree in spirit with the remarks submitted by my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Scofield.] I say that this may justly be regarded as among the articles of necessity of the country, and it is our bounden duty to do something toward relieving it. I hope, therefore, the House will concur in the amendment of the Senate. That is all I have to say.

Mr. ALLISON. I only want to say one word in answer to what has been said on this question of petroleum. I think the answer made by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means was a perfect answer, and that was that, inasmuch as we propose to impose some tax upon petroleum, that question should be reserved until we bring in our general bill, and then every gentleman will have an opportunity of discussing at length this question of taxation of the "poor man's light." I do not know but I may vote with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Scofield] for a reduction of the tax when that bill comes up. But I beg gentlemen at this time not to insist on an amendment which will disarrange the entire bill as reported by the Committee of Ways and Means. I yield now to the gentleman from West Virginia, [Mr. Hubbard.]

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. I desire simply to add a single word to what has been said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Scofield] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Spalding] in relation to this tax upon refined oils. During the last three months the articles of naphtha and benzine, which are produced from the crude oil at the refineries, have very much increased in price in Europe. These articles, on account of their explosive character, cannot very well be transferred to Europe separately, but they can be taken over in the crude oil, and, therefore, the crude oil is going to Europe instead of the refined oil, and the refineries in this country are being stopped on account of that. It is, therefore, a necessity that the tax should be taken off the refined oil, so that our manufacturers here can send the refined oil to Europe and compete with the manufacturers there. An additional reason why the amendment of the Senate should be concurred in is that we shall then have an indication on the part of the House of its wish and desire in regard to this question. I hope, therefore, that when we come to vote on the amendment of the Senate it will be concurred in.

Mr. ALLISON. I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Banks.]

Mr. BANKS. It would give me pleasure to accede to the request of the Committee of Ways and Means if it were practicable to do so and obtain a reduction of this tax on petroleum. But the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has notified the House that it is not the intention of the committee to reduce it much at any rate; and therefore, if there is to be a reduction, it should be made now when the question is submitted to the House by itself.

Now, sir, without entering into any demagogical argument at all, to which reference has been made, I say from my own experience, my personal knowledge, that there is not a wealthy corporation or city or a wealthy family in this country that uses this article, and there is scarcely any poor family that is not confined to its use as a means of light almost exclusively. Now, to put a tax, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Scofield] has said, of one hundred or one hundred and twenty per cent. on this article, which is almost exclusively the light of the common people in the common towns, and to tax gas, which is used in the wealthy cities and by wealthy corporations, only seven per cent., is a proposition which the House cannot well sustain. I trust that when this question is presented in the simplest possible form a reduction of fifty per cent., or ten cents on the gallon, and when we are notified that it is not to come before us in this shape again we shall sustain the proposition of the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. I now yield for a moment to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. Niblack.]

Mr. NIBLACK. Mr. Speaker, the second amendment which the Senate ingrafted on the bill as we passed it the other day is as follows:

And nothing herein contained shall be construed as a repeal of any tax upon machinery, or other articles which have been or may be delivered on contracts made with the United States prior to the passage of this act.

I did not concur with the Committee of Ways and Means in the recommendation that the House should non-concur in this amendment. On the contrary, I am in favor of con-curring in it. My observation has taught me that gentlemen holding contracts with the Government, as a general proposition, are not likely to lose much in any event, and they can as a class as well afford to pay taxes as any other class in this country, according to their number. I am told that there are now a large number of subsisting contracts for the building of machinery of one kind or another for the Government, some partly executed, some, perhaps, just commenced, and some under which nothing has yet been done, but still the contracts exist, and they were all made with reference to the amount of tax which the manufacturer had to pay upon the manufacture of the machinery. These contracts were all made with reference to the amount of taxes the contractors would have to pay, and hence there is no hardship in collecting the taxes now. To fail to collect them only puts so much additional money into the pockets of these contractors.

I am informed, upon inquiry, that if this amendment of the Senate is not concurred in it will make a difference to the Government of some four hundred thousand dollars. Now, I am in favor of relieving these industrial interests as far as possible. That is one of the great demands that are now being justly made upon this Congress; but I believe we are here going rather too far in that direction. There is a point beyond which we cannot go and sustain the credit of the Government. I am afraid we are, without consideration, relieving many interests of this country that can bear at least a small amount of taxation. Now, I submit that while we can, without doing injustice to anybody, save some four hundred thousand dollars a year to the Government of taxes, I think we should do it. Therefore, as a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, I am in favor of this amendment of the Senate, and trust it will be concurred in by the House.

Mr. ALLISON. I now yield to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Pike] for two minutes.

Mr. PIKE. It ought to be said, by way of defense of the action of the Committee of Ways and Means in relation to the amendment of the Senate, that the contractors referred to here maintain that, upon the facts of the case, they have good reason for exemption from the tax. I will say this, in addition to the forcible reasons urged by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. Schenck,] that there should be no discrimination between public contractors and private contractors. The memorials of these contractors in relation to this taxation were before the House at the last session of Congress, and have been at the present session of Congress. They allege, and I presume correctly, though I have not examined the matter, that the tax has been raised upon them since the contracts were made. The House is aware that this manufacturers' tax has been increased from the original tax of three to five per cent., then to six per cent., and then back to five per cent. again.

These contractors allege that a portion of those contracts were made while the original tax of three per cent. was in force. And they say that for that reason, if for no other, this amendment of the Senate should be concurred in. I am told that the contracts referred to here pertain mainly to engines for the Navy Department. I have not looked into the matter; but I know from general statements that these contracts were of a very close character. They were made during the war, and in such a manner that the contractors generally had but very little or no margin of profits. And the contracts were so large that they called for the whole mechanical force of the country, and the contractors were deprived of the advantage they hoped to have in obtaining labor at a more moderate price than at the time the contracts were made.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Allison] yield to me for a question?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to the fourth amendment of the Senate. As I understand it, it is proposed to exempt $5,000 from taxation. But gentlemen will observe that a manufacturer may manufacture goods to the amount of $5,999 free of tax.

Several MEMBERS. Four thousand nine hundred and ninety-nine dollars.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. No; $5,999, for this is the clause of the committee's amendment:

Manufactures of any kind, or articles produced by them, are exempted from taxation by the provisions of this act, and whose annual sales exceed $5,000, shall pay, for every additional $1,000 in excess of $5,000, two dollars.

The tax is to be on "every additional thousand dollars;" therefore, the $999 will be exempt from tax. The tax is to be paid monthly. Suppose that each month there is a production of $900, you gather no tax. I would suggest to the gentleman to make it read "for every additional $1,000, or fractional part thereof."

Mr. ALLISON. This is precisely the provision in existing laws in relation to wholesale dealers. It is at the rate of two dollars for every $1,000 over $5,000.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. You do not say "at the rate of;" if you did, that would meet the difficulty.

Mr. ALLISON. It is too late to make any change now, even if desirable, because the previous question has been called. But I think there will be no difficulty. I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MOORHEAD.]

Mr. MOORHEAD. I desire to say, in relation to the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS]—in which I think he does injustice to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. SCHENCK]—that the chairman did not say that the committee were in favor of not reducing the tax upon oils. Yet the gentleman from Massachusetts quoted him as saying so. Now, the committee have not decided any such thing, and I think the gentleman has misquoted what the gentleman from Ohio said.

I am of the opinion that the committee will report a reduction, from the fact that crude oil is now going abroad in large quantities; and unless a reduction be made the business of refining the oil will be transferred from this country to foreign countries. Whether the House should now concur in the Senate amendment or defer action on this subject till the Committee of Ways and Means report their general bill I am not prepared to say, nor do I feel much interest in the question; but I have no doubt that the committee fully admit the propriety of a reduction.

Mr. BANKS. I stated to the House what the chairman of the committee had said, using his very words.

Mr. ALLISON. I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. JUDD.]

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, when the report of the committee was read I supposed the question would come directly before the House on concurring or non-concurring in the amendment of the Senate. If the vote of the House were to be finally upon concurring in the amendment of the Senate I would desire to offer an amendment to that amendment. I am advised, however, that, in the present posture of the bill, I am not permitted by the rules to offer my amendment without unanimous consent. I therefore ask unanimous consent to offer the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I agree that if the amendment of the Senate is to be concurred in an amendment substantially such as that which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUDD] has prepared should be added. I would like to hear it read.

Mr. JUDD. My amendment is to amend the proviso added by the Senate to the first section by striking out "passage of this act" and inserting "1st of July next;" so that the proviso will read:

Provided, That the product of petroleum and bituminous substances heretofore mentioned, except illuminating gas, shall, from and after the 1st of July next, be taxed at one half the rates fixed by the said section ninety-four.

I had desired, with the assent of a portion of the committee, to offer that amendment if the vote should be taken on concurrence; but I am precluded, as I understand, by the rules from doing so. The only effect of my amendment would be to protect those dealers who now have on hand stocks on which they have actually paid taxes, and which by this legislative action, without the amendment, will be reduced some four dollars and a half per barrel. The amendment would simply make the operation of this provision prospective, fixing the 1st of July as the time when it shall take effect. We would thus give to those who have already paid their taxes upon this article an opportunity to dispose of their stocks under the law as it now stands.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Those who have paid their taxes are broken down, and they want the tax taken off that they may recuperate. Those who have not paid their taxes are cheating the Government, and the time ought not to be extended to enable them to continue their cheating. If unanimous consent is necessary to permit the offering of the amendment I object.

Mr. ALLISON. As this amendment would be an improvement upon the Senate amendment I would be disposed to allow it to be introduced but for the fact that the Senate amendment is still crude in other respects, and it is not desirable that it should be adopted even with this amendment. I therefore must decline to permit the gentleman to offer it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that if the House should concur in the Senate amendment in regard to petroleum that question will not go before the committee of conference, as both Houses will have agreed on this subject.

Mr. ALLISON. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. INGERSOLL.]

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Speaker, in the two minutes which the gentleman allows me I desire to call the attention of the House to the subject of this petroleum or illuminating oil. As the law now stands the products of petroleum known as benzine and naphtha (which are essentially the same) pay a tax of ten cents a gallon when they mark below seventy degrees of Baumé's hydrometer. When the specific gravity is above seventy they pay no tax whatever. By far the larger proportion of benzine and naphtha marks above seventy and pays no tax. Now, sir, the illuminating oil, of which the only sort proper for use by the poor man, or any other man, is the non-explosive sort, should be protected against the fraudulent mixing of benzine and naphtha, which give it its explosive character. Benzine and naphtha are the explosive and inflammable substances, in petroleum, which, by distillation, are taken out; and if they are of a specific gravity above seventy they pay no tax whatever.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Allow me a word.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have only two minutes and I wish to make that clear. I wish the House to adopt an amendment to increase the tax upon naphtha and benzine so there shall be no premium to fraudulent rascals to mix benzine with oil. Instead of the poor man's light it is the poor man's murderer. I know I am right, and we ought to protect the people by our legislation. I say, sir, that nine tenths of the conflagrations in the country are due to this mixture of benzine and naphtha with oil. It has also caused the loss of hundreds of lives. The admixture of benzine and naphtha with illuminating oil renders it as inflammable and explosive as powder or nitro-glycerine and just as dangerous. A gentleman tells me that a whole family were burned to death in his district by this mixture.

Mr. SCHENCK. I cannot understand from the gentleman from Illinois whether he is advocating the Senate amendment or not.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I had hardly time to say that I prefer to take that as about the best thing we can get at this time.

Mr. SCHENCK. I cannot understand the gentleman's reasoning. What does the Senate amendment propose? To cut down the tax, and it does not touch the question the gentleman is talking about.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The Senate amendment at least reduces the premium on fraud.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am as familiar with the subject as the gentleman from Illinois. Ten cents is the tax upon one grade, twenty cents upon another, and there is another grade upon which there is no tax. The Senate propose to cut down the twenty to ten and the ten to five. Now, I agree with the gentleman these inflammable substances ought to be taxed out of existence.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I agree with that.

Mr. SCHENCK. In our general bill we have provided for putting the tax so it will not favor these things as they are favored now. But the Senate does not touch the question. They simply reduce the tax one half. They do not touch the question to which the gentleman refers, but they leave it as it is. I think we had better leave the whole subject over to the general bill.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Let me have one minute to reply.

Mr. SCHENCK. My colleague on the committee has charge of the floor.

Mr. ALLISON. I yield the floor now for five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I sincerely sympathize with the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means in the necessity which has been forced upon him to discuss this subject under the pressure of the previous question. I know the House has permitted, by unanimous consent, amendments to be proposed, and I had some amendments to offer, but I was unwilling to submit them unless in my own time, and as the chairman was embarrassed by the situation I did not ask to move them.

I desire to consider in the time given to me the fourth amendment of the Senate and the substitute proposed for it by the House. That fourth amendment provides that all articles of manufacture which are not specifically taxed after the bill shall pass shall be subjected to a tax upon the sales of the same by the original manufacturer. That is the provision the Senate ask us to adopt, and which it is said will give us about ten million dollars of revenue. The House committee has proposed an amendment which limits this provision to those articles liberated from tax by this bill alone.

Now, at the last session of the Thirty-Eighth Congress and at the first session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, in each of those sessions, in the passage of the internal revenue bill a large number of articles of manufacture were liberated from taxation, amounting in the aggregate to a remission of $75,000,000 of taxes. And now, as the bill comes from the Committee of Ways and Means, not one of all those articles liberated in the last two Congresses will sustain any tax on sales, but all the articles liberated by this bill are to be subjected to tax on sales, thus discriminating between the manufacturers by a remission of taxes to the amount of $64,000,000 in addition to the $75,000,000 remitted by the former acts. Now, I have looked over the law and there are some four closely printed pages, amounting in all to perhaps a thousand articles that were liberated under the laws of the last two Congresses. All these articles are to be subjected to no tax on sales whatever, whereas all the articles liberated by the bill now before the House are to be subjected to such tax. That, I contend, is entirely unjust. I admit that the fact that they have now been liberated and are adjusted to the present condition of prices gives them, perhaps, for a temporary purpose, a right to a little consideration over those that we are now liberating. But how will it be a year hence? A year from now they ought to stand on the same ground. But here is a law that, so far as we are concerned, forever discriminates, providing that half the manufacturers of the country shall suffer a tax on sales while the other half have no tax at all to pay.

Now, if we are to adopt either of these propositions I prefer to adopt that of the Senate. But I desire to say that I am opposed to the adoption of the Senate amendment also. It will be remembered that in the Thirty-Eighth Congress a very elaborate discussion took place on the principle of taxing sales, and I wish only to say, as my time is almost exhausted, that it was then developed that but three civilized nations ever attempted to or ever did adopt a law levying a general tax on sales, and the result was most disastrous in all those nations. This is not a general tax on sales, but it is a step toward it.

Mr. ALLISON. I only desire to say a single word in reply to my friend from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] The reason urged by him why this modification proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means should not be adopted is a reason why we should stand here and do nothing on this question of taxation. We introduced this bill believing there was a present necessity to relieve the manufacturers from tax. We introduced this bill because we could not bring in our entire bill for a month to come.

Now, my friend mistakes the committee when he supposes it is our intention to relieve a large class of manufacturers from this tax on sales. This bill applies only to those manufactures that are included in sections ninety-four and ninety-five of the existing law. It does not apply to those that are exempted by former legislation. I agree with my friend that we, perhaps, made a mistake in our bill two years ago when we relieved absolutely a certain class of manufactures from tax. I believe, for instance, that the iron interest can bear a burden of taxation as well as any other manufacture in this country. Yet a year ago we relieved that interest from internal duty. Now, when we come to report our general bill—and this is an answer to every speech made in opposition to this provision—we propose to tax all manufacturers upon their sales, as we now propose to tax those manufacturers who are affected by this bill—not only the manufactures included in this bill, but all other manufactures—one fifth of one per cent.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am very much pleased to learn that the gentleman proposes, when the general bill is introduced, to do that thing; but it seems to me, if he will allow me the suggestion, that he has given us an argument against passing this clause when he says that they propose to change it in the general bill. Why not, then, disagree with the Senate and remit the whole question to the general bill?

Mr. ALLISON. I will answer my friend on that point. We now propose to relieve the manufacturers of fifty dollars on $1,000, and their products will, of course, be absolutely free if we do not adopt this amendment of the Senate or some modification of it. And we shall find, when hereafter we come to reimpose taxation on manufactures, that they will oppose it entirely. We think when we relieve them of fifty dollars on $1,000 they ought to be willing to allow us to impose on them an additional tax of two dollars. But it is the intention of the Committee of Ways and Means not only to tax manufacturers one fifth of one per cent., but to tax all wholesale dealers one fifth of one per cent. on sales, instead of one tenth of one per cent., as now imposed by law on wholesale dealers, so that all wholesale dealers will be placed on a par with manufacturers, and be compelled to pay one fifth of one per cent. on sales. Were it not for the fact that a higher tax ought to be imposed on sales we could not remit the tax on manufactures, because we must have revenue to sustain the Government and support its public credit; and we cannot do that if we relieve manufactures entirely from taxation.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY. Having been detained at home by the dangerous illness of a member of my family, I have been conferring for the last three days with leading manufacturers of Philadelphia, which is, I believe, conceded to be the great manufacturing center of the country at this time, and the gentleman from Iowa has expressed in the philosophy which has governed the committee the conclusion presented to me by, I may say and speak largely within bounds, fifty of the manufacturers of Philadelphia. Their suggestion is an amendment to the Senate amendment, such as I find here, making the two mills tax apply to the articles to be relieved by this bill and not to articles which have hitherto been relieved, because that would involve an embarrassment in their accounts, and on many articles upon which the profits are very minute a readjustment of prices or a loss upon the articles. Men who are relieved of a five per cent. tax will not object to two mills as a tax upon them, and so, too, of those that are relieved of two and a half and three per cent. I do not think that a measure of legislation more vital to the interests of the country than this was ever before this House, and I do not believe that any amendment could be made to the bill which would make it so satisfactory to the classes it affects as precisely this one, which leaves free from taxation articles that have hitherto been exempted, and diminishes or almost removes the taxes imposed on other products of manufacturing skill and industry.

Mr. ALLISON. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD.]

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I made an effort to get a motion before the House to recommit this bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report an amendment which would make a like reduction on foreign importations. I desire to explain very briefly the object which I had in view in that proposition.

It will be perceived that this bill proposes an aggregate reduction of about sixty million dollars from the whole revenue of the country. It is thus proposed to reduce the revenue nearly one fifth by taking off the tax upon manufactures.

Now, it is estimated that there will be required for the expenses of the Government $331,000,000, and $150,000,000 of that, or nearly half, is to be derived from duties on imported articles. The committee and the House, I am afraid, do not see the fact that by reducing the tax on manufactures they necessarily reduce the prices to the consumers of manufactures, and in doing that they will necessarily reduce importations, because the foreign manufacturers cannot thus compete with American manufacturers.

The effect of that, in my judgment, will be to create a proportional decrease in the revenue from duties upon foreign articles imported, thus creating a large deficiency in the amount required to carry on the Government. In that aspect of the case, therefore, I think it but right and fair, should we desire to continue in the receipt of sufficient revenue, to make a pro rata reduction of the duties laid upon foreign importations. And there is another reason. It is unfair to the commercial interests of this country to relieve manufacturers and throw a corresponding increase of the burdens of taxation upon trade and commerce. We have other interests besides those of manufacturers. There are our agricultural, importing, trading, commercial, and navigating interests that are materially affected by our action. In my judgment it is untimely for Congress at this time to lay this burden upon these other interests in order to relieve the manufacturing interest.

It was for that reason, therefore, that I desired to move to recommit the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to provide for a pro rata reduction of the duties upon imported articles. As that motion was not in order at the present stage of this matter I have made this explanation of my views upon this subject.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ALLISON. I will yield for a moment to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.]

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has shown very good reason why we should not adopt the amendment proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means in reference to manufactures, inasmuch as it makes a broad discrimination without any reason, by removing the tax on sales from one class and imposing it on another.

I desire the floor, also, to show why we should not concur in the amendment of the Senate touching the same thing; but that we should non-concur and have a committee of conference. That amendment of the Senate proposes to bring within the scope of this tax the entire free list; that upon which the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who last addressed the House, [Mr. KELLEY,] and myself, and members of this House generally, have struggled to put articles which it was absolutely necessary to have upon the free list; such as agricultural implements and articles of necessity generally. All the articles in the free list, which, from absolute necessity, has increased until it now covers many pages of the law, by this amendment of the Senate are to have this tax laid upon them. I hope, therefore, the House will non-concur in this amendment, for reasons which I have sought to urge, and which have been urged with so much more ability by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. ALLISON. I now yield to my colleague upon the committee, [Mr. MAYNARD.]

Mr. MAYNARD. If we could have everything as we wanted we would probably carry our proposition a little further and abolish taxes altogether; or, as some one has expressed it, have no taxes at all and pay the expenses of the Government by drafts upon the Treasury. But unfortunately we are compelled to have money in the Treasury derived from the collection of taxes, and that to a very large amount.

There is one thing to be noticed; during the whole of this debate and during the discussions which we have heard in the committee-room, where we have had a great number of persons who have told us of articles that should not be taxed and have given very ingenious and plausible reasons to show why they should not be taxed, I believe we have not yet had one person come before us to tell us of an article that might be or ought to be taxed.

Now, in regard to this article of petroleum, which my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] characterizes as the "poor man's light," when did it become the poor man's light? Was there no poor man's light before petroleum came into use? Were there no poor men before this light was discovered? Did not they have light from animal and fish oils?

Mr. SCOFIELD. That was "the light of other days." [Laughter.]

Mr. MAYNARD. Petroleum may supply the light which some poor men use, but it also furnishes the light which a great many rich men use also. That argument, it strikes me, is a very suspicious one.

Who are they that are here seeking to have the tax on this article abolished? Are they the poor men or the representatives of the poor men? No, sir; they are the petroleum capitalists, the men who represent the oil wells. It is a very suspicious circumstance that the appeal for the removal of this tax, made in the name of the poor men of the country, comes from those who represent the petroleum wells and the oil distilleries. Why, sir, our taxes should be collected from the wealthy interests, the capital of the country, the men who have the means to pay; and I know of no interest so abundantly able to pay as that which is represented by the word "petroleum," a word which from the time it came into the general vocabulary has been the synonym for wealth hastily acquired, wealth gotten without effort, fabulous capitals springing up suddenly from fortuitous causes, not from the slow accumulations of labor. I hope the House will concur in the action of the committee, and leave this whole subject of petroleum to be considered and discussed in all its bearings when the general bill shall come before us.

Mr. ALLISON. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VAN WYCK,] and then I will surrender the floor to the chairman of the committee, [Mr. SCHENCK.]

Mr. VAN WYCK. Mr. Speaker, in the two minutes allowed me by the courtesy of the gentleman from Iowa, I have only time to ask the members of the House to read and consider carefully the last section proposed in the report of the committee. The well-settled principles of law are here overthrown. The law presumes that every man is innocent until he is proved guilty. Yet this section proceeds upon the principles that every man is to be presumed guilty until he proves himself innocent. Hence this legislation, harsh as it is, will not have the effect to increase the revenues nor to punish dishonest distillers, because it will be impossible in this country to obtain a jury that would ever be willing, upon a mere prima facie case, such as that contemplated in this section, to convict any man. But the harshest feature of this section is that which provides that—

The fact of the selling below the amount of the tax shall be held to be prima facie evidence that the collectors and assessors of the districts in which said spirits were produced and were sold have severally neglected their duties; and such collectors and assessors shall thereupon be suspended from office.

Why, sir, under this provision, if any vagabond chooses to buy in one district a barrel of ardent spirits and then go into a second district and sell it for $1 75 the revenue officers of each district are to be considered as prima facie guilty of negligence, and are to be suspended from office. Why, sir, is it possible that any Committee of Ways and Means should propose such legislation by which all our revenue officers are placed at the mercy of their enemies? I have only time to call the attention of the House to this provision, and ask members to decide whether they are willing to do such injustice to the officers of the Government.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, in closing this debate, I find that my colleague upon the committee, the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD,] has anticipated a good deal I would have said upon the general subject of taxation. Everybody is ready to help the committee to take the taxes off; but few seem disposed to assist in maintaining and collecting them. But taxes we must have; and, as I have before said, in recommending the imposition or continuance of taxation upon certain articles, we have no disposition to levy taxes where they are not necessary as sources of revenue, but we are actuated by the conviction that we must tax some things in order to have revenue at all. Now, sir, I would gladly adopt, were it practicable, that platform suggested the other day as the only one on which any party could win—the platform which would insure to every man a big roll of greenbacks in his pocket and an exemption from all taxation. But that is a Utopia to which we are not likely to arrive. And therefore, sir, I say to the gentleman, after a full, thorough, earnest investigation of this whole subject, the Committee of Ways and Means have come to the conclusion, if we are to remit tax upon a large number of manufactures of the country, as we are seeking to do, we must at the same time get such tax as we propose upon other subjects of taxation, or to a certain extent upon those, in order that we may have revenue enough to carry on the operations of the Government.

Coming, then, to this particular subject about which so much has been said, there is no tax upon petroleum properly considered and no tax upon crude oil as it comes from the bowels of the earth. I would gladly tax that some two or three cents per gallon, and thus make foreigners, by whom it is bought and manufactured after exportation, pay their proportion to the support of our revenue; but after thorough investigation we are satisfied we cannot tax the crude oil without building up distilleries of coal and peat and shale in England and other places abroad to the detriment of our own manufactures. If we tax, therefore, we have to tax, as we are now doing, distilled oil—distilled oil the product of petroleum. Shall we tax it as now, or shall we come down one half? The Senate propose a general reduction of one half. The law now produces $5,000,000. The Senate throw off half of that, and if gentlemen will side with the Senate in propositions of this kind they must recollect it is by so much they help to embarrass the House in attempting to get revenue for the Government so as to enable us to relieve other things. As to our taxing the poor man's light, I will not say a good deal of that is demagogery, or, to use the Turkish term, "bosh;" but I do say that assertion is made to the face of the fact that under the present tax, considered so onerous upon the products of petroleum, they run down, down, down, until no people are so cheaply lighted as ours.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I ask the gentleman whether it is not true that almost every other product of American industry has declined to the same extent?

Mr. SCHENCK. No, sir; not if these gentlemen tell the truth. They tell us while other manufacturers are comparatively prosperous they are utterly crushed out. We do not find it so by investigation. I leave that now, sir, to come back to this matter again. I say these very manufacturers tell us they did not know anything which could better bear the present rate of taxation than these very products. What they do claim we are trying by our general provisions to accomplish; that is, protection from illicit distillation of oil and protection from these dangerous adulterations; and if the House will confide in the committee we can report a bill we think satisfactory upon that point. And when the committee report it, as I have said again and again, if gentlemen will not undertake to interfere with it, which gentlemen must admit this does to a certain extent, if they will let it alone for the next three months, they will have the fullest opportunity on the general bill for amending it, if they can, so as to reduce the tax, or amending it so as to take the tax off altogether. I hope they will not succeed, but they shall have an opportunity of trying the question. For that reason, among others, we beg them not to undertake the exemption of a certain class of manufactures in this indirect way from taxation altogether.

My colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] wishes us to extend this system of taxing sales above a certain amount to all manufactures. Our reasons are very simple for not doing that, and they have been well sustained by what the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] just returned from that State, has stated. I say we are compelled to put some special tax upon sales in order to get revenue. We propose to leave all outside of this bill for the present until the general bill is passed; that which is exempt to remain exempt, and that which is specially provided for to remain specially provided for. But so far as these particular exemptions are concerned, we propose when we take off the specific tax of a certain percentage directly upon the manufacturers, that they shall be put under what will have to be a provision, as we believe, of a general bill. If we do not do this, what will be the effect? While exempting them from every sort of tax for the next two or three months, they will treat it as a great burden when we come to put the tax on their sales, and there will be great grumbling then. So now we propose to get rid of that difficulty by making the transaction at once.

The first amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

Add to section one the following proviso: Provided, That the product of petroleum and bitu- minous substances hereinbefore mentioned, except illuminating gas, shall, from and after the passage of this act, be taxed at one half the rates fixed by the said section ninety-four.

The committee recommended non-concurrence.

The question being put on concurring in the amendment, there were—ayes 51, noes 53.

Mr. SCOTFIELD demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 77, nays 63, not voting 49; as follows:

So the amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

Mr. SCOTFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The second amendment of the Senate was read as follows:

At the end of section two add the following: And nothing herein contained shall be construed as a repeal of any tax upon machinery or other articles which have been or may be delivered on contracts made with the United States prior to the passage of this act.

The committee recommended non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in—ayes sixteen, noes not counted.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was non-concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The third amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

Add the following as a new section: SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That after the 1st day of April next, no allowance for drawback on account of internal taxes paid, shall be made on the exportation of any article of domestic manufacture on which there is no internal tax at the time of exportation, and no claim for drawback on any article exported prior to June 30, 1866, shall be allowed unless presented to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue within three months after this act takes effect.

The committee recommended concurrence, with the following amendment:

Strike out all after the word "enacted," in the first line, and insert in lieu thereof:

That after the 1st day of July, 1868, no allowance for drawback on account of internal taxes paid on manufactures shall be made on the exportation of any article of domestic manufacture which is relieved from tax by the provisions of this act, nor shall such allowance be made in any case unless it shall be proved by sworn evidence, to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, that such articles of manufacture were, prior to the 1st day of April, 1868, actually purchased or manufactured and contracted to be delivered for such exportation; and no claim for such allowance on any such article shall be paid unless presented to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue prior to the 1st day of August, 1868.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to; and the Senate amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

The fourth amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That every person, firm, or corporation who shall manufacture by hand or machinery any goods, wares, or merchandise not otherwise specifically taxed as such, or who shall be engaged in the manufacture or preparation for sale of any articles or compounds not otherwise specifically taxed, or shall put up for sale in packages with his own name or trade mark thereon any articles or compound not otherwise specifically taxed, and whose annual sales exceed $10,000, shall pay for every additional $1,000 in excess of $10,000, two dollars, and the amount of sales within the year beyond $10,000 shall be returned monthly to the assistant assessor, and the tax on sales in excess of $10,000 shall be assessed by the assessor and be paid monthly as other monthly taxes are assessed and paid.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended concurrence in this amendment with two amendments, the first of which was then read, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "corporation," in line two of said amendment, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Whose manufactures of any kind, or articles produced by them, are exempted from taxation by the provisions of this act, and whose annual sales exceed $5,000, shall pay, for every additional $1,000 in excess of $5,000, two dollars; and the amount of sales within the year in excess of $5,000 shall be returned monthly to the assistant assessor, and the tax on sales in excess of $5,000 shall be assessed by the assessor, and paid monthly as other monthly taxes are assessed and paid. And the assessment for the month of April, A. D. 1868, shall be made on the excess of sales above the rate of $5,000 per annum; and thereafter the annual period for the assessment of such tax shall commence on the 1st of May in each year.

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was agreed to—ayes seventy-one, noes not counted.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment to the amendment was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WARD. Would it be in order to ask the special attention of the House to the next amendment reported by the Committee of Ways and Means?

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes that the special attention of the House is given to all amendments.

Mr. WARD. It is a very extraordinary amendment.

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order.

The second amendment reported by the Committee of Ways and Means to the fourth amendment of the Senate was to insert the following as an additional section:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That every person who shall engage in or carry on the business of a distiller with intent to defraud the United States of the tax on the spirits distilled by him, or any part thereof, shall forfeit the distillery and distilling apparatus used by him and all distilled spirits and all raw materials for the production of distilled spirits found in the distillery and on the distillery premises, and shall, on conviction, be fined not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, and be imprisoned not less than six months nor more than three years. If any distiller shall carry on such business in any district, city, town, township or parish for a period of twenty days, during which the market value in such district, city, town, township, or parish, of the kind of spirits produced by him is less by more than ten per cent, than the tax and the cost of producing said spirits, it shall be prima facie evidence that the business is being carried on with intent to defraud the United States. And if it shall at any time come to the knowledge of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that distilled spirits are selling directly or indirectly, in any collection district, at a market price less than the tax on such spirits, he shall forthwith institute a strict examination into the business and conduct of all the revenue officers, both in the district in which such sales are being made and in the district in which such spirits have been manufactured; and the fact of the selling below the amount of the tax shall be held to be prima facie evidence that the collectors and assessors of the districts in which said spirits were produced and were sold have severally neglected their duties; and such collectors and assessors shall thereupon be suspended from office, and the powers and duties of their several offices shall devolve upon such subordinate officers as are now designated by law, of which suspension notice shall be immediately given to said collectors and assessors by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and all pay and compensation shall be withheld from them until they shall respectively show to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue either that on the spirits so sold for less than the tax thereon the tax has been regularly paid, or that if the tax has not been paid the failure to pay has not been on account of negligence or want of due diligence on the part of the officers so suspended.

Mr. ROSS. I would inquire if that amendment is open to amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. MUNGEN. I would like to make a suggestion to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Is it not in order to ask unanimous consent that thirty minutes be allowed for the discussion of this particular section?

The SPEAKER. That is in order.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Then I make that suggestion.

Mr. PRICE. I object.

The question was put on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment; and there were—ayes 54, noes 57.

Mr. SCHENCK demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 82, nays 57, not voting 50; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Blaine, Boutwell, Broomall, Buckland, Calk, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Dixon, Dodge, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Ferriss, Ferry, Garfield, Gravelly, Griswold, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Stevens, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, Twichell, Robert T. Van Horn, Cadwalder C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—82.

NAYS—Messrs. Trimble, Upson, Van Anker, Van Trump, Van Wyck, Ward, Wood, and Woodward—57.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Washburn, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, and Windom—50.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment of the Senate, as amended, was then concurred in.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate was concurred in as amended; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The amendment of the Senate, to add to the title the words "and for other purposes," was then concurred in.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment to the title was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ROOM FOR APPROPRIATION COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following letter from the Clerk of the House:

CLERK'S OFFICE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
UNITED STATES,
WASHINGTON, D. C., March 23, 1868.

SIR: On the 23d instant the House passed this resolution:

"Resolved, That the room now occupied by the engrossing clerks be assigned to the use of the Committee on Appropriations, the room at present occupied by that committee being assigned to the engrossing clerks until a better and permanent arrangement can be made."

Yesterday afternoon I received formal notice from the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations on behalf of a sub-committee who have had charge of this subject, that they desired immediate possession of the present enrolling room.

The room assigned to the enrolling clerks by the resolution referred to has been examined and is found to be so small that it will not even hold the desks and cases now in use by the enrolling clerks daily employed; and I am at a loss to see how the engrossing and enrolling required by the rules of the House can be promptly and properly done with accommodations so inadequate and so inferior to those now possessed. I feel it my duty to make this representation to the House, and trust that a more suitable room than that indicated in the resolution of the 23d instant may be provided for those charged with this branch of the work of this office.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

EDWARD McPHERSON,

Clerk of House of Representatives United States.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX,

Speaker House of Representatives.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania. I move that this letter be referred to the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move to amend the motion by adding a provision that all action under the resolution heretofore adopted be suspended till the Committee on Enrolled Bills shall report on this subject.

Mr. BLAINE. The substance of that letter is that the room which has been used by nine committee men with frequently large audiences is not large enough for three enrolling clerks.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I did not hear the reading of the whole of this communication. I would like to have it read again, that we may know whether the Clerk rules the House or whether the House rules itself.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois that the communication was read in full, and that the House was unusually quiet during the reading.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Gentlemen were talking to me.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to amend the motion to refer by striking out "the Committee on Enrolled Bills" and substituting "the Committee on Appropriations."

Mr. SCOFIELD. In reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN,] which reflect upon the Clerk, I wish to say that if the gentleman had heard this letter read he would have discovered that it is a very respectful communication, not asking the restoration to the enrolling clerks of the room heretofore occupied by them, but simply informing the House of what we probably had not thought of, that the room which we have assigned them is too small, and asking us to make some other arrangement. If the gentleman had heard the communication read he would not have made the remark which he has made.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I made my remark for this reason, that since this resolution was adopted a few days ago, the Clerk has obstructed the execution of the order of the House.

Mr. BLAINE. Oh, no; I think not. I think the Clerk has behaved toward us with marked courtesy.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania. I rise to a question of order—that I have not surrendered the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. When the gentleman made his motion to refer, he did not demand the previous question, and therefore left it open to debate.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Is it in order to move to reconsider the vote by which the House adopted the resolution referred to in this communication?

The SPEAKER. It is not, because the motion to reconsider was made and laid on the table. The resolution can only be rescinded by another resolution, to be offered under the rules of the House with regard to resolutions.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] as entitled to the floor.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania. I desire to inquire what is the amendment proposed by my colleague, [Mr. SCOFIELD?]

The SPEAKER. Two amendments are now pending. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] moves to amend the motion of his colleague [Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania] by adding a provision that the execution of the resolution be suspended till the Committee on Enrolled Bills shall have reported. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] moves to amend the motion to refer by striking out "the Committee on Enrolled Bills" and inserting "the Committee on Appropriations."

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania. I accept the amendment of my colleague, [Mr. SCOFIELD,] and call the previous question.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask the gentleman to yield to me a moment.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania. For what purpose?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. For a moment only. I desire to make an inquiry and a remark.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania. I will hear the gentleman's inquiry.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to inquire whether the business of the Committee on Appropriations is not nearly finished for the session? Have not all their bills been reported to the House, or nearly so?

Mr. SPALDING. They have not.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask whether the pleasant room they now have is not sufficient for this session? Is it not a good room for the approaching warm weather?

Mr. SPALDING. If the gentleman is so pleased with it let him exchange it for the committee-room of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania. I demand the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope it will be voted down.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] is considered as pending.

The previous question was seconded; there being, on a division—aye ninety-one, noes not counted.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

Mr. SPALDING's amendment was disagreed to. The resolution, as modified, was adopted.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. We shall have to report more liberal appropriations. [Laughter.]

NICKEL-COPPER FIVE CENT PIECES.

Mr. KELLEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 968) for the coinage of nickel-copper pieces of five cents and under; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ALLISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REGISTER OF DEEDS.

Mr. INGERSOLL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 969) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to establish the office of register of deeds for the District of Columbia," approved February 14, 1863; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. ALLISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PACIFIC RAILROAD FREIGHT TARIFF.

The SPEAKER stated the next business in order was House joint resolution No. 168, to regulate tariff for freight and passengers on the Union Pacific railroads and their branches, on which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to take up the time of the House to any considerable extent in reference to the subject now pending; nor, indeed, should I have said a word on this joint resolution, but have satisfied myself with the motion to refer to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, had it not been for the singular course, in my judgment, pursued by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WASHBURN] in debating this measure. I have reference particularly to what I consider an attack upon the Committee on the Pacific Railroad. I will give his own language:

"Mr. Speaker, at a very early day in the session I introduced a bill and had it referred to the Pacific Railroad Committee providing for a commission, consisting of the Secretary of War, Secretary of the Interior, and Attorney General, whose duty it should be on the 1st of July in each year to revise the tariff of rates for transportation over the Pacific railroads. Waiting for a long time for some action from that committee, and becoming satisfied that there would be great delay and perhaps the bill would 'sleep the sleep that knows no waking,' I endeavored to arrive at the same result by the means of a joint resolution."

Why that language should be used in reference to that committee is more than I am able to conceive. No gentleman in this House knows better than the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WASHBURN] that it is almost impossible for a committee to report a bill until that committee is regularly called; and the Committee on the Pacific Railroad had not been called from the time the bill was referred to it until the time when this language was used; nor has it been called since. In addition to that I had personally stated to the gentleman, what probably I had no right to do, that the committee had had the matter under consideration, and that as chairman of the committee I had been instructed to communicate with the different railroads named in the joint resolution, for the purpose of ascertaining from them something in reference to their business, their receipts, and their expenditures. The knowledge of that fact the gentleman from Wisconsin had from me, and I was, therefore, the more surprised to hear him use the language I have just read.

I do not know that it is necessary to defend the committee in this or any other case, but it appears to me that it is when the further fact is taken in connection with this that a rather wholesale denunciation was made of the members of the House because of the passage of the amendment to the Pacific railroad bill in 1864. Gentlemen who heard that speech will remember that it was stated that there was no member to be found who had voted for it; meaning by that, I suppose, that those who had voted for it were ashamed of having done so. In looking at the Congressional Globe containing the record of the proceedings on that occasion I find that there are thirty-one members of this Fortieth Congress who voted for that measure in the Thirty-Eighth Congress. That, I take it, is a fair indication that the people who sent them here indorsed their action upon that occasion. And not only have they done that, but some of the members who voted for this measure in the Thirty-Eighth Congress have been elevated by their constituents to the Senate of the United States. Whether all the thirty-one gentlemen will get there or not remains to be seen. [Laughter.] It is a matter of time and of hope on the part of some of them. I am asked by a friend on my left how many are here who voted against it. I am not prepared to say exactly, but I will risk the assertion that there are not ten members of the Fortieth Congress who voted against that measure in the Thirty-Eighth Congress.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Here is one who voted against it.

Mr. PRICE. Why, as a matter of course the gentleman did. It is a work of supererogation on his part to say he is one of them.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. And here is another present.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I do not understand that it is a mark of condemnation upon a member of this House that he has voted for or against any measure. I presume no gentleman casts his vote upon any measure here, whether it be a railroad bill or any other, unless he conceives it to be right to do so. He stands upon the record. I deprecate the idea, and if I could cure the evil in that way I would enter my protest here on the record against this seeming—to use no harsher term—impugning or calling in question of the motives of members who happen to vote for or against a measure.

I heard before I became a member of Congress or had ever seen the inside of this congressional Hall an anecdote which I will relate as illustrative of this practice and of my own feelings in reference to it. A colored man, before the shackles had been stricken from his limbs, while not only his body but his mind, to a certain extent, was in bondage, was asked if his master was a Christian. "No, sir," said he, "my massa is a member of Congress." [Laughter.]

Now, sir, I was not able to see why a man should not be a member of Congress and at the same time a Christian, and I supposed a man with the free use of his limbs and faculties, who was morally and mentally free, would not have given such an answer. But when I hear members of Congress on this floor calling in question the motives of gentlemen who have voted for or against a measure, they themselves being parties concerned, I do not wonder that a man outside who knows nothing but what he had heard should make just such an answer as that.

Did the members of the Thirty-Eighth Congress commit any sin against the laws of God or man when they voted for the amendment to the Pacific railroad charter in 1864? Are they to be called before the judgment seat to-day and arraigned as having committed an act against their country or against their Maker? Sir, I hope to live long enough to see the day when that kind of argument will not be used upon this floor, but when a measure will stand upon its merits, and gentlemen will vote for or against it because they believe it to be right or wrong, and when those principles and motives will alone govern them.

Why, sir, it was but a day or two since that I picked up a paper—and I will let it go upon the record to correct the evil—in which I read a statement that besides one gentleman in this House and another at the other end of the Capitol, there were not a dozen sober men in Congress. [Laughter.] I am asked who were the exceptions. The exceptions were the Speaker of this House and Senator WILSON. [Laughter.] Well, sir, I am glad that they named two good men. When they said that, they told the truth, but they did not tell it all. I do not find any particular fault with this scribbler who writes from the Halls of Congress for saying that we have sober men here. That is true; but if I could have controlled him I would have had him tell the whole truth. And I want to say here and now and to put it upon the record—I did not intend to say anything on this subject when I rose to discuss a Pacific railroad bill, but I do not think I can say anything better—let it go to the country that the Fortieth Congress has not only got two sober men in it, one in the House and one in the Senate, and they are exemplary men and worthy to be copied after by any one, but that there are more of the same kind of men in the Fortieth Congress than there have been in any Congress for the last fifty years. I want that to go upon the record as an answer to the statement made by this writer. And, as a friend in front of me says, there are fewer of the other kind—fewer men who indulge in intoxicating liquor as a beverage than there have been in this House or in the Senate for the last fifty years. I name this, sir, to show that this species of argument—if it may be called argument—this indulging in innuendoes and insinuations is not calculated to do the Congress of the United States or the people of the United States any good.

Why, sir, if we do not respect ourselves who is to respect us? If a man comes here without a moral foundation on which to build the superstructure of his legislative character his constituency had better keep him at home. I trust that in the discussion of this or any other question gentlemen will confine themselves to the merits of the case and show by facts and figures why the measure ought or not to be adopted. Character is everything in this world, and I presume there is not a gentleman on the floor now, nor has been for the last ten years, and I hope there never will be in the future, who does not entirely sympathize with the sentiment expressed in the language of Shakspeare, which I will quote:

"Who steals my purse steals trash; 'tis something, nothing;
'Twas mine, 'tis his, and has been slave to thousands;
But he that filches from me my good name,
Robs me of that which neither enriches him,
And makes me poor indeed."

Reputation, sir, ought not to be cheap in this House; it ought not to be cheap anywhere; and I hold that the practice of impugning the motives of gentlemen who vote for or against measures is cheapening the reputation of this House to an extent that ought not to be allowed.

But, sir, I proceed now to show that the Committee on the Pacific Railroad ought not to have been criticised in the manner they were. I said to the gentleman from Wisconsin at the time that the statement he made lacked correctness. He replied:

"I state nothing but what is correct. The gentleman from Iowa I have spoken with several times, and I have understood from him that the committee had had the matter under consideration, and I think that he is in favor of the measure, but that a majority of the committee have no intention of reporting that bill."

If the gentleman from Wisconsin understood me to say anything of that kind to him I can only say that he entirely misunderstood me. I certainly never said to him what I did not know myself, that the committee had no intention of reporting that bill. The committee proceeded to the consideration of the bill with a diligence and industry that has not been exceeded by that applied to any bill that has come before the committee since I have had the honor to be a member of it; and they would have been ready, I presume—and if the bill is left with them they will be ready, I presume—whenever the committee is called to make some report, whether for or against it I am not now prepared to say, because I do not happen to know what the majority of that committee will do in the premises. I know they will consider the matter fairly; I know there are upon that committee gentlemen who understand the question, and will bring to its consideration all the knowledge and experience they possess on that subject.

Let me give another item or two from the speech of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WASHBURN] which I think should be examined. In one place he says, "I say what I do on this subject only to call attention more forcibly to where we are drifting." Then, in another part of his speech, he says:

"Nothing shows more clearly where we are drifting than the fact that this Pacific Railroad Committee, only three or four days ago, attempted to report another Pacific railroad bill, from Portland, Oregon, to connect with the Pacific road at the north bend of the Humboldt river."

Now, all I have to say in reply to that is that the Committee on the Pacific Railroad did not attempt to report a bill of that kind at all. We had had under consideration a bill for such a road, and had so cut it up and changed it by amendments, without coming to any conclusion upon it, that the committee instructed me to ask the House to allow it to be reprinted and recommittees. That was all I did. That, however, was objected to, and of course we did not have the benefit of that reprinting. The Committee on the Pacific Railroad have never sought to report that bill, or any bill like it. They have never decided what they will do with that bill. I so stated to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WASHBURN] at my own desk, where he came to ask me the question; I so stated to him in so many words.

Then why make this complaint against the Committee on the Pacific Railroad? What have they to do with it? Some of the members of that committee belong to the legal profession; some of them are business men. Their duty is to consider the bills referred to them, and to report to the House such as they think proper to be passed by Congress; and until they do this, it is scarcely necessary, to say the least of it, for any gentleman to rise on this floor and attempt to charge that committee with doing something they have not sought to do.

The gentleman has charged, too, that a great wrong was done to the Government because a certain road had not been built in a direct line. When the gentleman made that statement I asked him this question:

"Has the Government given one dollar more of subsidy to the road on that route than it would have been obliged to give had the road been built on the other route?"

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WASHBURN] answered "Yes, sir." Now, I want to read the law on that subject. The provision to which I refer is as follows:

"And said company, constructing said branch, shall not be entitled to receive in bonds an amount larger than the said Union Pacific Railroad Company would have been entitled to receive if it had constructed the branch under the act to which this is an amendment."

That is tolerably plain language. So, then, if the Union Pacific Railroad Company, or the Government of the United States, or the Congress of the United States, as is the fact, allows that road to be built in any way so as to make the connection contemplated and specified in the first act of Congress that may be presumed to be right; and when the gentleman from Wisconsin said that they got more money from the Government than they would otherwise have got he was mistaken simply, as the record shows.

Mr. ALLISON. Will my colleague [Mr. PRICE] yield to me for two minutes?

Mr. PRICE. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire merely to say that my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. WASHBURN] has evidently been laboring under a misapprehension upon this question of the Sioux City branch railroad, possibly because he has not investigated it with that care which he might have exercised, and possibly because he was not in the Thirty-Eighth Congress, which changed the original legislation upon that subject.

The chairman of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad [Mr. PRICE] will bear me witness that whatever change was made in that Sioux City branch was made at the instance of the Minnesota delegation in this House and at their request; it was made with the view of accomplishing the very thing that the gentleman from Wisconsin desires to accomplish, that is a short route from the head of Lake Superior to the main line of the Union Pacific railroad.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. ALLISON. In the few minutes allowed me I cannot yield to the gentleman.

Now, sir, by a direct line from Sioux City to the town of Frémont, which is at the north bend of the Platte river, the distance is seventy-three miles. By the route which has been selected it is one hundred miles—only twenty-seven miles longer than the straight line; the latter running over high hills and through a number of valleys—the route having been pronounced by distinguished engineers almost impracticable. If the route were carried across the Missouri river at Sioux City it would really make a longer line than that which has been selected, a portion of which is in the State of Iowa. I submit that it is not a good ground for objection to this Sioux City branch that a portion of it runs through the State of Iowa and not the State of Nebraska. That is all I desire to say.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. PRICE. I have not time to yield to my friend from Wisconsin. I have promised a part of my time to my colleague, [Mr. DODGE.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call attention to an expression which was made the other day by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN,] and I desire to see whether the gentleman himself will not agree that he has done some injustice. My colleague from the fifth district [Mr. DODGE] was trying to get the ear of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WASHBURN] when the gentleman from Illinois rose and said—I cannot say it so loudly as he did—I cannot imitate his style of utterance, but I can read the language as reported in the Globe:

"I object to the gentleman from Wisconsin yielding to the agents of the road, unless some of the Representatives of the people can be heard."

Now, we shall all agree without argument that the people have an able advocate on this floor, not only to watch the Treasury but to watch the agents of the railroads. So long as he is allowed to occupy a place here, which I presume will be a long time—and I hope his shadow may never grow less—the people will have not only a faithful guardian of the Treasury but a vigilant sentinel upon the watchtower, always ready to protect their rights. But what did the gentleman mean when he spoke of "agents" of a railroad? I thought I might have misunderstood him, and that probably he had spoken in the singular number. But it is printed in the Globe, as I understood it, "agents." There happened to be two of us claiming at that time the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin; one was my colleague, [Mr. DODGE,] and the other myself. It took both of us to make "agents." How did we come to be "agents of the road?" Why was that remark interpolated in that form? I cannot consider it as anything else than a part of the sharp tactics of the gentleman from Illinois. If we are "agents of the road," the presumption is that we are sent here for the purpose of advocating the interests of the road and of doing things which, as legislators, we ought not to do.

Now, sir, I have not come here as an "agent of the road." I have no more interest in it than my friend from Illinois has. I have never had any interest in it, and never expect to have. Sir, when this project was originated—a project unprecedented, proposing to connect the waters of the Atlantic with the waters of the Pacific, to unite with bands of iron the East and the West—there were but few men in this country who had the nerve to invest their money in the enterprise. My friend from Illinois did not invest any money in it; nor did I. We had not the necessary amount of nerve.

We had not much money, and we had less nerve. Therefore, we did not engage in the enterprise. And I think that no gentleman ought to come here to-day to call in question the motives or the principles of those men who had the nerve to spend their money for the construction of this road, which, when finished, will be one of the most magnificent works on this continent.

Why, sir, no one who has studied at all the history of Rome can fail to know something about the Appian Way, which one of the Roman historians went so far as to call the Queen of Roads. What was it? It reached originally from Rome to Capua, a distance of one hundred and twenty-five miles, and was afterward extended till it embraced a distance of three hundred and thirty, or, as some say, three hundred and fifty miles. The famed Appian Way will live in the pages of history while the name of ancient Rome lives in the pages of history. But what is that, sir, compared to the Pacific railway, from ocean to ocean, that penetrates into a wilderness never before explored save by the Indian or the buffalo? Compared with this gigantic undertaking the famous Appian Way is little better than a cow path. I say, then, it comes with a bad grace from any gentleman here, and especially any gentleman from the West, to attempt to do discredit to the resolute men who have invested their energies and their capital in this vast undertaking.

Now, let us look at what the Pacific Railroad Company charge for the carriage of freight and passengers. I trust, if I tell the truth on this point, and I never intend to tell anything else, I shall not be accused by the gentleman from Wisconsin with being the agent of this company. I do not know but they charge too much both for freight and for passengers, but I shall know better about that when I come to investigate the subject fully and in detail. Then when we have all the figures before us, for figures do not lie, we can better judge whether the company charges too much or not. But, sir, from the slight investigation I have given to the subject I have satisfied myself the Pacific Railroad Company does not charge more than one third of what was charged for freight and passengers before that road was commenced. That much I know. I know while it cost $185 a passenger for going from Omaha to Denver City before that road was built, upon this road for the same distance the charge is only $51 50. I know while before it cost $1 80 the hundred pounds to carry freight that distance it now only costs fifty cents. The cost, then, for passengers and freight is really two thirds less than it was before this road was built. So the cost has been reduced two thirds, and not increased as was alleged by the gentleman from Wisconsin. Of course I do not undertake to speak with precise accuracy, but generally; nor is it necessary to this argument that I should go into details. The fact is that the charge for passengers and freight is now only one third of what it was before this road was built. The public have to that extent been benefited by the construction of this road.

When the committee investigates all of the facts, when we have all of the figures before us, I shall then make up my judgment upon those facts and figures. I shall do that which I believe to be right.

I can assure gentlemen there are now railroad companies which charge more than the Pacific Railroad Company; and there is a fact about the Pacific railroad which gentlemen should not lose sight of, and it is this: this road, sir, has to carry fuel for its engines hundreds of miles. No other railroad company is compelled to do this to anything like the same extent. And there is still another fact. This road has freight and passengers to a great extent only one way, and its cars are brought back empty, or nearly so. Gentlemen who know anything about these things know it costs more to run a road that has business only one way than to run a road which has a return business; that is, business to and fro. Yet, sir, notwithstanding these disadvantages, this road charges two thirds less than the cost before the road was built.

I do not know that it is relevant to the pending joint resolution, although it is in an answer to the gentleman's speech. My friend from Wisconsin said it was fortunate men did not live beyond one hundred years, for otherwise Cornelius Vanderbilt in the next fifty years would own the world. I do not ask any legislation to protect me or my constituents from Mr. Vanderbilt or any other man living. If he can own this world I am satisfied. I presume he is a live man and that he will not be buried till he is dead. That is more than can be said for some others; they are dead and ought to have been buried out of sight long ago. I hope the gentleman will not charge me with being the agent of Vanderbilt. If I am he does not know it, and I do not know it.

I have invested a few thousands in a railroad running through a country where more people lived than lived upon the line of this Pacific railroad, and I have no distinct recollection of getting my money out again. I think I have got one dollar in seven out. But I had not got money enough to speculate in that way and so I quit the business.

And, so far as the Pacific railroad is concerned, if the enterprise had depended on the aid of my friend from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] and myself, I think that the trackless forest and unbroken wilderness would have remained undisturbed until this day, and for many days in the future. Neither he nor I would have helped to build it.

But I say all honor to the men, whether they live in Massachusetts, New York, or elsewhere, who have the money, the energy, and the nerve to prosecute an enterprise like this such as the world, up to the present time, has never seen, and never would see but for such men. There has never been a railroad built—and I must say it at the risk of being charged with being an agent of the company—there has never been a railroad built on this or any other continent with the speed with which this has been built.

At one time I am told the stock of the company was not worth fifty cents on the dollar, and bankruptcy stared the majority of the stockholders in the face. But they persevered, as Columbus did, against difficulties and discouragements until now, from the best information I can obtain from my friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. WASHBURN,] their bonds are said to be the best securities of the kind in the world. The suggestion occurs to my mind whether somebody has not got these bonds to sell. But I say after these men have passed through all the dangers and outrode the storm, now that the clouds begin to break away from the horizon and they can see the light in the distance, now that the prospect is brightening for them they are met by parties who seek to interpose obstacles in the way of their success. Just as soon as a man begins to get a little ahead in this world somebody is ready to pull him back by the coat tail. Where you find one man with the hatchet and hammer ready to build up you will find five hundred ready to burn down what he is building. I do not think that kind of practice ought to have any countenance in this House.

If these men make money I shall, for one, rejoice at the fact, because some other men will be encouraged to undertake like enterprises, until between the Atlantic and the Pacific there shall be railroad after railroad, highway after highway; when a man can attend church in New York on one Sabbath, and in San Francisco on the next; when space will be annihilated, as it were, and this nation shall be united and bound together not only by the common ties of kindred and language, but by iron bands that cannot be severed.

Mr. Speaker, I have scarcely introduced this subject, but my colleague [Mr. DODGE] wants some time, and I promised to yield to him. Now, this matter having been discussed for an hour and a quarter by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. WASHBURN,] and as I know the business of the House is pressing, and there are several important bills that gentlemen are desirous of getting passed, I propose at the expiration of my hour to submit to the House the motion to refer, on which I shall call the previous question. I shall make the motion, and leave it to the House whether it will sustain it or not.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman not to do that. Many gentlemen desire to speak on the subject.

Mr. PRICE. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WASHBURN] has been heard on the other side, and I intend to make the motion. I yield now to my colleague, [Mr. DODGE.]

Mr. DODGE. Mr. Speaker, as there appears to be some misapprehension as to the true status of the Union Pacific railroad and its branches, all I desire to do is to set forth the facts in relation to that enterprise. I have no defense of the company to make. I leave that to the country and this House; but, sir, I believe I know as well as any man can what that company has done and what its intentions are. I will notice briefly a few points of the gentleman from Wisconsin. I believe that he does not desire to misrepresent that great enterprise, and I therefore desire to correct a few statements that bear directly upon the subject before the House. The gentleman says Government has given absolute control to parties managing the Union Pacific railroad. Does he not know that the Union Pacific railroad has to build its road under the supervision of three Government commissioners, who examine and criticize every mile of road built before it is accepted by the Government, and that they, under oath, certify the road is a first-class American road before one dollar or one cent can be obtained from Government? And this is not all; every act of the board of directors and of the company is criticised and scrutinized by five Government directors, appointed by the President, and forming one fourth of the board of directors. One of these Government directors has a position on each one of the committees, and nothing can be done in or out of the board but what they have full cognizance of. No other of the roads receiving Government aid has any such board or any such supervision, and these directors have full knowledge of the rates of freight, the necessity for these rates, &c.

The gentleman says it is a work that over sixty millions of the people's money is to be invested in, whereas the law prohibits the loan of over fifty millions of credit or bonds to the main line, and so far not a cent of the people's money has been put into the enterprise, the company having fully paid their interest on bonds; and if the money saved to Government in the transportation of Government freight, mails, troops, &c., should be made a sinking fund it would pay off the entire debt or entire amount of bonds within thirty years. In another place he says:

"If we see fit to sacrifice posterity to this giant monopoly, that they will have $100,000,000 of the people's money in their hands; that they (the company) will defy any legislation."

Now, sir, I do not understand where the gentleman gets his $100,000,000, as I have shown the company can only obtain $50,000,000 on the main road under any circumstances. The amount really granted to the company is as follows:

For five hundred and thirty-four miles at $16,000 per mile.....	$8,544,000
For three hundred miles at $48,000 per mile, namely, one hundred and fifty miles of mountain work from Cheyenne west, and one hundred and fifty miles of mountain work from near Sacramento east, which equals.....	14,400,000
For eight hundred and ninety-eight miles crossing the main divide of the continent, the Wataach promontory, Laone, Taone, and Humboldt ranges of mountains, at $32,000 per mile, amounting to.....	28,736,000
Making a total amount of bonds for the main through line of.....	$51,680,000

If the company received pay on the full length of line that they will have to build to complete the road from the Missouri river to Sacramento; but as, under the law, they obtain only $50,000,000 for eighteen hundred and thirty-two miles of road, counting the distance to San Francisco, they get an average of a little over twenty-seven thousand dollars per mile; that the Government loans its credit for the purpose of obtaining an all-rail communication from the Atlantic to the Pacific through a country, over mountains and plains, that no private enterprise would for one moment invest one cent without Government aid. If this road is to be the great thoroughfare that the gentleman says it will be, then the Government freight that will alone go over it will more than pay their interest on the loan.

And now, sir, the gentleman says Government has furnished every dollar to complete this road—in other words, that not one cent of money has been put into the enterprise outside of the Government—and I deny in toto the statement of the gentleman. I say, up to the present time, that that company has furnished and spent more money in building the road than Government has loaned; and according to the gentleman's statement they have only built as yet the easiest portion of the road; he says five hundred miles of the built portion is a dead level, and assumes the contract to commence at Omaha. This is not the fact. It commences two hundred and forty-seven miles west of Omaha; therefore all his assertions and assumptions fall to the ground, being based upon false premises. When you compare the rates of this road with other roads you will not see so vast a difference as is endeavored to be shown.

The Union Pacific railroad charges about seven mills per hundred pounds of freight per mile. The Great Eastern routes, competing for freight between the great cities of the East and the great West, charge from two and a half to four mills per hundred pounds per mile, they having all the advantages of civilization, concentration, transportation, the cheapness of material, fuel, repairs, &c.; while the western roads—the roads east of the Missouri river—charge four and five mills on one hundred pounds per mile. Many of the local southern railroads charge four, five, six, and as high as seven mills per hundred pounds of freight per mile. As to passenger fare, the Union Pacific Railroad Company are now charging ten cents per mile; the Northwestern Railroad Company four cents per mile; the Chicago, Rock Island, and Pacific Railroad Company three and a half cents per mile; the Richmond, Danville, and Piedmont Railroad Company six cents per mile; and these roads are all in a heavily settled country, with heavy local business, while the Union Pacific railroad runs five hundred miles into a wilderness, without comparatively any local business, nearly all their freight and travel going but one way.

Now, sir, the past year coal for fuel has cost the Union Pacific Railroad Company from twenty-eight to forty-two dollars per ton, delivered at places for use. It has had to be obtained in Illinois, Missouri, and Iowa, and has had to be transported from five hundred to one thousand miles before the company could use it. Again, wood, at first cost, has been six to eleven dollars per cord, and when laid down at the points for use averaged about eighteen to twenty dollars per cord. Labor and living of all kinds on the Union Pacific railroad and branches are one third more than on eastern roads. Material for repairs of road, cars, running stock, building material, and all other things pertaining to the keeping up and furnishing the road, have to be transported from the East. And the gentleman asks this House to burden us with rates and fares that he knows the road could not earn its running expenses under.

As soon as the road reaches the coal fields one hundred miles west of the track, then the companies propose to reduce the rates and fare themselves; they have already reduced them somewhat; and so far as these railroad companies being a grinding monopoly it is far from the facts in the case, and is not substantiated by any proofs whatever. The gentleman, it seems to me, takes a very singular way to protect Government. He charges that the bonds will never be paid; that our rates are equal to old rates by wagons and stage, and he comes in here with a proposition that, if adopted, would prevent these companies from earning sufficient money to even pay the interest on their bonds. It is the first time that I ever saw the mortgagee come in and endeavor to injure the value of the property of the mortgager, and if possible put the property on which he holds a mortgage in a condition that they cannot not only pay the mortgage, but not even the interest on the mortgage.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as to the rates as compared with former rates as paid by Government for transportation of its freight. The average price paid by Government for 1865, 1866, and 1867, inclusive, on route No. 2 from Leavenworth west was $1 57 per one hundred pounds per one hundred miles, or one and one-half cents per mile per one hundred pounds, more than double the rates upon the Union Pacific railroad and branches; and in the last year Government has saved by transporting its freight on the Union Pacific railroad, eastern division, over what it would have had to pay if transported by wagon trains over an average transportation of only one hundred and four miles of railroad, $335,138; or, if that road had been built three hundred miles west, it would have saved by this "great monopoly," with its "exorbitant rates and tariffs," over one million dollars. And the statement made by the Quartermaster General of the rates of freight over the Plains, over route No. 1, the Great Platte valley route, for the last six years, is as follows:

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 24, 1868.

SIR: In reply to your communication of the 20th instant to this office requesting information as to the rates paid for each year for the last five years and the total number of pounds of stores transported and total cost for such transportation on route No. 1 for 1866 and 1867, I have the honor to state that the rates of transportation per one hundred pounds per one hundred miles on route No. 1 for the last five years, including the contract rates for the present year, are as follows:

1864. April, $2 25; May, $2 25; June, $2 25; July, $2 25; August, $2 25; September, $2 25.
1865. April, $2 26; May, $2 26; June, $2 26; July, $2 26; August, $2 26; September, $2 26.
1866. April, $1 45; May, $1 45; June, $1 45; July, $1 45; August, $1 45; September, $1 45.
1867-68. April, $1 64; May, $1 64; June, $1 64; July, $1 64; August, $1 64; September, $1 99; October, $1 99; November, $1 99; December, $1 99; January, $2 50; February, $2 50; March, $2 50.
1868-69. April, $1 90; May, $1 75; June, $1 60; July, $1 60; August, $1 60; September, $1 75; October, $1 75; November, $1 90; December, $2 00; January, $2 50; February, $2 50; March, $3 00.

This office is unable at present to furnish the number of pounds of stores transported over route No. 1 for the years 1866 and 1867 and the cost of such transportation for that time; but the information desired on this point has been this day called for from the chief quartermaster military division of the Missouri, which, as soon as received, will be forwarded to you.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
D. H. RUCKER,
Acting Quartermaster General, Brevet Major General United States Army.

Hon. G. M. DODGE, M. C., Washington, D. C.

The average is two dollars per one hundred pounds per one hundred miles, or two cents per mile, being one cent and three mills above the rates of the Union Pacific railroad. The Quartermaster General is now unable to give me the precise facts as to the saving in rates, but we can figure for ourselves. The Government transportation over the road last year was about twenty million pounds of freight, and the Union Pacific railroad transported it, on an average, four hundred miles; showing a saving to the Government on its freight alone, at the average price of the last six years, of about one million forty thousand dollars. If we take the price that the contracts are let for this year and apply it to the amount of freight that will be transported over from five to eight hundred miles of line, the saving will reach nearly two millions on the Union Pacific railroad, and nearly a million on the Union Pacific railroad, eastern division.

And now, Mr. Speaker, what are the facts in relation to the Union Pacific railroad? This road was projected some fourteen years ago. The first examination as to its feasibility was made by private enterprise and private capital, and a connection with it, dating back to its first inception, renders me able to state some of the difficulties under which it has labored. The examination made by me thereon and reported to the capitalists of the United States showed that at that day or this it would be impossible to build that road upon private capital and credit alone. The country demanding the railroad, the Republican party, in its far-seeing and liberal policy, seeing the necessity of this railroad, indorsed it, made it a part of their platform, and breathed life into it by the bill passed in 1862. But even then, with that law and that grant, it was found impossible to raise the funds to push it forward or even to build a mile of the road. The Congress seeing this amended the act in 1864, and after the passage of that act this great monopoly, this great swindle, could not obtain the means for one year to start the work.

A few men took hold of the enterprise, threw their fortunes and their energies into it, and the capitalists of the country looked upon it as so foolish an act on their part that they were actually shunned as prospective bankrupts; their paper would not be taken except upon first class collateral securities, and within one year the enterprise came near failing for want of financial support. But the energy and determination displayed by that company; the unheard of ability displayed in pushing forward the work; the unexpected development of that country that the enterprise caused, called the attention of the world to it, and now to-day the men who would not one year ago have put a dollar into it are denouncing it as a great monopoly, and trying to cripple it by unjust and unequal legislation. If it is a success, and any money is made out of it, it will be simply and merely from the fact that a few men had the nerve and the foresight to throw their all into the scale, and "sink or swim" with the enterprise. And, Mr. Speaker, to reach the success they have to-day, no person can, for one moment, know or see the obstructions, prejudice, and obstacles those companies have had to meet and overcome. The first three hundred miles of road were built without an eastern connection; they had to start hundreds of miles away from any railroad connection, in a country entirely destitute of the proper means or material for building a road; paying enormous prices for labor and material; transporting the superstructure and equipment by water at from thirty-three to fifty per cent. more than it would cost to build the same length of road in a country affording railroad facilities. The iron laid down cost $125 a ton, equipment and everything else pertaining to the road that came from the East costing in the same proportion.

The first year the company, under these circumstances, built about forty miles, the next two hundred and sixty, and the next two hundred and fifty miles, but with a lavish expenditure of money that astonished the world. Who, in 1864 could have been made to believe that this company would have accomplished what they have? What class of men except those who had this enterprise at heart would have paid thirty-three and a third per cent. more for building the road merely for the purpose of obtaining distance when, if they had carried out only the true letter of the law, they could have saved that amount and put it in their pockets? Have they had at interest themselves more than the country? I hold not, for I know that their orders have been to give them the most miles of road in the least possible time, no matter what it cost. And in their contract they have provided $7,500 per mile for the equipment of the road, a sum far beyond any ever before provided for a new road under similar circumstances; and when built and equipped this sum will give it the best machinery, the best shops, and the most liberal supply of rolling stock of any road in the country for the business it has to transact. During the past two years the road has been built through an Indian country with all the tribes banded together and hostile. Our best and ablest men have been killed; our cars and stations and ranches burnt; our men driven off and our stock stolen. Graders and track-layers, tie-men and station-builders, have had to sleep under guard, and have gone to their work in the day-time with their picks and shovels and their mechanical tools in one hand and the rifle in the other, and they have had often to drop one and use the other.

It may not be known but it is a fact that the graders went to their work as soldiers, stacked their arms by the cuts and worked all day, with hostile bands of Indians in view, ready to pounce upon, kill, and scalp any unlucky or negligent person who gave them an opportunity. The company paid not only the cost of the work proper, but contractors were often paid large sums for the risk they run. It is an easy matter to-day, after the enterprise has been made a success, and when we can just begin to see the beginning of the end, when daylight begins to open on the future out of these years of darkness, for men to now come in and endeavor, for some reason, I know not what, to hamper these roads, to pass laws that they know will make them spend the energies that it is their duty to put on the road and which are necessary to complete it, in trying to break down the barriers that this bill, if passed, will make against those roads in the financial market. And I doubt if the gentleman from Illinois or the gentleman from Wisconsin, who appear to make this great republican national work their special objective point, would, for all the money in it, stand as I have had to do, at the risk of my life, and endeavor to keep men from abandoning the work; would travel as I have done to make the surveys and construct the road, obliged to keep all the time within the range of a Government musket, for to be outside of it was to lose your scalp.

And now, Mr. Speaker, while the Government has been liberal to this great enterprise, I hold and can prove that while the road has received this liberal credit, that it will bring to the Treasury millions in the saving of the extra expenses in freight. That it must and will develop a country whose wealth no one to-day can predict. The mountains those roads cross are no myth, as the gentleman states, but were formidable obstructions in its path, which have been overcome by the skill and energy of the company. These mountains are underlaid with gold, silver, iron, copper, and coal. The timber ranges that those roads pass will develop an immense lumber trade, and the millions upon millions of acres of Government land that they will bring into the market and render feasible for settlement will bring to the Government more money than all the bonds amount to; and this land and these minerals never would have brought this Government one cent if it were not for the building of these roads. The inaccessibility and the trouble and cost of developing the country through which they run would have cost ten times more under any other circumstances than it would have yielded. And now, Mr. Speaker, these Union Pacific railroads, when completed, will build up an interest right in the center of that heretofore great unknown country, an empire that shall add to our wealth, population, capital, and greatness, from a source we never expected, and by no other means could we ever obtain.

Mr. PRICE. I promised several gentlemen that if this joint resolution came up to-day I would make a motion to refer it to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and move the previous question on it.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. This is a matter of too great importance to choke down discussion, and I beg the gentleman from Iowa not to press that motion.

Mr. PRICE. It will be for the House to determine.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. It will be perceived that a large number of members have already left the Hall, and there is hardly a quorum present. I hope the gentleman will take notice of that fact.

Mr. PRICE. I will say to the House that the other side have had an hour and a quarter to discuss this joint resolution, which has never been printed. I therefore move that it be referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad; and I move the previous question.

The question was put upon seconding the previous question; and there were—ayes 54, noes 31; no quorum voting.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The previous question being pending this joint resolution will be the first thing in order after the reading of the Journal to-morrow morning, if the House shall now adjourn.

The question was taken on Mr. WASHBURNE's motion, and it was agreed to; and the House (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 26, 1863.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating an estimate of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs of appropriations required for the different bands of Chippewa Indians in Minnesota in removing them to their reservations and subsisting them for six months after their arrival, and also for the erection of a mill at Red lake; which, on motion of Mr. RAMSEY, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 246) directing the Secretary of State to present to George Wright, master of the British brig J. & G. Wright, a gold chronometer, in appreciation of his personal services in saving the lives of three American seamen wrecked at sea on board of the American schooner Lizzie F. Choate, of Massachusetts, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. RAMSEY. I hope we shall be allowed to go through with the morning business.

Mr. SUMNER. That can be done after we have finished what is to be transacted in executive session.

Mr. RAMSEY. I trust we shall not go into executive session now.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before the question is put on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts I ask leave to introduce a bill.

Mr. SUMNER. I make no objection to that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then I ask leave to introduce a bill without notice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By the new rules that will require unanimous consent. The order of business now comes within the rule, so that any objection will prevent the introduction of any business out of its order.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Illinois that he does not require unanimous consent for that any more than unanimous consent is necessary for the other motion. The new rule is that his bill and all bills are received, among other things, before anything else is done.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In their order.

Mr. CONKLING. In their order. I call attention, if the Chair will allow me, to Rule 24, as we adopted it, which recites what shall be done, and then declares "all which shall be received and disposed in such order, unless unanimous consent shall be otherwise given." Now, I suppose, it is only in order by unanimous consent to move to go into executive session.

Mr. SUMNER. I beg the Senator's pardon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is a question on which the Chair entertains some doubt. On the other question he has no doubt.

Mr. SUMNER. A motion to adjourn is in order at this moment, and so is a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If anybody objects to my bill I will withdraw it; but I ask unanimous consent to introduce the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection it will be received and read a first time.

Mr. SHERMAN. If that is done the rules will amount to nothing. I hope we shall begin by observing the rules that we adopted yesterday.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator objects I cannot offer it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it cannot be received now under the rules. Petitions and memorials are in order.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a resolution of the Legislature of Kentucky, protesting against the action of the House of Representatives in refusing to admit the Representatives of that State into that body.

The Secretary proceeded to read the resolution.

Mr. HARLAN. I move that the further reading be dispensed with, and that the communication lie upon the table, and be printed.

Mr. SUMNER. From whom is the communication?

Mr. HARLAN. The Legislature of a State. The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also presented a memorial of the constitutional convention of South Carolina, praying for the removal of the civil disabilities imposed on certain persons in that State by acts of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MORGAN presented a memorial of merchants of the city of New York, asking that the time in which claims for drawback may be presented be extended to January 1, 1869; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 881) refunding duties paid under protest on the importation from France of a bell donated for the use of Saint Mary's Institute and Notre Dame University, Indiana, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the petition of colored citizens of Alabama and Georgia, praying for an appropriation to each person who will embark under the auspices of the American Colonization Society to Liberia, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 442) to amend section one of an act to prevent and punish frauds upon the revenue, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1863, reported it without amendment.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred the resolution of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota relative to the Black Hills wagon-road, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Territories; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 356) for the relief of Messrs. Gelatt & Moore, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. HARLAN, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 369) to provide for mail service between Fort Abercrombie, Dakota Territory, and Helena, in Montana Territory, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported a bill (S. No. 465) for the erection of school-houses and the maintenance of schools in the District of Columbia outside of the cities of Washington and Georgetown; which was read twice by its title, and on his motion referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORTON. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 881 just reported by the chairman of the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires the unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I presume the Senator from Ohio will hardly agree to that.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is perfectly in order for the Senator from Indiana to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to pass a bill which has been reported.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Ohio objected to giving unanimous consent a moment ago.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all.

Mr. TRUMBULL. And he ought not to consent to it now.

Mr. SHERMAN. I objected to all motions out of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To entertain the motion requires unanimous consent. Is there any objection?

Mr. SUMNER. I renew the motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion is in order.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to present a memorial.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a motion pending to go into executive session.

The question being put on the motion, it was declared that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I call for a division until I can submit a question of order, whether I have not the right to present a memorial before that vote is taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Petitions and memorials were in order until the Senate seemed to be through with them, and then the Chair called for the next business in order, the reception of reports of committees.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That settles that question. I did not hear petitions and memorials called for.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to go into executive session is in order. The Chair will put it over again.

The motion was agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. TRUMBULL. While the doors are being closed I ask permission to introduce a bill. I suppose there will be no objection to that.

By unanimous consent leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 464) in relation to the qualifications of jurors; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the bill be printed and go upon the Calendar, as it has already been considered by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and, after fifty minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

TAX ON MANUFACTURES.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in some, and non-concurred in others, of the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 900) to exempt certain manufactures from internal tax, and concurred in other amendments, with amendments.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to take up that bill now with a view to the appointment of a committee of conference.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state that the House of Representatives has concurred in some of our amendments, concurred in others with amendments, and non-concurred in others. I will make the usual motion, that the Senate insist on its amendments disagreed to by the House, and disagree to the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate, and ask for a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I also move that the bill as it now stands be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. WILLIAMS, and Mr. MORGAN the conferees on the part of the Senate.

SUPREME COURT JURISDICTION—VETO.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I call for the unfinished business of yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business of yesterday is the veto message of the President of the United States on the bill (S. No. 219) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the judiciary act passed the 24th of September, 1789." The question is, "Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding?"

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, the objections made by the President of the United States in his message to this bill are based upon the second section. That section alone does not explain or enable us to understand its force and meaning. It is as follows:

That so much of the act approved February 5, 1867, entitled "An act to amend an act to establish the judicial courts of the United States," approved September 24, 1789, as authorizes an appeal from the judgment of the circuit court to the Supreme Court of the United States, or the exercise of any such jurisdiction by said Supreme Court on appeals which have been made or may hereafter be taken, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The section of the law which is thus repealed is in part as follows. In the first place, the act of February 5, 1867, provides:

"That the several courts of the United States, and the several justices and judges of such courts, within their respective jurisdictions, in addition to the authority already conferred by law, shall have power to grant writs of habeas corpus in all cases where any person may be restrained of his or her liberty in violation of the Constitution, or of any treaty or law of the United States."

Then, toward the close of the section, it provides that—

"From the final decision of any judge, justice, or court, inferior to the circuit court, an appeal may be taken to the circuit court of the United States for the district in which said cause is heard, and from the judgment of said circuit court to the Supreme Court of the United States, on such terms and under such regulations and orders, as well for the custody and appearance of the person alleged to be restrained of his or her liberty, as for sending up to the appellate tribunal a transcript of the petition, writ of habeas corpus, return thereto, and other proceedings, as may be prescribed by the Supreme Court, or, in default of such, as the judge hearing said cause may prescribe."

The effect of this legislation is to give any citizen of the country the right to the writ of habeas corpus to be issued by any of the courts of the United States within their jurisdiction or by any judge of such court in the following case; that is:

"Where any person may be restrained of his or her liberty in violation of the Constitution, or of any treaty or law of the United States."

And either party interested in such a case as that may have his appeal from the circuit court of the United States to the Supreme Court; and now the bill which the President sends back with his objections repeals that clause which allows a party in any case an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, where his liberty is withheld from him in violation of the Constitution or any law or treaty of the United States. Without reference to any particular case, without reference to any purpose that is to be subserved, why take away from a party an appeal to the Supreme Court in a case like that? Independent of all temporary considerations, independent of all possible party views, independent of the effect upon any pending cause, why is it that a party may not have an appeal to the Supreme Court from the judgment of the circuit court when the question is whether he be restrained of his liberty in violation of the Constitution of the United States or of any law or treaty of the United States? And, sir, in the discussion of this question I shall be very happy to hear Senators upon the other side give a reason why an appeal ought not in such a case to be allowed to the Supreme Court of the United States. In all civil suits that are tried before the circuit courts of the United States, where the controversy is in regard to property of the amount of $2,000, either party has his appeal to the Supreme Court. The legislation of the country assumes that where the matter in controversy is of less value than two thousand dollars the cases are too trivial to bring before that tribunal, but whenever the matter in controversy is of the value of $2,000 or more, either party shall be allowed his appeal.

Now, Mr. President, in a case where a man's liberty is involved, ay, sir, under existing laws where his life may be involved, and the question has been brought before a circuit court of the United States, and the decision has been adverse to him, you say that he shall not have his appeal to the Supreme Court. I wish to know why. We were told yesterday by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] that an appeal has been allowed in the past in habeas corpus cases only under one law, the law of 1842; and the Senator from Illinois does not propose to repeal that law. He proposes to allow the appeal in that particular case in favor of the party who may be wronged or supposed to be wronged by the decision of the circuit court. Now, I will ask the attention of Senators to that particular law. Senators will recollect that that law grew out of the controversy connected with the matter of Alexander McLeod; and it provided that the justices of the Supreme Court and judges of the district courts should have power "to grant writs of habeas corpus in all cases of any prisoner or prisoners in gaol or confinement, when he, she, or they, being subjects or citizens of a foreign State and domiciled therein, shall be committed or confined, or in custody under, or by any authority, or law, or process founded thereon of the United States, or of any of them, for or on account of any act done, or omitted under any alleged right, title, authority, privilege, protection, or exemption set up or claimed under the commission or order, or sanction of any foreign State or sovereign, the validity and effect whereof depend upon the laws of nations, or under color thereof." That law expressly gives an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States; and I submit to the Senator from Illinois whether that law itself did not have effect to give an appeal to the Supreme Court in all cases of habeas corpus provided for up to that time. I do not know that the Supreme Court has decided to the contrary, and I think that the effect of the recent decision made on the motion to dismiss McCord's case is to recognize the right of appeal in all habeas corpus cases under the language which was used in the act of 1842.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If so, what harm. I should like to ask, to repeal the law of 1867, if the Senator is right?

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator did not exactly understand the point I made. I said that the law of 1842, in my judgment, gives an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States in all habeas corpus cases arising under it. If Congress enlarges the field of the jurisdiction of the Federal courts without giving an appeal covering that enlarged field perhaps the appeal does not follow; but I will ask the attention of the Senator from Illinois to the provision in the act of 1842 which gives the appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States and to the language of the act of 1867, and he will find that the language is the same, and that the Supreme Court under the act of 1867 holds:

"The latter jurisdiction, [that is the jurisdiction of this court,] as has just been shown, is coextensive with the former, [the jurisdiction of the circuit court.] Every question of substance which the circuit court could decide, upon the return of the habeas corpus, including the question of its own jurisdiction, may be revised here on appeal from its final judgment."

I understand the Supreme Court to hold that the language of the act of 1867 gives an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States in all habeas corpus cases, whether they rest upon the act of 1789, of 1842, or of 1867. If so, the act of 1842 gave an appeal to the Supreme Court in all cases under the act of 1789 and of 1842, because the language is the same as that of the act of 1867.

But, Mr. President, waiving that for the present, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that if a foreigner comes before any judge of a court of the United States, or before any of the Federal courts, and shows to that judge or that court that he is wrongfully restrained of his liberty, and that such restraint of his liberty is in violation and in disregard of a "right, title, authority, privilege, protection, or exemption" which he sets up and claims "under any commission or order or sanction of any foreign State or sovereignty, the validity and effect whereof depend upon the laws of nations, or under color thereof," and the judge or court decides against his case, he has an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. Notice the fact, Mr. President, that you give to the foreigner in protection of his liberty an appeal to the Supreme Court when he says that he is entitled to his liberty by virtue of some regulation, order, or authority of his foreign Government under the laws of nations; but when a citizen of the country in that same court claims his liberty in express terms under the Constitution, or under any treaty or law of the United States, you say he shall not have an appeal to the Supreme Court. Can Senators reconcile such legislation with the rights which the citizens may claim, and with the duties which we owe to the citizens themselves?

Mr. President, I wish very briefly to refer to the Federal legislation on the subject of the writ of habeas corpus. The first is found in the judiciary act of 1789, very simple in its provisions, giving to the Federal courts a very limited jurisdiction in habeas corpus cases:

"That all of the before-mentioned courts of the United States—

The Supreme Court, the circuit court, and the district court—

"Shall have power to issue writs of scire facias, habeas corpus, and all other writs not specially provided for by statute which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions and agreeably to the principles and usages of law."

Thus, in the law organizing the judicial system of the United States, a jurisdiction to issue writs of habeas corpus is given to the courts in all cases when it is necessary to the exercise of their other jurisdiction. This was so limited a field that it was of but small consequence, indeed, as compared with the present state of the law, whether an appeal were allowed to the Supreme Court of the United States or not. Under this law such appeal was not allowed. If, for the purpose of exercising its jurisdiction, a circuit or district court issued a writ of habeas corpus ad testificandum to bring a witness before it, that writ was issued in aid or support of its jurisdiction, and no appeal would be allowed to the Supreme Court of the United States. But, sir, when we come to the law of 1842, and find that when Congress provides for the issuing of writs of habeas corpus by the circuit courts for the protection of substantial rights, an appeal is secured to the Supreme Court, although the claim to liberty in that case rested upon the right which the party acquired from a foreign country. I wish very particularly to ask the attention of Senators to the language of the act of February 5, 1867; and the first clause I will read again:

"That the several courts of the United States, and the several justices and judges of such courts, within their respective jurisdictions, in addition to the authority already conferred by law, shall have power to grant writs of habeas corpus in all cases where any person may be restrained of his or her liberty in violation of the Constitution or of any treaty or law of the United States."

Mr. President, is not that a case which properly, not only according to the spirit, but according to the very letter of the Constitution, comes within the judiciary system of the United States? Let me call the attention of Senators to the language of the Constitution providing for the judicial system of the United States:

"The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made or which shall be made under their authority."

The judicial power of the United States shall extend to all cases arising under the Constitution or any treaty or law of the United States; and, sir, when the writ of habeas corpus is given to protect a man's liberty, when he asserts his right to his liberty under the Constitution or a law or treaty of the United States, why stop him midway in the judicial system? Why not allow him to go to the highest court, where he might go if he only had $2,000 in controversy in a civil case?

Mr. President, under the act of the 2d of March, 1867, and the acts amendatory thereof, it is possible for the citizen to be arrested, to be taken before a tribunal unknown to our Constitution and system of laws, a military commission, to be held in custody, to be tried, condemned, and confined in prison or put to death. If, during the progress of these proceedings, he appeals to the circuit court of the United States having jurisdiction in the State, and the court refuses to restore him to liberty, refuses to protect him in his endangered life, you say he cannot come to the Supreme Court with that case. A trial is being had for his life before a court that is unknown to the Constitution, not only a court unknown to the Constitution and the laws, but a court which the Supreme Court of the United States has decided cannot become known to the Constitution and the laws of the United States for the purpose of trying a citizen; and being brought before such a court he seeks the protection of his liberty, the safety of his life, in the Federal courts; and being denied that protection in the circuit court, he seeks his appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, and Congress says, "You shall not have it." Now, upon general principles, can Senators reconcile that to their sentiments of right, to the security which the Constitution and the laws ought to afford to every citizen?

If a reason for the repeal of this law cannot be found in the nature of the case itself, where is it to be found? Yesterday the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] undertook to give a reason. He said, as a reason for repealing this law, that there were too many cases finding their way into the Supreme Court. Why did he say that? Why did the astute Senator from Nevada say, as a reason for enacting this law, that the Supreme Court was becoming crowded by this class of cases, and that, therefore, the law allowing the appeals ought to be repealed? Senators, is that a reason, if it be true?

If a case is of such magnitude and of such importance to the citizen as that he ought to have a hearing in the highest court of the land, is it a sufficient answer to him, under the Constitution which guarantees to him protection in his rights, that we are likely to overcrowd and overwork the judges of the Supreme Court? Do you recognize that as an answer? If it is the right of the citizen to be heard in the Supreme Court, it is no answer to him to say that that court is likely to become too much crowded in its business. If such be the condition of the court it is the duty of Congress to relieve that court, but not by denying the citizen a hearing in a proper case.

But, sir, in point of fact, the Senator from Nevada was compelled to admit that the court was not crowded; and when I asked him the question how many cases of this sort and under this law had come into that court he could name but one—the McCordle case. Strange position for the Senator to find himself in: to give as a reason to the Senate of the United States why this bill should pass, the veto of the President to the contrary notwithstanding, that the Supreme Court was becoming crowded and the judges could not dispose of the business; and when questioned upon it he was compelled to say that there was but one cause in that court under this law.

Of course it has attracted the attention of other Senators as well as my own that the Senator from Nevada recently has become over zealous; at least, very zealous. I will not say over zealous, because he is the judge of the degree of the zeal with which he should serve his party. It is not for me to say that it is over zeal. But a very striking contrast is to be found in his position politically to-day and this day two years ago. Then he thought the President of the United States was right; that it was right for him to support him, to stand by him, to maintain his policy.

Now, there is no Senator that can go quite far enough in the opposite direction to please the Senator from Nevada. He felt that he was the champion of his party in this body, and therefore he must lead off in giving, if possible, some reason why a citizen whose life is in danger, and cries to his Government for protection under the Constitution, should not be heard in the highest court; and the reason he gave to us is most unsatisfactory in principle and untrue in point of fact, as he admits. There is but one cause under this law pending in the court. Is it not right in the cause of liberty, the protection of a man in the enjoyment of his person and his life, that we should allow the appeal? In one provision this bill is most extraordinary. It is not that in the future there shall be no such appeals allowed; but if there are any causes pending there now the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court shall be taken away. So the bill relates to just one case. The Senator from Nevada admitted that he knew of but one case. He said he had heard of some other cases—they are lying around loose—that are likely to come. He could not name them, nor tell where they came from. Then there was but one case in the Supreme Court, the McCordle case, and special legislation is invoked to throw it out.

As I observe that the Senator from Nevada has taken his seat again, I wish to suggest to him that I have been commenting upon the reason which he felt called upon to give to the Senate why this law should be repealed; why a man should not have a right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, if he claimed his liberty or his life under the Constitution of the United States, or any law or treaty of the United States Government; and that reason assigned by him was that the Supreme Court was becoming too much crowded; and when he was crowded himself with a tolerably straight question on the subject he said he knew of but one case in the Supreme Court. I was calling attention to that fact, and I wish him to know exactly the use I made of it. It is this: that he, the zealous champion of his party, who would claim to be the leader; more zealous than all others in every party question; more intolerant of the rest of us who may differ with him, although but two years ago he occupied a very different position, now, as the leader of his party in this body, he felt called upon to give a reason why a citizen should be denied an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, when he was likely to lose his liberty or life by a tribunal unknown to the Constitution, and a tribunal—a military commission—upon which the Supreme Court of the United States has impressed the brand of illegality. The Senator felt that he must give a reason; and that reason was that the Supreme Court was too much crowded. I felt it to be my duty to say that that would be no reason if the case was of such dignity as that it ought to come to the Supreme Court. It is not a question whether the judges will have too much work to do; it is a question whether the party shall have his rights under the Constitution and the law. But the fact is that the court is not overcrowded.

This brings me to comment a little upon the peculiarity of this section in one regard. It not only denies to the Supreme Court jurisdiction in all future cases, but takes away the jurisdiction in the single case that the Senator from Nevada was able to recollect—the McCordle case. Will Senators be good enough to recollect of a single instance in the history of any free Government where, for proper purposes, the jurisdiction of an appellate court has been taken away from a cause after that jurisdiction had attached? I do not mean the criminal courts, where jurisdiction sometimes falls by the repeal of the law defining the crime, but I speak of an appellate court of important jurisdiction, before which a case has come, and the jurisdiction of which has attached under existing law. When in the history of this Government or of any State of this Union was that jurisdiction expressly taken away? I know of no such case. It is understood that when the law gives a man a right to bring his case into a court he shall have that cause heard; that the Legislature will not come in after he has brought his case according to law and take away the right to prosecute the case to a final hearing.

But it is done here; and why? It is to reach the McCordle case. I do not know very much of that cause; I had not the opportunity to hear very much of the able argument in the Supreme Court; but I understand the facts to be these: McCordle was the publisher of a newspaper in the State of Mississippi, and in the publication of his paper he felt authorized to make criticisms upon the policy Congress had established in his State, and he felt authorized to make criticisms upon the conduct of the military officers who were carrying out this congressional policy in Mississippi, and the military officers caused him to be arrested and to be brought before a military commission to be put upon trial. At that stage of the case he appealed to the circuit court of the United States for that State for the writ of habeas corpus. The writ was issued, and when the officer returned to the court that this man was held in custody because he had published these articles in his newspaper, the circuit court held that return to be sufficient, and that the party should be remanded to the custody of the military officers. From that decision McCordle appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States. Sir, why should he not be heard in that court? Had not the Supreme Court of the United States, with great unanimity, decided that a military commission could not try a citizen in a time of peace for an ordinary civil offense; that the Constitution had guaranteed to the citizen a trial before a jury with full opportunities for defense? That was the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, and McCordle, when he was sent back by the circuit court to the dungeons of the military prison, prayed his appeal to the Supreme Court that he might come under the protecting wing of that court in its decision that the civil authority should be preserved in this country. That is the case that came to the Supreme Court. I understood the Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] to say that that case did not come within the provision of the act of the 5th of February, 1867, but that the right to issue the writ might well rest upon the act of 1789, and I think he occupied the same position in support of his motion in the court. Let us see how it stands.

McCordle claimed that he was a citizen; that he was not in the Army or the Navy; that he was not answerable to a military court; that a military court could not deprive him of his liberty, but that if responsible at all for any abuse of the right of freedom of speech and freedom of the press in the publication of his newspaper he was answerable to the civil courts; if he was liable to prosecution for libel at all he was so liable in the civil courts. This was the position he occupied: that his liberty was denied him when that liberty was guaranteed under the Constitution. I submit to Senators if it is not very plain that he was right in that. When he said to the circuit court of the United States in Mississippi "My liberty has been taken from me by parties that have no right, no lawful authority to deprive me of it, and I appeal to you for the writ of habeas corpus," was his appeal not made squarely upon the Constitution of the country? I should suppose that in that court he read this provision of the Constitution when he laid his application upon the bench and asked for the high writ to protect him:

"The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury, and such trial shall be held in the State where the said crimes shall have been committed; but when not committed within any State the trial shall be at such place or places as the Congress may by law direct."

When he said to the court, "I have been arrested; I have been taken on a charge of publishing improper matter in my newspaper before a military commission; I ask you to protect me under this provision of the Constitution which says that if I have committed a crime I shall be tried by a jury," how would any Senator have answered him? When he took that position before the circuit court was he not bringing his case directly within the act of last year? Was he not claiming that his liberty had been taken from him "in violation of the Constitution?" The law is, that if he makes his claim that his liberty is taken from him in violation of any provision of the Constitution of the United States his case shall be heard. Then, sir, had he not, to say the least of it, a reasonable ground to say to the court, "My liberty is wrongfully withheld from me, because if I am guilty of a crime I am entitled to a trial before a jury."

Again, sir, it is possible that he read to the court this provision of the Constitution:

"In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law; and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense."

Reading that provision of the Constitution, he would say to the court, "My petition is based upon the law of 1867, because I claim that my liberty is withheld from me in violation of the Constitution." And now, Senators, conceding that McCardle did publish libelous matter in his newspaper; that because of that libelous matter he was liable to punishment under the laws of Mississippi, is it not plain that for that crime he must be tried before a jury? Will Senators be good enough to refer to any law of the United States punishing a man for the publication of libelous matter in a newspaper? What law has been offended by McCardle? If he did in unbecoming language criticize the policy of Congress; if he did unfairly and unjustly criticize the conduct of the military officers in Mississippi, and did wrong in this, what was the crime? What crime, under the laws of the land, did he commit? It cannot be more than a libel; and for the publication of a libel by a citizen in a time of peace the Supreme Court, in plain words, says that he shall be tried only according to the provisions of the Constitution.

Then, sir, McCardle claims that he should be heard in the Supreme Court of the United States. A year ago you said this was right; a year ago you said exactly as Congress had said in 1842, that there ought to be an appeal to the Supreme Court if a man's liberty was denied him in violation of the Constitution of the United States. Is it not monstrous, Mr. President, that you are not now willing to give that appeal? The language of the law is peculiar and forcible, that if a man is denied his liberty in violation of the Constitution he may go to the Supreme Court to assert that constitutional right. If a foreigner, as you now propose the law, shall be denied his liberty when he claims that it is withheld in violation of some regulation, authority, or commission which he receives from a foreign country, consistent with the laws of nations, you say he shall be heard in the Supreme Court; but if a citizen of the State of Indiana should go into Mississippi, and, feeling that he was a freeman, should criticize the conduct of Congress; should express the opinion, most vehemently, if you please, that the policy of Congress was hurtful to the country; and if he should go further and say that the military officers in command down there were guilty of cruel and oppressive conduct to the people; that they were guilty of partiality; that they had favored unfair registration of the voters; that they had favored illegal voting and frauds at the elections; if a citizen had said that, and had arraigned the military men at the bar of public opinion for a violation even of your law of March 2, 1867, and he should be arrested by a military officer who took offense at the freedom of his language, and should be taken before a court of whom he knows nothing, he would be put upon trial for what, sir? For no crime defined by the law. He would be tried by no mode of proceeding that is defined by the law; punished according to no sanction of any law; but put upon a trial upon charges that the commanding officer sees fit to declare as containing an offense; tried and punished according to the pleasure of the court. And, in such a case, that citizen of Indiana, sojourning for the time being in one of the southern States, appeals to the Supreme Court for protection; he says "I am entitled to my liberty under the Constitution; if this language of mine is the violation of any law let me be tried by a jury;" and when he makes that case you said a year ago, if the court down there decided against him and sent him back to the dungeons of the military prison, he might still have his appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States; and now you take it away from him. Why?

Mr. President, I take it that the reason which the Senator from Nevada assigned yesterday was hastily assigned by him and that it is not the true reason; not the reason upon which he would wish to stand permanently upon a question so grave as this. I know that he would not wish permanently to stand for his defense upon a question like this on the proposition that one case had overcrowded the Supreme Court. He cannot stand there. It is impossible. You have to stand somewhere else. Can you, Senators, stand upon this proposition, that a man's liberty or a man's life is of not sufficient importance to give him an appeal to the highest court of the land? Can you stand upon that? If after the adjournment of Congress my business or pleasure should call me into any of the southern States, and I should express myself very freely in regard to the policy of Congress, as I would if I expressed myself at all; and if I should find any military ruler there oppressing the people or committing frauds at elections or stuffing the ballot-boxes, or giving a preference of one class of voters over another with a view to political ends, and if my indignation should be aroused, as it ought to be, by such sights, and I should denounce it as a freeman ought to denounce corruption everywhere, and that military man should arrest me and take me before twelve of his officers that are bound to obey his command, organized into a military commission not for the purpose of administering the law, but for the purpose of convicting and punishing, and I should raise my voice to be heard in the Supreme Court of the nation, and claim that it is under the Constitution that I am to be free, and that it is in violation of the Constitution that my liberty is restrained, would any Senator say that I ought not to be heard? If my speech were ever so intemperate, would you not say that I should be heard in the Supreme Court upon the great question of liberty?

Why, sir, upon liberty it is understood that a whole nation will involve itself in war. For the liberty of the citizen, that he shall be safe in his rights, that he shall be safe in his rights as defined by law, a free people will go to every length and risk everything. But when I ask under the Constitution that I shall take my case to the Supreme Court of the United States, and your law says I may do it, and then when I get it into the Supreme Court you come to the conclusion that it may bring up some question of the validity of your legislation, and although by repealing the law you send me back to a military dungeon, you will send me back rather than allow the high court of the land to pass upon your legislation! Do you, Senators, expect the people of this country to say that is right? I say to you they will not do it. In the hour of passion they may; but they will come back to the great doctrines of the fathers, that he who is tried, being a citizen, and not connected with the Army or the Navy, shall be tried by his peers according to the forms prescribed by law, and shall be punished according to the sanctions of law.

Why is this, Mr. President? Why is it that you are not willing that the Supreme Court of the United States shall pass upon the legislation of last year? More than one half the people of the United States deny the constitutionality of your legislation; more than one half the people of the United States believe it to be clearly in the face of the Constitution; more than one half the people deny that you can establish in one third of this country a military despotism. You talk about "all the people of the United States!" In the North alone there are one million eight hundred thousand voters that have expressed their opinion on this subject. Then, sir, you say you are right, but you will not let it be tested. That is brave, to say the least of it! Why, I know I am right. The legislation of the 2d of March, 1867, places ten States under military government, places eight million white people under a rule unknown to our Constitution and laws, which establishes a system of government more odious, in my judgment, than Austria established over Hungary when she sent the monster Haynau there to whip the women in the streets, and you say that that can be done and you will not let it go before the Supreme Court!

For what purpose has the Supreme Court of the United States been established? It is provided for in the Constitution that the Supreme Court shall decide questions that properly come before it, questions of law. Shall that court not decide questions of constitutional law? Who is prepared to say that the Supreme Court ought not to pass upon the constitutionality of your legislation? It is impossible that it should be otherwise. If it be a court at all, and the case come before it, the Supreme Court must decide what is the law in that case.

Now, Mr. President, let us take the McCardle case in one other view. That case is between McCardle and a military officer. McCardle comes into court and says, "I ought to be free, because the Constitution of the United States says I ought to be free." The military officer comes into the same court and says, "You ought not to be free, because the Congress of the United States, on the 2d of March, 1867, authorized me to take you into custody and hold you." Does not the question at once come up: which is right and which wrong? The one man claims his liberty under the provisions of the Constitution, the other man claims the right to hold him in custody and in servitude under the language of an act of Congress; and if that case comes into the circuit court of the United States must not the circuit court decide which is the law; and if it comes to the Supreme Court of the United States must not that court decide which is the law? They cannot both be the law; that is certain. It cannot be that the law of the Constitution is in force which says that a man shall be tried by a jury, and another law at the same time in force which says he may be tried by a military commission. They do not both stand at the same time. In the nature of things it is not possible, and it is no use to pretend it. The truth of the business is that Mr. THADDEUS STEVENS was right when he said that of necessity your legislation was outside of the Constitution.

Then, if you take his theory, McCardle comes into court and says: "I am within the Constitution, whether your legislation is outside of it or not; I have never gone out; I claim the protection of the Constitution; with all my sins, with all my faults upon me, I claim the protection of the Constitution; that is the law I stand upon." The military officer says: "When I claim to hold you in custody; when I put you down into the dark dungeon of a military prison; when I lead you to the scaffold; when I order out a platoon of soldiers to shoot you dead, I stand upon the law prescribed to me by Congress." When that case comes to the Supreme Court must not the Supreme Court of necessity decide whether the military man stands upon the law or McCardle stands upon the law? It must be. In the nature of courts it must be so, that when it comes to act upon a case the court shall decide what is the law; and the Constitution declares itself to be the supreme law of the land. It has been so recognized hitherto. There can be no law superior to it; it cannot be overridden by any law.

Then, Mr. President, you propose, in regard to most important measures, to strike down the judiciary of the country. That has been pretty effectually done already in regard to the Executive. I do not see that the executive department amounts to anything any more. It is very innocent now, in my opinion. In three short years the powers of the executive and of the legislative departments of this Government have come into the same hands and under the control of the same body of men. The next step is to strike down the judiciary. Do that, and then all the powers of the Government are in the hands of one body.

It cannot be, Mr. President, that brave Senators are afraid of the decision of the Supreme Court. That is impossible. How is the Supreme Court organized? Will you be pleased to tell me? You did claim to the country that the administration of Mr. Lincoln was entitled to its confidence; and are there not five judges out of eight whom Mr. Lincoln appointed and whom you confirmed, and at the head is there not Chief Justice Chase, distinguished as a party leader?

Then, Mr. President, with a Supreme Court, five out of eight appointed by Mr. Lincoln himself, and confirmed by these honorable Senators that I am addressing, and only three of the old court left, you say you cannot afford to risk this question before that court. Why? Let that question be answered—why? McCardle must go out of court; he must go back and be handed over to a military commission, without the possibility, in the highest court of the land, of ascertaining his rights under the Constitution, rather than allow this question to go before the Supreme Court of your own organization; that court shall not be allowed to pass upon a question involving the liberty of the citizen when he claims that liberty under the Constitution of the United States!

This, Mr. President, is brave legislation! When I vote for a law I expect that law to undergo all the tests that the Constitution contemplates. Does not the Constitution contemplate that all legislation shall undergo the test of the Supreme Court of the United States? Marshall thought so; Taney thought so. I cite the lights of the law. Marshall, probably the greatest jurist our country has produced, freely discussed all constitutional questions, and contributed more to establish the meaning and proper construction of the Constitution than any other man of the country.

Then, sir, whether the Constitution or an act of Congress is the law of a particular case, you will not allow the Supreme Court of the United States to decide. Why? With five judges out of eight of your own appointment, why not? I say, before the country and the world, it is an admission that your legislation will not stand the test of judicial examination. If the Supreme Court of the United States, as now organized, shall decide that you have the power under the Constitution to establish five military governments in the South, to place the men, women, children, property of the ten southern States under the control of an irresponsible military power, to strip these States of civil government, I shall bow in obedience to that decision, because it is made by the tribunal which our fathers established for the settlement of such questions. But, sir, you need not expect that this country will be satisfied when you force upon it a species of legislation that you are unwilling shall go before the highest court of the land, especially when you are unwilling that it shall undergo the test of the judges Mr. Lincoln himself appointed.

Mr. President, I have said about all that I feel it necessary for me to say on this subject. I regard it as very serious when we propose to strip any one of the departments of the Government of its legitimate power with a view to our exercising power without restraint. I believe the safety of the people, the liberty of the people, requires that one department of the Government shall be a check upon the other; that the legislative shall check the executive, and that the judiciary shall check both the legislative and the executive within the sphere allowed by the Constitution.

Now, sir, if it be necessary for party ends to legislate in a particular way, Senators have got to decide upon that for themselves. I shall not vote for any law with a view to party ends. I intend upon this important legislation to vote according to the dictates of my conscience. I think I may add that political capital is not made by special and unfair legislation. We know very well what all this means. We know that the Senators who have allowed the act of 1842 to remain unrepealed, who now propose to let it remain upon the statute-book, and give the foreigner an appeal to the Supreme Court where he claims his liberty under some authority of his foreign Government, cannot possibly believe that a man ought not to have an appeal to the Supreme Court when he claims his liberty or his life under the Constitution of the United States as a citizen of the country.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I do not desire to prolong this discussion or occupy the time which all would prefer to see occupied by the opposite side. They have a very hard case to make out, and I am desirous that they should have all the time practicable in which to make it out. They are attempting to show by some kind of excitement, I know not exactly how, that it is a great outrage, on the part of this Congress, to repeal a law which was passed a year ago. According to them, this repeal violates not only the Constitution, but every principle of civil government; and the rights of man appear to be involved in this bill. It seems that the people, for three quarters of a century of the existence of this Government, did not have that recourse to the Supreme Court of the United States which is now said to be absolutely necessary for some purpose. It is a proposition which, it seems to me, gentlemen on the other side should have all the time to argue, and I do not think that we on this side should consume very much time. Inasmuch, however, as special allusion has been made to me, I may, perhaps, be pardoned for making a few remarks. I do not intend to occupy any time in defending myself personally; but as the Senator from Indiana seems to think that, because I was slow to believe that our party was betrayed by Mr. Johnson, I should, therefore, keep silence now, I beg to differ from him. If he thinks that is a very good reason he can enforce it as strongly as he pleases.

It is alleged that there is one McCardle to be influenced by returning to the former practice with regard to the courts, returning to the law as it stood for three quarters of a century; that there is one man by the name of McCardle to be injured thereby, to be deprived of some rights. I do not exactly understand how it is that he is to be specially injured. I know that there is a McCardle case that has been talked about. It is simply this, as I have seen it stated in the newspapers: one McCardle undertook to revive the disloyal spirit in Mississippi, where the military is in charge; he was arrested and taken before the military authorities, and he applied to the circuit court for a habeas corpus. The court denied the habeas corpus, but let him go on bail, and he brings that up to the Supreme Court of the United States; and the question is whether he shall be exonerated and allowed to go on with his little six-by-nine sheet, revive the drooping spirit of disloyalty in the South, say all the disagreeable things he pleases, or whether he shall be deprived of that luxury of stimulating disloyalty. His case is brought before the Supreme Court, and the public business of that court, as I understand, was set aside; the calendar, with two or three hundred cases upon it, was stopped to hear arguments about advancing his case for the accommodation of Mr. McCardle, so that he could go on with his little paper and encourage the rebels to resist the reconstruction laws of Congress. The Supreme Court laid aside all their grave business, all the suits of parties that were brought up in the regular way, to hear Mr. McCardle's case, although he was on bail and was not suffering nearly as much as many of the persons who were involved in litigation before the court, who had everything at stake, while he had nothing at stake, but brought up a mere question of punctilio.

He was not restrained of his liberty; there was no pressing necessity that the court should throw aside all other business to consider his case. It was brought up, however, and a day assigned for arguing the question whether this private case should be advanced to the exclusion of other business. Litigants in that court felt it to be very oppressive that a case of this character should be advanced, postponing their causes; but the court, it seems, regarded it as its duty to advance the cause. The court advanced it and a long time was spent in arguing it to the exclusion of other business, and I believe the court now has on its calendar a larger number of cases than it had at the commencement of the term, during which it has been occupied in hearing advanced cases.

I remarked very innocently yesterday that the Supreme Court was so much overburdened with business that it was certainly politic to pass this bill, because the workings of the law proposed to be repealed thus far had shown that it interfered with the ordinary business of the country, with the ordinary business of litigants in the Supreme Court, postponed their rights to allow the court to give exclusive attention to such matters as this McCardle case.

Mr. President, we are charged with being afraid of the Supreme Court. I tell the Senator from Indiana we are not afraid of the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court has no power to interfere with the question of reconstruction. It has no power to determine the status of the southern States. The Supreme Court under the Constitution only has power to decide cases, and it must receive the law from the law-making power. We know it has no power to injure us. The policy of making the Supreme Court supreme dictator and giving it a will is a policy which, if it could be carried out to the entire satisfaction of the Democratic party, would soon subvert this Government. The Supreme Court, I say, can decide cases, but it has no will, no policy; it must follow the law-making power of the Government.

We are not afraid of it. If it goes outside of a case before it and sets up its will and issues proclamations we are no more bound by those proclamations than we should be by the proclamations of any other body of men acting outside of their jurisdiction. We have no right to presume that the Supreme Court will, in this or any other case, attempt to establish a policy in violation of the best interests of this country.

The Senator from Wisconsin remarked yesterday that we knew the Supreme Court would decide this case against us. We cannot know that; and no man dare believe that that court intends to lend its sanction to a violation of the Constitution or a usurpation of power. The question of making war or determining the political status of a State is as much beyond the power of the Supreme Court as it is beyond the power of the humblest individual. Sir, we are not afraid of the Supreme Court; but it is true that in the case referred to parties have been laboring that court to get it to legislate on questions with which it has nothing to do, to get it to establish a policy, to get it to determine when the war closed. It is true there has been a long argument there, which we complain of, occupying the time of that court; and we see now that it is perfectly right that we should return to our original policy in regard to that court, under which the country had lived for more than three quarters of a century.

When gentlemen say that we know that the Supreme Court is to take up our reconstruction measures and decide them to be unconstitutional, I answer that we have no means of knowing so; on the contrary, the presumption is that they would not; the presumption is that the Supreme Court would be bound by the law, and I think if we know anything we know that the law is with us.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to inquire of the honorable Senator from Nevada if he is able to furnish the information upon what ground it is that McCardle was apprehended, and what was the nature of the offense with which he was charged? I am not very well posted in that extremely important matter, and I should like to have the information.

Mr. STEWART. I am unable to give the precise statement of the facts, although I have a general impression in regard to them.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I can inform the Senator from Michigan that he was arrested for a breach of the peace or an attempt to violate the peace, and for inciting insurrection in Mississippi. Those were the charges against him.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I inquire of the Senator from Oregon if the only charge against him was not founded on matter published in his newspaper?

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is true; but the articles in his newspaper were intended to produce resistance to law, and incite insurrection among the people against the authorities of the United States in Mississippi. That was the direct object of these publications.

Mr. HOWARD. Has the Senator from Oregon the newspaper article?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish it might be read for our general information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The Senator from Nevada is entitled to the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was about to ask the honorable member from Nevada to allow me to answer the inquiry of the honorable member from Michigan. I am familiar with the decision which the court has pronounced on the motion to dismiss the appeal; and the grounds upon which the arrest was made are stated by the Chief Justice in the opinion as taken from the return of the military officer in whose custody the relator was. There are four grounds: the first is disturbing the public peace; the second is exciting to insurrection; the third is libeling General Ord; and the fourth is preventing the reconstruction acts being carried out.

Mr. STEWART. I thank the Senator from Maryland for stating the charges. Then it appears that Mr. McCardle was engaged in the obstruction of the reconstruction laws. He appears to be admitted on all hands to have been a rebel, and that may account to some extent for the sympathy for him in certain quarters—I do not mean, of course, on the part of the Senator from Indiana—but it may account for the sympathy of others; for instance, of such men as Jeff. Davis. It could not certainly account for the sympathy of any Senator on this floor. I regard the Senator from Indiana as a loyal man, and I do not presume that he could have any sympathy with characters of that kind. It is altogether probable that the Senator from Indiana, who dwelt a few moments ago so eloquently upon the case, was laboring under the impression that he was really talking for an oppressed individual, some party who had been denied his liberty. One would suppose at the time he was raging against the outrage Congress was committing in denying McCardle the privilege of monopolizing the Supreme Court for this term, and for the next term, and for all time, to the exclusion of public business—McCardle and others who wish to bring their grievances before that court in the shape of writs of habeas corpus against the military who are endeavoring to restrain them from stirring up insurrection—he supposed this man had suffered great hardships, and that something very wrong was done, and for that reason we should not return to the ancient practice of the country.

Now, I have no sympathy for McCardle and I do not think McCardle will suffer. The only question is whether this is a proper bill to pass, whether the law of 1867 as it stood would work any good. In deciding on such questions we are always governed by the light of experience. When we find on our statute-book a law which has accomplished no good result, and which we think there are good reasons for repealing, it is certainly very proper to repeal it. This law is undoubtedly made use of as one of the weapons by which the Democratic party seek to get their political questions before the Supreme Court. I do not believe there is a man in the United States who thinks McCardle would be affected, substantially, one way or the other. The case is brought up here, not for the sake of liberty, but for the purpose of subserving political ends.

McCardle is on bail; he is not imprisoned. Who knows but that his whole case is collusive all the way through? No hardship is shown. The only hardship I can see is to litigants, who are denied justice at the hands of the court while the Democratic party are allowed to parade their political theories in that forum; and I say that if any legislation furnishes a pretext or excuse for dragging that high tribunal into the political arena it ought to be repealed. I want that tribunal preserved to the people. I do not wish to see the judicial ermine dragged into political contests. If McCardle gets any relief in that court it will be because rebels have the right to dictate the terms of reconstruction and there is no power in this Government to secure the fruits of victory; it will be predicated upon the right of the conquered to dictate terms to the conqueror; and therefore we have no right to presume that the Supreme Court will adopt any such rule. We have no right to presume that the Supreme Court will say that the rebel States are still, and have been all the time, States of the Union. We have no right to presume that the court will act upon any such theory; but still we desire to relieve them from further trouble in this direction; we desire to give litigants an opportunity to have their cases heard; we do not desire to have McCardle or any one else stir up insurrection in the South and attempt to get the Supreme Court to command our armies.

If the Supreme Court has jurisdiction of this matter of war and of reconstruction why did it not begin before? If it could say when the war should terminate or when it had terminated why did it not begin before? Why did it not issue an injunction and stop the firing upon Fort Sumter? Why did it not declare after the battle of Antietam that peace had come? Why did it not declare at the time of the surrender of Lee that peace had come? Why did it let Mr. Johnson go on with his military establishment until the passage of the reconstruction acts? for he did continue to exercise military authority all that time. It is a late day for the court to interfere now. If it had jurisdiction it should have stopped the waste of blood, the waste of treasure, the sacrifice of blood and life in the war. The mere statement of the proposition that that court is to determine when the military power shall cease and when the civil tribunals shall have control shows that it has nothing to do with it; and if the act now on the statute-book can be construed to make military chieftains of the members of the Supreme Court, and have them control our armies in that country which remains still unreconstructed—if it can be construed in that way, and their time is to be thus occupied, there is no public reason why the act should not be repealed; and the private reason, so far as McCardle is concerned, the less it is investigated, so far as that rebel is concerned, the better the whole case will appear for the Opposition.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, in what I am about to say I shall not be under the influence of any feeling; nor shall I deem it necessary to vindicate the Supreme Court against what I am forced to call the reckless charges of the honorable member from Nevada, [Mr. STEWART:] but before I proceed to examine what the Supreme Court have done in relation to the case to which the honorable member has referred I deem it advisable to understand exactly what the question before the Senate is.

The Constitution of the United States provides that "the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended unless when, in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it." The Supreme Court of the United States decided unanimously, in what was known as the Milligan case, that at the termination of the war there was no authority to establish anywhere within the limits of the United States military commissions for the purpose of trying any person who did not belong to the Army or the Navy in some relation or other. The difference between the judges in that case was not upon that point at all. They held, all of them, that as the law then stood, under the act of Congress which had been passed at that time, there was no authority to try by military commission a citizen not connected with the Army in the State of Indiana.

A majority of the judges held that in time of war, when the courts of the United States were open and the State courts were open, where the war had not in point of fact made its appearance, Congress had no power by law to provide for the trial of offenses committed by civilians. The Chief Justice and two of the judges who concurred with him held that in a time of war the States, all of them, might be in such a situation that Congress could, under the war powers, authorize the trial of civilians by military commission; but all of the judges, as I have just stated, concurred in holding, and none in more positive terms than the eminent man who stands now at the head of that tribunal, that when the war was ended, when peace prevailed, the Constitution of the United States was at once reinstated all over the country, and that that inhibited the trial of civilians by military commission, they being entitled to the protection which the Constitution of the United States, in the trial of offenses, guarantees to the alleged offender.

Mr. President, the war ended in April, 1865. Then we had a problem to solve. Many of the officers of the Army and many of those employed by the Government that were not officers of the Army, including Cabinet ministers and including, perhaps, the President himself, had done acts which the State courts might hold, and some of the circuit courts of the United States might hold, were unauthorized by the Constitution; and that they therefore might be liable in damages at the suit of the persons who might have been aggrieved. I thought, as I believe every member of the Judiciary Committee thought, that there ought to be a law to provide that cases of that description should be brought to the Supreme Court of the United States, and that for that purpose, when such cases were instituted in the State courts, the officer or the agent of the Government sued should have the privilege upon application of having his case removed into the circuit court of the United States in the district where he was sued, and that it might finally come to the Supreme Court for adjudication. All consented that that was the best and the only constitutional mode of settling the supposed difficulty, terminating such controversies, ascertaining what were the rights of the officers who had acted under the authority of the Government during the war, and whether it was in the power of Congress to provide that they should not be responsible for anything that they did under the authority of the United States. How was that to be accomplished?

The honorable member from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] told the Senate yesterday very correctly that that was almost the entire design of the act of February 5, 1867. It was to protect the officers of the Government from being responsible to harassing suits or suits that might destroy them in point of fact and by the heavy damages that might be awarded by juries in the several States, and to ascertain (with a view to their protection and the protection of the Government) what were the powers of the Government under the Constitution, situated as the Government was during the pendency of the civil war, that there should be upon the statute-book some mode by which such cases should be brought by writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator will allow me to say that he certainly misunderstood me.

Mr. JOHNSON. I only judge by the report. I had not the pleasure to hear the honorable member.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I did not understand that the law of February 5, 1867, if the Senator is alluding to that, was intended to protect the officers of the United States against suits growing out of the war. I thought it was designed to protect persons from oppression under State laws who had been made free by the Constitution of the United States. I supposed the chief object was to protect the colored people of the South.

Mr. JOHNSON. That, I know, Mr. President, was one of the objects; but it was necessary to make the law comprehensive, and it therefore covers all cases in which any man entitled to any right under the Constitution and laws of the United States, or who claimed to be entitled to any right under either, should have the decision of that question brought by appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I dislike to interrupt my friend from Maryland, but I must say that that was the object of the indemnity act. This act of February 5, 1867, does not provide at all for taking up suits for damages.

Mr. JOHNSON. I know that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It only provides for habeas corpus cases.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understand that; and I will come to it in a moment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is another act that protects officers against suits.

Mr. JOHNSON. That I understand very well. Now, Mr. President, we found in 1867, in February, that our agents might be subjected to annoyance, they might be arrested, the State courts might attempt to punish them; and, in order to give them as full protection as could be afforded, Congress, supposing that it had the power to go to that extent, provided that in all such cases an application might be made to any judge of the United States or to any court of the United States for the writ of habeas corpus, and then went on to provide that the party might appeal, if denied it, to the circuit court of the United States, and that there might be an appeal from the decision of the circuit court to the Supreme Court of the United States. That is the state of the law now. It is under the provisions of that act that the case named in the debate occurred. I do not know who the man is, whether he was a rebel or not; but he was an American citizen, and just as much entitled to the protection of the Constitution of the United States as the honorable member from Nevada is entitled to it. If he was engaged in rebellion—and I do not know that fact—he lost no right whatever until, if prosecuted for treason against the United States, he had been convicted and judgment had been pronounced upon him.

Then, of course, he would lose all the rights which are forfeited by such a conviction and judgment; but, independent of trial and of judgment, he is entitled to the protection of all the guarantees of personal freedom found in the Constitution; and among others is that of being tried by a jury.

Mr. STEWART. If that be true, were any rights lost by rebellion?

Mr. JOHNSON. Our time is limited, and perhaps the honorable member had better make a supplementary speech when I am done. I prefer to go on. Now, he is arrested; he is a civilian, never has belonged to the Army or the Navy of the United States. He is arrested upon the four charges which I mentioned just now: first, that he is a disturber of the public peace; second, that he is inciting to insurrection; third, that he has libeled one of the generals of the Army of the United States, commanding in the district; and fourth, that he has impeded the execution of the reconstruction acts. Those are all. Whether either of those grounds constitutes a charge for which he could be held responsible involves this inquiry: are the acts of the 2d of March, 1867, constitutional? If they are, perhaps he is responsible; if they are not constitutional, then he is not responsible. How is that question to be decided? It is strictly a judicial inquiry. Nobody can doubt that. The question itself, irrespective of the tribunal by whom it is to be decided, is strictly a judicial one, a legal inquiry; and that being the nature of the inquiry, by what tribunal ought it to be decided? The answer that every man, I think, would be inclined to give, when he came to reflect upon the nature of our institutions, would be that it is to be decided by the courts and not by military men; and to the circuit court he applied for a habeas corpus to be discharged from the arrest under which he was, upon the grounds to which I have just referred. The court refused to discharge him, and he appeals to the Supreme Court.

The first question that arises is, is the right of appeal given in such a case by the act of February 5, 1867? I know that the honorable member from Illinois entertains the opinion, as I see by the report of his remarks yesterday, that the act of 1867 does not authorize an appeal in that particular case, and the ground upon which he places that opinion is that the act of 1867 does not cover the case of a habeas corpus originating in the circuit court, but embraces only cases in that court upon appeal from a district court. Entertaining that opinion, therefore, as the counsel of the Government—and I was glad to see that the Government was so well represented—he made a motion in the Supreme Court to dismiss the case for want of jurisdiction, and argued it in part upon that ground—that the act of 1867, the second section of that act I think it is, which gives the right of appeal in cases of habeas corpus, did not apply to any decision pronounced by a circuit court of the United States unless it was upon an appeal from the district court of the United States. He argued the cause with ability. He referred to the judiciary act of September, 1789, to the act of August, 1842, and to the particular phraseology of the act of February 5, 1867; and, no doubt, thought he had made good his motion; but it failed by the unanimous judgment of that tribunal, the judgment being pronounced by the Chief Justice. The opinion is before me. After a critical examination of the several acts regulating the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in cases of habeas corpus, he says:

"We entertain no doubt that an appeal in this case lies."

He repeats the same doctrine in the conclusion of that opinion, saying in the conclusion, "We are satisfied that this court has jurisdiction to inquire into the decision of the circuit court for the Mississippi district." The honorable member from Illinois, as I think—and I speak of it with deference, because I was not concerned in the controversy, and know of it only from the opinion of the Supreme Court on the motion to dismiss—seems to suppose that the court did not hold that it had jurisdiction under the act of 1867, which we are about to repeal. That, if he will permit me to say so, is an utter misapprehension of the opinion which I have read, which, as the Senate must see, is not a hesitating but a positive conclusion that they have jurisdiction to review the decision of the court below. My friend, the honorable member from Illinois, had urged upon them, however, that the circuit court of the United States, from whom the appeal was taken, had no jurisdiction; and the answer that the court gave to that, through the Chief Justice, was that that was a question to be decided when the case came to be heard upon its merits.

In cases of the description which this was made to assume upon the motion of the honorable member there are always two inquiries: first, whether the court has jurisdiction over the case; and second, if they have, how shall they dispose of the case. The court declined to express any opinion upon the objection that the circuit court had no jurisdiction upon the ground that, if upon the hearing of the case upon the merits they came to that conclusion, then they would dismiss the case for the want of jurisdiction.

There was another objection, and the court disposed of that in the same way. The honorable member contended that in the latter part of the second section of the act of February, 1867, certain cases are excluded from the operation of that act, such as military offenses, and having been engaged in the rebellion during the war, or giving aid and comfort to the rebels during the war. The court say, and say very properly:

"That is not a question which we can decide now; that will be before us when we hear the case; and if we shall come to the conclusion that McCordie has committed what falls within the class of military offenses we will refuse to interfere."

But I suspect, without knowing, and I only entertain that suspicion because such is the inclination of my own judgment upon the subject, that the words "military offenses," as found in that section, mean military offenses in the technical meaning, or, in the general understanding of the term, offenses committed by the military—those who are in the naval service or in the Army of the United States.

Then, in relation to the other objection, that the party is not to be entitled to the benefit of the act upon the ground that he had been engaged in the rebellion or given aid and comfort to the enemy, the answer was obvious, and might, therefore, have been given by the court, that the return of the officer placed the arrest upon no such ground. The law was passed upon the 5th of February, 1867. The arrest was made in November, 1867—several months after the passage of the act and the war was over; and, as the words are there used, he could not have fallen under that denomination. But it is immaterial to inquire strictly into that, because, in point of fact, he was not held upon any such ground. He was arrested and detained upon the ground alone that he had committed the offenses specifically stated in the return, and nothing else.

Now, Mr. President, does anybody doubt—will my friend from Illinois doubt when he reads the opinion of the court upon the motion to dismiss more carefully than I cannot help thinking he has already read it—can anybody doubt that the court will entertain jurisdiction over the case? They say they will; and they say they will, not by virtue of the act of 1789, not by virtue of the act of August, 1842, but by virtue of the act of February 5, 1867. I can entertain no such doubt. I have great confidence in the ability of the Chief Justice of that court in making his judgments clear to the understanding of the reader; and if he means, and if the judges who concurred with him, and they all concurred, mean, what the opinion as delivered by him states, then the case is now before the court under the authority of the act of February 5, 1867, and will be decided if that act is not interfered with.

Mr. President, I never call in question the motives of Senators, particularly of gentlemen for whom I have a great personal esteem; but they will pardon me for saying that I very greatly regret that the bill now upon your table should have been passed as it was. That it was not understood by those who, there was every reason to believe, would have opposed it is manifest. That the purpose was not at all to be collected from the title is manifest. That it was not to be collected from the bill in which it was inserted in the House, as that bill passed the Senate, is manifest. What was that bill? What did the Senate do? On the 11th of March, 1868, there was reported from one of our committees the bill exactly in the shape in which it passed the Senate. What was its object? To obtain the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States upon all questions affecting the revenue of the United States, irrespective of the amount involved in each controversy. Nobody could object to that. It was to the interest of the Government that all such questions should be carried to the Supreme Court of the United States, in order that uniformity of rule should be established, so important for the successful collection of the revenue and the quiet of the country, that importers should know, that those who were called upon to pay internal taxes should know what were the rights of the United States upon the one hand and what the obligation of the citizen upon the other; and the bill passed unanimously.

It was at once sent over to the House of Representatives. On the 12th of March a motion was made to take it from the table, and it was so done, the character of the bill being evident from its title. As soon as it was taken from the table and was under the consideration of the House, this amendment to it was proposed and adopted without explanation or debate. I will not say that the object was to conceal the purpose of those who were not in the secret. That would not be parliamentary; but the effect was to conceal it. Nobody can doubt that. That it would not have passed without debate if its character had been known nobody can for a moment question. The amendment came to this Chamber. No explanation was given of it here. It was passed here; I do not know that it was without inquiry. I did not happen to be in the Chamber, being in the Supreme Court at the time. It was passed here, however, without explanation. I of course do not charge any designed concealment upon any member of the Senate, especially the honorable member from Oregon, who had the bill specially in charge; but I repeat that the effect was concealment when there should have been, as I think, disclosure; for it is not to be assumed that bills of this description are to be passed or to be rejected upon party grounds. It does not comport with the character of the Senate to imagine that any such motive would actuate anybody at any time to be found in this Chamber. It is to be presumed, therefore, that it was passed upon public ground; and upon that assumption it ought to have been explained, because for aught that those who are now in favor of the bill and who voted for the bill before can know to the contrary a debate upon the question might have led to a different result.

Mr. President, it is true, and it is one of the defects of the Constitution, though not a defect in the palmiest days of the Government, that the third article of the Constitution does not provide in itself for the courts who are to exercise the judicial power there enumerated. Congress, it was assumed, would establish the courts. Above all, it was assumed that Congress would establish a Supreme Court, that being almost the command of the Constitution, and it was a command carried out, coeval with the organization of the body. It dates back to the first Congress held under the Constitution. Now, what is its jurisdiction. The moment you see the extent of its jurisdiction, you cannot fail to see what were the motives that led the members of the convention to organize such a department as one of the constitutional departments of the Government. It is to have jurisdiction in "all cases of law or equity arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States and treaties," &c.—"all cases." For the same reason that the convention assumed, as a clear duty upon the part of Congress, the organization of a Supreme Court and such inferior courts as might be found to be necessary, did they assume that it would be authorized to examine into all cases involving the Constitution and laws of the United States, which could, without any great inconvenience to the public, be brought by a writ of error or appeal to that tribunal, for that was the purpose of the provision.

It may be, Mr. President, in these latter days of what my friend from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] called, a few weeks ago, political and constitutional education, under which we are improving, that we have adopted the opinion, or are coming to the conclusion that an institution of that sort is not at all necessary for the protection of the Government, the States, and the people. Sir, it will be a sad day when we act upon any such opinion. I do not think I am in error when I say that but for the existence of that department of the Government, and but for its peculiar jurisdiction to examine into all cases arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States, the Government would have ended long since. First, the States would have been legislating to the injury of the Government; second, Congress might be found legislating in the same direction; and thirdly, the Executive might be found trespassing beyond the limits of his authority and trampling upon the rights of the States or the people of the States, and seeking to trample upon the constitutional authority of Congress. But all have so far been kept within their constitutional orbits through the instrumentality of this great, and especially great because of its being a peaceful tribunal, having no power except that which reason gives; having no voice except that which speaks the law; no authority whatever; and placed beyond the temptation which in other departments of the Government political aspirations may create. It may from time to time be less able than at other periods; but he who charges that a court, constituted as that court is, can be governed in its determinations by any corrupt motives or political motives, charges upon our people an incapacity to preserve a Government like ours.

The honorable member from Nevada has told us in his peculiar style of oratory that he is unwilling to trust political questions to the judges of the Supreme Court; he is unwilling that they should become military chieftains and issue their orders to the Army; by injunction restrain the movement of troops; and with that logical precision which belongs to him, he supposes that a case involving the right of a citizen under the Constitution of the United States is a political question of that description.

Mr. STEWART. Is it not the case of a public enemy?

Mr. JOHNSON. No.

Mr. STEWART. Whether he is a public enemy or not—is not that a political question?

Mr. JOHNSON. No; it is not.

Mr. STEWART. Is not the political department to determine who are public enemies?

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not get any additional light from my friend's interruption. I am speaking to the case as it is. Here is a citizen of the United States, whether enemy or not makes no difference, who claims the protection of the Constitution of the United States. If he has forfeited that protection the court to decide that question is the Supreme Court of the United States, if the case can be properly brought before that tribunal. But how are those questions political in the sense in which the honorable member uses the term? All questions, according to his interpretation of it, involving the construction of the Constitution of the United States, are political. So they are, in one sense. They demand an examiation of the Constitution of the United States, and that is a political instrument; but it is an instrument which the law says shall, in the courts, protect the citizen; and when he applies to the court for protection upon the ground that some right secured to him by the Constitution is being invaded, the court is bound to examine whether he is within its protection or not.

The honorable member from Nevada has read, no doubt, the approved commentaries upon our Constitution, such as those of Story and Kent and others, and he therefore knows, professing to speak the sentiments of the entire country, that they hold that without such an institution the Constitution would be a dead letter. What is the honorable member's doctrine practically? Congress is the law-making power; and nobody has a right to question the authority of any laws which they may make. How is it the law-making power? It is clothed with the authority to pass laws upon all the subjects submitted to it by the Constitution, when those laws are not in conflict with the Constitution of the United States. The first question, therefore, that arises when the validity of any law passed by Congress presents itself is, did the Constitution authorize it or prohibit it? If the court, in a case brought before it legitimately between parties, either private parties or between the Government and a party whose right may be assailed, as he supposes, contrary to the Constitution of the United States, finds that the law under which he is held was one which Congress had no authority under the powers vested in them by the Constitution to pass, they have no discretion; they must so hold or violate their duty and their oath.

Mr. President, party cannot carry on a Government if unrestrained. Congress (certainly I mean not to disparage them) are subject to the infirmities of our nature; and if they were left unrestrained by the checks and the balances found in the Constitution of the United States despotism would at an early day be our condition. If the Senate will look at the sixth chapter of the philosophic work of De Tocqueville on Democracy in America they will find that that writer, whose insight into our institutions and into the science of government is remarkable, who seems to have understood us better than any writer of our own has understood us, places the security of our Government and its continuance and the rights of the individual citizen mainly upon the ground that there exists here a Supreme Court of the United States vested with power to decide all conflicting questions. He says:

"Within these limits, the power vested in the American courts of justice of pronouncing a statute to be unconstitutional forms one of the most powerful barriers which has ever been devised against the tyranny of political assemblies."

There are but two modes by which controversies can be settled, as we all know—force and law. Force necessarily leads to destruction. Law, if observed, leads to peace. In the beautiful language of Hooker, "its voice is the harmony of the world stilled into silence. The laws of nature, by any dispensation of their Divine Author, relaxed, and the universe would soon be hurled into atoms and chaos be once again."

A word more, sir, and I shall have done. What will the public ask, what will the world ask, was the motive for this legislation when history comes to record the events of the day. Congress has been passing acts of legislation which were supposed to be questionable; the power to pass them doubted. The President of the United States sought to prevent them by messages containing an argument to demonstrate the want of authority to pass them. Congress passed the act of February 5, 1867, and under that act a case finds its way into the Supreme Court, was argued several days or a week or more prior to the 11th of March, 1868, and rumor had it that it was to be decided. The court had no authority to decide it except by virtue of that act; and the bill repealing it, without original explanation of its purpose, was passed by both Houses in two days. Will not the historian say that those who were engaged in such legislation either knew or apprehended that the highest court in the land would or might hold the laws to be unconstitutional? For he will naturally say to himself, "If they had believed otherwise they would have let the act of 1867 stand, since an authoritative adjudication of that court on such a question would have settled the public mind of the country as to the constitutionality of their legislation." The fact, therefore, of the repeal will be considered as demonstrating that, in the judgment of the majority of Congress, by whom the repeal was effected, they believed that that high court would rule their legislation to be unconstitutional.

I am glad to believe, Mr. President, as I said yesterday, that if this bill becomes a law, notwithstanding the veto of the President, no such decision will be pronounced. But I should be more glad if the bill was not to pass, and the decision was pronounced, no matter what it might be. If it should affirm the validity of the legislation all would be peace. If it should hold it to be invalid because unconstitutional we should know where we were; then all would be peace again if we thereafter kept within the prescribed limits of the Constitution as recognized by the highest judicial tribunal in the country.

Mr. President, it is a dangerous thing to deal with the courts of justice in this suspicious spirit. It is dangerous to suppose that they can be governed by political and party motives. I shall cease almost to hope for the endurance of our Government if that comes to be the prevailing opinion. That tribunal pure in the public estimation and we have nothing to apprehend. The conflicts of the day will soon be forgotten, and those who are to succeed us will, in a few years, reading the adjudications of that tribunal, come, as I think, to the conclusion to which alone a dispassionate reader can come: that to the existence of that tribunal we owe the safety which we have had in the past and the prosperity which we have enjoyed in the past; and that without it we should not have long safety or prosperity in the future.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, it was my intention at the adjournment of the Senate last evening to submit to-day some remarks in support of the views presented by the President of the United States and in opposition to the bill which has once passed this body, and which, I suppose, the exigencies of party will cause to be passed over the President's objections.

Two hundred years ago the British Parliament, to relieve one humble subject from illegal imprisonment, passed the first habeas corpus act. From that day to this, in that country, it has been the bulwark of liberty. And our fathers, who claimed English liberty as their birthright, solemnly declared in the Constitution which they framed that the privileges of that writ should not be suspended except in times of invasion, insurrection, or public danger. In what business is the American Senate engaged to-day? We have been wont to boast that we were the great nation on earth which cherished more than any other nation personal freedom and civil liberty. And yet, in the face of the civilized world, in the face of the English nation which in comparatively dark periods enacted this great charter of civil liberty, we, to reach one single case, and to deny an American citizen the blessings of civil liberty and of personal liberty, are solemnly repealing the act of habeas corpus, and saying that, although a right has been vested in him under existing law to test in your highest legal tribunal the legality or illegality of his imprisonment, he shall not, now that his case has been argued and the court is ready to decide upon the merits of his case, be entitled to the judgment of your highest court.

Sir, we are legislating against liberty, against personal freedom; and I invoke Senators, after they shall have done this deed, never again to let the word fall from their lips that they cherish the personal freedom and the liberty of the American citizen. Go unblushingly and confess before your people and before the world that liberty is enjoyed infinitely better under the model queen than it is in the free Republic of the United States. Make no more Fourth of July harangues to your people. Tell them not what great blessings your fathers achieved for you and for all their posterity by declaring their independence of the British Crown; but rather confess that you, the descendants of the fathers of the Revolution and the men who framed the Constitution, are denying to American citizens in times of peace that liberty which an English king could not deny to his subjects and retain his throne.

Sir, I impute motives to no one; but the charge has been distinctly made by others in this debate that the object of passing this measure is to prevent the Supreme Court of the United States from deciding upon the constitutionality of your action as members of the Congress of the United States. We all know that in the argument of the McCardle case in the Supreme Court the constitutionality of your acts of reconstruction necessarily entered into the discussion. Is it an apprehension, sir, that that court, composed of your political friends, acting in a high judicial capacity, may find it their duty to decide that the action of Congress, in reference to the southern States and the people inhabiting them, is unconstitutional? Sir, when it comes to this, that the legislative power of the country shall assume to itself all authority under this Government, that the executive and judicial departments of the Government are to be stripped of their former authority, and that the will of the legislative department of the Government is to be absolute, then will freedom not only be denied to McCardle, but to every American citizen; and then it will be that, in imitation of the example which the party in power has so far so successfully imitated of the British Parliament when it usurped to itself all authority under the British Government, the liberty of American citizens generally will be no greater, if as much, as the liberty enjoyed by an English subject during the reign of that Parliament.

Mr. President, as this bill was originally reported to the Senate and passed the Senate, it was very simple, very harmless; no one could object to it; and that the country may see distinctly its perfect harmlessness, and why it was that the opponents of the amendment were not looking out and on their guard, I will read the bill as it originally passed the Senate:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That final judgment in any circuit court of the United States in any civil action against a collector or other officer of the revenue for any act done by him in the performance of his official duty or for the recovery of any money exacted by or paid to him, which shall have been paid into the Treasury of the United States, may, at the instance of either party, be examined and reversed or affirmed in the Supreme Court of the United States, upon writ of error, without regard to the sum or value in controversy in such action."

That was the simple, harmless bill as it passed the Senate. It went to the House of Representatives; and there was proposed as an amendment to it the following:

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act approved February 5, 1867, entitled 'An act to amend an act to establish the judicial courts of the United States,' approved September 24, 1789, as authorizes an appeal from the judgment of the circuit court to the Supreme Court of the United States, or the exercise of any such jurisdiction by said Supreme Court on appeals which have been or may hereafter be taken, be, and the same is hereby, repealed."

Sir, the change was distinctly made in the other branch of Congress, as appears from the reports, as I recollect them, and it was admitted that that amendment was offered to meet the McCardle case, which had been argued in the Supreme Court of the United States. It was passed under circumstances which have been detailed already in this debate. It came here and it was passed, few suspecting its true character.

But, sir, it is unnecessary that we on this side of the Chamber should take up the time of the Senate in attempting to point out the impropriety of this measure. The almost unbroken silence of gentlemen on the opposite side of the Chamber shows that they are resolved to pass this bill, to pass it this evening, and to take away from the highest legal tribunal in the land the right to determine upon the title of the citizen to his personal liberty. If you think proper let the leaden wings of despotism continue still to hover over that large section of the country and over its ten million inhabitants. If you will not allow them an appeal to the highest legal tribunal in the land, let me tell you, sir, that an appeal is about to be entered from the legislation of this Congress to a power greater than Congress. If the love of liberty has ceased to animate the hearts of the representatives of the people and of the States assembled in Congress it has not died out with the great mass of the American people. Pass your act, and to the majority of the people who never attempted to disconnect themselves from the Government of the United States do we take an appeal, and you cannot prevent judgment being entered. On the 12th day of November next our appeal from your legislation will come up before the great court of the people assembled, and, God helping us, if all recollection of the noble example of their fathers has not fled from their minds, if all love for those cherished institutions which have been handed down to them has not ceased to exist, they will reverse your judgment.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, when the measure now before the Senate was returned with the objections of the President yesterday, I read the bill as amended in the House of Representatives for the first time. My belief on reading it was that it had been passed from inadvertency. I did not consider it possible that the Senate of the United States would deliberately pass a retroactive law divesting the vested rights of any citizen of the United States. Chancellor Kent has told us, and I think truly, that—

"It is a principle of the English common law, as ancient as the law itself, that a statute even of its omnipotent Parliament is never to have retrospective effect."

And Lord Mansfield, in a case before him, said:

"It can never be that the true construction of this act is to take away vested rights and punish the innocent pursuer with costs."

I believe honestly in those principles. I thought that in our more limited form of government, where the powers of Government are more defined, where the legislative power is vested in one department, the executive in another, and the judicial in another, each made coördinate and independent of the others, the principles which had obtained in the common law, nay, not only in the common law, but under the civil law, even in the laws of imperial France, in opposition to retrospective legislation would never fail to prevent the passage of such a measure as that now before the Senate—I speak of part of the bill, not all of it. The debate yesterday, however, has satisfied me that I was under an illusion; and in this case, as in too many others, party spirit, with its wild and bewildering influence, and the supposed necessities of party, will certainly lead to the passage of this bill by a constitutional, but by a party, vote.

The bill as it originally passed the Senate contained but a single section. That section provided that in civil actions against the revenue officers of the country, whether the foreign revenue or the internal revenue, they, or the parties suing, should have the right of appeal to the court of last resort in order that in that class of cases there might be uniformity of decision, and that without reference to ordinary limitations of law, whether the sum in controversy be ten dollars, $500, or $1,000. That was the bill as it passed the Senate of the United States. That was its original purpose. It went to the House of Representatives, and in that House an amendment was introduced not germane to the bill, but absolutely foreign, foreign to the entire provisions of the bill, inconsistent and contradictory in its principles to the bill as it passed the Senate. As to the mode in which that amendment was introduced, with the concomitant circumstances and remarks made in the debate there, I will not speak now; because legislative decorum forbids me to characterize, as I think it ought to be characterized, the whole transaction as it occurred in another body. The amendment came back to the Senate at a late hour of the day; I believe when we were in executive session. I was not present when it was taken up; but it was at a very late hour. Without explanation, without the opportunity of examination or discussion, it was pressed at once to a vote and was passed in the Senate as if it were in coincidence or in accordance with the original measure, a mere amendment to it, and sent to the President for his signature. No opportunity was given for modification, for consideration, for examination, and explanation of the objects and purport of that amendment. It passed, the honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] has said, by what he calls a large vote; and I had hoped until yesterday that that vote had been what I called inadvertent, because the Senate were not apprised of the whole character of the amendment.

But, now, when the President returned this bill to us with his objections yesterday, I find that it was pressed upon the Senate still without the opportunity for examination and discussion, and those objections which can be made to it must be made on the spur of the occasion. The Senate have, for the first time, introduced a practice which in the House of Representatives has precluded the character of a deliberative assembly—not, it is true, by the adoption of what is called the previous question; but by a large dominant majority forcing the minority into an immediate consideration of a measure before the message itself had been printed or the bill itself had been capable of examination by the members who were opposed to its provisions. Sir, it is the first step toward the destruction of debate on the part of the minority in this body. I trust it will not be followed hereafter.

No time has been allowed for examination. No one can doubt—it is impossible to deny—that one of the questions, at all events, involved in this bill, if not others, is of grave importance as a principle. The authorities that may be submitted upon it must be cursorily selected. The debate is pressed on the day that the message is read, when for the first time, certainly a large number of the members of the Senate have read the bill as amended or knew what its object was. I had believed, and I would fain hope even now, that a large majority of the Senate were not apprised of the character of this bill at the time it was returned to us by the President. I should be unwilling to believe that the body of which I am a member would have lent, by preconcerted, deliberate action, its sanction to the amendment which was introduced and passed in the House of Representatives. But, sir, I heard yesterday in the debate, with deep regret, the language of the honorable, the learned, and the distinguished Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN.] As I heard that language then, and as I read it now, it was a declaration that on the other side of the Chamber they were prepared to vote; that they were willing to leave discussion to the minority, but that they had made up their minds and were ready to vote on this measure, which the President had vetoed. If that honorable Senator, with all his ability, with his acknowledged integrity, and with the commanding influence that he wields in this body, can take that view of this measure, then I must necessarily assume that there is no possibility that any objection I may urge here can avail for the purpose of defeating its passage.

What does this bill effect, or rather what does it intend to effect? The act of the 5th of February, 1867, gave to the several courts of the United States and the several justices and judges of the courts, within their respective jurisdictions, in addition to the authority already conferred by law, the power to grant writs of habeas corpus, and prescribed summary and speedy action for the purpose of relieving citizens of the United States from unlawful imprisonment. It was a remedial act. It matters not whether it was necessary or not. That is the scope of the act. And it also provided, with a view to that necessary uniformity of decision which is essential to guide the numerous inferior tribunals, that in cases involving, as those writs do, the personal liberty, if not the life, of the party who sues out the writ, he should have the right to appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. That was the provision. The necessary result of that provision was that in a few brief decisions the principles of personal liberty would have been so settled on all our controverted questions that there would have been no difficulty in the performance of their duties on the part of the inferior tribunals.

What does this bill propose? Not to repeal the power which was granted to the justices and judges of the inferior courts of the United States, but to take away from the appellate tribunal, the Supreme Court, the right to revise their decisions and to settle with uniformity what are the rights of American citizens in reference to their liberty and their lives. That is all it does. It does not repeal the jurisdiction confided to the circuit courts and justices, but only so much of the act of 1867 as provides for a revision of the judgments of those courts in reference to writs of habeas corpus as authorized under that act. Does it not present a case of extraordinary action on the part of the House of Representatives and of the Senate that, in a bill which was originally passed in the Senate to give proper relief to the ministerial officers of the Government in matters connected with property alone where they were sued, no matter how minute the sum for which they were sued, they should, in that same bill take away the appellate jurisdiction of the court of last resort, where the life and liberty of the citizen were concerned? Senators may reconcile it to themselves. To my mind the contrast between the provisions of the bill as it originally passed the Senate, and the amendment of the House, is alone sufficient for the condemnation of this second section. I shall come presently to the worst portion of the bill, which is its retroactive agency.

The bill in the second section provides:

That so much of the act approved February 5, 1867, entitled "An act to amend an act to establish the judicial courts of the United States," approved September 24, 1859, as authorizes an appeal from the judgment of the circuit court to the Supreme Court of the United States, or the exercise of any such jurisdiction by said Supreme Court on appeals which have been or may hereafter be taken, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The different judges of the inferior tribunals are left to exercise a wild discretion, if you please, in reference to their decisions. They may come in entire conflict with each other as to what is the protection given by the law under this great writ of habeas corpus, the remedial protection to the liberty and the life of an American citizen. This measure, which takes away the right to give uniformity to those decisions and to control these inferior courts, is coupled in a bill which provides that in reference to matters of property alone, however minute, an appeal may be taken to that court of last resort.

The honorable Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] yesterday, though he was checked by the honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] for attempting to discuss this bill, as an unnecessary act, placed his defense of it on the ground that it was both expedient and proper; that with the press of business on the Supreme Court of the United States, and the multitude of cases before it, it was wise and right to repeal the act of February, 1867, which authorizes the appeal. If the honorable Senator had only paused and read the whole bill, how singular and inconsistent his argument would have appeared to him! The same bill authorizes an appeal in matters connected with property, so far as your revenue officers are concerned; and where there would be one case arising under the law of February 5, 1867, there would be twenty arising under the measure which originally passed the Senate. The bill itself, as originally passed, would add twenty cases to the docket of the Supreme Court, where the bill which it is now proposed to repeal would add but one; and that, too, in reference to matters which are merely matters of property. In one class of cases the question is as to the responsibility to pecuniary damages of the different revenue officers in the country; and in the other the law was intended to protect the liberties and the life of every American citizen. Mr. President, has it come to this, that in these United States money and property are of more value in the eyes of the Congress of the United States and to be more sedulously protected than the liberty or the life of a citizen?

Again, sir, the argument is even more illusory on the part of the honorable Senator from Nevada, because this bill, though it increases the labors of the Supreme Court in its first section twenty to one, even if it had not been retroactive, when you look at it as retroactive it literally not only leaves no room for any case to appear before the Supreme Court hereafter, but it undertakes to dispose of existing cases which have been argued and are ready for decision. How, then, can it be as to that class of cases—and whether there be one case or many is immaterial—that there was a necessity for the retroactive clause in this bill which deprives, or intends to deprive, the court of jurisdiction in a case which has already been heard before it? That would not occupy its time. That would not add to its burdens, whatever the first section of the bill might do. Sir, the argument is baseless, and I presume, with the high intelligence of the honorable Senator from Nevada, that it was relied upon only because there was no better argument in support of such a measure.

But, sir, the honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] told you yesterday that this bill was really of no importance; that it would not have the effect of dismissing any case on the records of the Supreme Court which would not otherwise be dismissed. I have great respect for the legal acumen of the honorable Senator; but I might well ask him, why is it that the retroactive clause is introduced if it was not intended to affect existing cases in the court; if it was not supposed that a case known as McCordle's case, in which the honorable Senator bore his part in the argument on the merits, was to be supplemented by legislation for the purpose of preventing the decision of the court on the merits of that argument, so as to deprive the court of the power of deciding the case upon its merits, but requiring them to dismiss it, although it had been argued before them?

But the honorable Senator went further. He undertook to explain to you what was the object of the law sought to be repealed—no; let me correct myself: it is not proposed to repeal the law, but to take away the right of appeal alone. He told you it was passed for certain purposes with reference to a particular class of the community. I was not a member of the Senate when that law was passed, but I read all laws in the language in which they are expressed. The law provides that the right to the writ of habeas corpus in a summary way shall be allowed in every case—

"Where any person may be restrained of his or her liberty in violation of the Constitution, or of any treaty or law of the United States."

I suppose, and I should so read the law, that that was meant to protect the rights of every citizen; that that was its object and purpose; that it was not passed for the benefit of any particular class, notwithstanding that may have been the private opinion of the honorable Senator from Illinois. The only effect of the second section of this bill is to take away the right of appeal which gives uniformity of decision.

ion under that law. Therefore, the argument which tells you that the law is no longer necessary, and that it is a very unimportant matter whether you pass the bill or not, is aside of the question.

The honorable Senator also tells us that we had existed without this speedy remedy under a writ of habeas corpus and the right of appeal, as prescribed in the act of February 5, 1867, from the year 1789 almost to the present day, and that therefore it will make no great difference if the act of 1867 be repealed. Now, sir, the act is not repealed; whether it was wise or not is not necessary to be discussed here. Whether the act ought to be repealed for the future or not is not the question which I consider material here. But, sir, it is not repealed. The only effect of this bill is to deprive the appellate tribunal of the right of correcting the error of inferior tribunals in the execution of that law. The law may be unnecessary. If so, repeal it prospectively as you do other laws. I may think that action unwise; I may think the law was proper and right; and I might vote against any repeal of the law in any of its terms. But the great objection to the present bill is that it is retrospective in its action; that it seeks to divest the vested right of action on the part of any American citizen who has hitherto taken his appeal and brought it before the Supreme Court. I have read to you the language of Chancellor Kent. I have read to you the language of Lord Mansfield as applied to the omnipotent Parliament of Great Britain, that it could not be that the Parliament intended by an act to deprive the citizen of his vested rights and render him liable to the costs of the suit which he had instituted under an existing law. That is precisely in principle what this bill intends to do.

Now, sir, I may well ask why is it that the provision should have been inserted in this second section, not only that the Supreme Court shall not have jurisdiction of appeals hereafter taken, but that it shall have no jurisdiction of appeals which have heretofore been taken? Is not that provision violative of a great general principle recognized in all time past by both the civil and common law; which was recognized even under the arbitrary rule of the Roman emperors, which is now part of the law of imperial France, that retrospective legislation shall not deprive a party of existing rights? Sir, on this subject, as it conveys the principle with more fullness and more power than I could express, I will read the language of that great jurist, Chancellor Kent, in a case which came before him. It is an exposition of the principle which I defy the acutest and the ablest man in this body to controvert or to answer:

"An ex post facto law, in the strict technical sense of the term, is usually understood to apply to criminal cases, and this is its meaning when used in the Constitution of the United States; yet laws impairing previously acquired civil rights are equally within the reason of that prohibition and equally to be condemned. We have seen that the cases in the English and in the civil law apply to such rights; and we shall find upon further examination that there is no distinction in principle nor any recognized in practice between a law punishing a person criminally for a past innocent act, or punishing him civilly by divesting him of a lawfully acquired right. The distinction consists only in the degree of the oppression, and history teaches us that the Government which can deliberately violate the one right soon ceases to regard the other."—Johnson's Reports, page 505.

Mr. President, does not this bill violate an existing civil right? The law of February 5, 1867, passed little more than a year ago, gave the right to every American citizen not only to enjoy the protection of the writ of habeas corpus in the mode prescribed, where he is deprived of his liberty, but it also gave him the right to carry the decision of the court below into the appellate court, the highest tribunal of the nation, for its final decision. Under that right there are cases—no matter what cases. I know nothing of the particular merits, for I have never examined them, of what is called McCordle's case or any other. I have only a limited knowledge, and it may be an incorrect knowledge of the questions involved in them or any other cases before the court; but there can be no question that if the appeal has been taken and the case docketed in the court, that vests a civil right in the party prosecuting the appeal. This bill is intended to divest him of that civil right, to deprive him of what belonged to him as a right under the existing law of the land. It comes precisely within the condemnation pronounced by Chancellor Kent against all legislation of that kind; and pronounced not only by him, but by the universal action of the judges of England and by the jurists of other civilized nations under the civil law.

Mr. President, it may be, I presume it will be, that this measure will be passed by the Congress of the United States; but if it is passed, it is nothing else than a law against reason, against justice, trampling upon, aye, stamping out the existing rights of American citizens.

I have said that, from the debate of yesterday and the votes that were given, I had lost my hope that this measure would be considered irrespective of party. I fear that that hope cannot be regained. I fear that under the influence of party organization and what are the supposed necessities of party, which too often blind wise, good, and able men, this measure, spite of the condemnation which the principle of it has received—I speak now of its retrospective clause—from every public jurist who has ever written upon the question, will pass. But there still remain two remedies.

I do not know what may be the decision of the Supreme Court as to the construction of the law if passed. I can readily perceive that it may be (according with Lord Mansfield in his opinion that it cannot be that the Legislature, whether the omnipotent Parliament of Great Britain or the law-making body of the limited Government of the United States, can pass a law to divest a citizen of his vested rights) the court may hold that a law which says that the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is taken away on appeals which have been or may hereafter be taken does not apply to appeals which have been docketed and the record filed in court. An appeal may be taken and never prosecuted. It may be, looking to the great principle of justice which utterly condemns these retrospective laws, that the court may hold, in reference to existing cases which are docketed before it with a record filed, that the law has no application and cannot be held as intended to affect them. Certainly Lord Mansfield would so have held, according to his doctrine, if such a case had come before him.

But, again, it may also be (and I confess that if I were in a position to act as one of the judges of that court I should not hesitate on that question) that if the court should feel themselves compelled by the repeal of the law of 1867 to dismiss a case which had been previously argued and heard before them on its merits prior to the passage of the act, they would still pronounce their opinion on the law as it then existed, though they might add to that opinion that the legislative body had deprived them of the power to give the redress to the citizen to which he was entitled. Such would be my course; such deliberately would I decide if I were sitting as a judge of that court and arrived at the conclusion that the party was entitled to the relief he sought under the law as it stood when his appeal was heard. I should pronounce my opinion of the law as it stood at the time the case was heard before me, and I should not shrink from the expression of that opinion though I might feel compelled to submit to the exercise of legislative power, however unjust I might deem it, and subsequently to dismiss the appeal without relief to the party.

Mr. President, if it be true that this legislative measure is intended to prevent a decision upon any of those laws passed by Congress, in my judgment mis-called reconstruction laws; if it be true that that be its object, to prevent a decision of the ultimate judicial tribunal which might influence the minds of the American people—and I can conceive of no other object in the retrospective action of this bill unless it be that—I think the dominant party make politically a grand mistake. It is true that the reverence of the American people for law and their disposition to submit to law make the decision of the Supreme Court on any law of immense influence; and if Congress proceeds in the execution of a legislative act, in spite of the judgment of the court that it is unconstitutional, I have no doubt that it would be highly injurious to the popular success of any party who attempts to carry out any such legislation. But, sir, will it be less destructive to the influence of the dominant party if, by the passage of this law intercepting a decision by the court in a case which has already been argued before it, you prevent that decision being rendered? Is it not a confession that you fear the invalidity of the laws which were in question before the court? And do you suppose that the people of the United States are so unintelligent that they will not perceive that a retrospective law which wrenches from the court the right to decide on a case which has already been heard and which involves principles of the highest order is a confession of judgment? I know not what the decision of the court will be; I have had no intercourse with them; I have exchanged no word with any of the judges; and I can only judge of the probability of the decision in the case so far as I have heard of it from my own views of constitutional law. But do you suppose that if you intercept that decision by retrospective legislation the people of the United States will not view it as precisely the same in effect as if the court had decided the question, as an admission of the unconstitutionality of your measures of legislation?

If you pass this law it must be by a party vote. If you pass this law its only effect and object is to repeal the right of jurisdiction on the part of the appellate court, not only as to future cases, but as to those which are now on the docket or which have been argued before it; and the common sense of every man will necessarily draw the conclusion that you fear the decision of a non-political body. You fear the decision of a coördinate department of the Government to whom the Constitution intrusts the right to determine whether your laws are passed in excess of power or whether they are within the constitutional limits which are assigned to you.

Sir, if this bill be passed and sustained by popular approval, I have very little hope for the perpetuity of the free institutions of this country. Chancellor Kent has told you truly, I think, that when retrospective laws to effect any purposes, party purposes or personal purposes, are sanctioned by the legislative authority it is not a very long step to pass ex post facto laws for the purpose of inflicting direct punishment. If this retrospective law now is intended and operates to deprive a coördinate department of the Government of the right to pass upon the validity of an act coming before it in a case intrusted to it by your own legislation, then you are abrogating judicial power and, as I think you have already done in reference to executive power; you are merging the entire powers of Government in two aggregate bodies composing the Legislature.

Gentlemen may suppose while they have the power in these bodies that this may be effected without future danger. In my own belief the experience of history teaches that it is not uncommon for despotism to be established in the first instance by an aggregate body, but the ultimate end is sure; an individual will displace, as Cromwell did, the legislative body, and assume despotic powers over the whole country.

Sir, I have not made my remarks against this bill in the spirit of party in the ordinary sense of the term. Nor, sir, have I made them with the expectation of influencing the Senate, because since the indications of yesterday I have been hopeless that the dominant party in this body would listen to any discussion on the bill. But, sir, I am a worshiper of civil liberty. I care not what the rest of your legislation may be if you keep the country as a government of laws, if you keep it with its powers subdivided, so that we may escape a mere government of will. I have not many years to remain in political struggles; but while I do live I pray God that I may never live under a government of will, whether it be the mere will of a single despot or the will of a majority of an aggregate body.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, under ordinary circumstances I might well decline to go on with the debate upon a subject so important and interesting at so late an hour in the afternoon, because it is impossible, speaking at this time, that I should do justice to the subject or to myself; but, sir, I regard the circumstances under which we are placed. It was by common consent yesterday understood that this debate should be concluded to-day, and I am unwilling to be held responsible for an adjournment or a night session. I rise, therefore, to speak at this time in the hope that after the Senator who has the bill in charge is heard and such other members as desire to speak are heard we shall reach a vote.

Mr. President, this subject is undergoing debate in a somewhat unfortunate manner, at least in a somewhat unusual manner. The affirmative is not heard; the debate begins and progresses, at least it has progressed so far, with speeches from gentlemen who are opposed to the bill; and if we are to hear any regular, any elaborate vindication of it, it is only to be at the conclusion of the debate. Sir, I think that we ought to have had the privilege early in the debate of a speech or two from gentlemen who support the bill, and who are responsible for its introduction and for the form which it has assumed.

I might well inquire, Mr. President, even at this late time, how it happens that those who proposed and supported this second section in the House of Representatives gave no explanation of it, subjected it to no analysis, assigned to it no character before they proposed to place it upon the statute-book of the United States. I might well make also the further inquiry why, when an explanation of that section presented here as an amendment of the other House was challenged upon the floor of the Senate, no explanation was made, no argument entered upon, no vindication attempted, and why time to consider it by those who doubted its propriety was refused by a formal vote of the Senate and the decision upon it pressed at a time and under circumstances when examination and debate were impossible; when it was inevitable that if the amendment received the sanction of the Senate it was to be upon trust and not upon argument or upon reasons assigned for its enactment. And now, in this debate, as I said before, we who oppose the measure do not enjoy the advantage of hearing the argument in its favor set forth and fully expounded in all its length and breadth before we are called upon to explain the reasons why we oppose it and desire to place ourselves once more upon the record against it.

Two little gleams of light alone are afforded us from gentlemen who support the bill and propose to vote for it. First, the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] who heads our law committee, and who has held his position for many years, informs us that this bill is quite harmless, inoperative, so far as the McCordle case in the Supreme Court is concerned; that it will have no effect whatever upon that case, and that all this debate in Congress and all this discussion outside of Congress are quite thrown away, expended to no purpose. In his judgment—and he is the highest legal authority which we have constituted in the formation of our committees—the passage of this measure or the failure to enact it is equally indifferent and unimportant, so far as that case is concerned.

Mr. President, it is quite unnecessary that I should attempt very carefully to answer the Senator from Illinois, that I should chop logic with him over this question of the construction and effect of the present bill in the particular to which he referred and to which I now refer—

I mean its effect upon the case pending in the Supreme Court. Two or three things are not questioned and are incapable of denial: that the member who offered this amendment (the second section) in the House of Representatives declares that he offered it and sought its enactment because it would effect the removal of that case from the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court before it should be decided; and that the member who had charge of the bill in the House openly proclaims that he acceded or assented to the amendment because he desired that such should be its effect and operation, and he applauds the amendment because it is to have precisely that effect and no other.

We are informed, also, that the Supreme Court has thought itself justified under the circumstances in delaying action upon that case in view of the pendency of this bill. The members of that court have in some way, perhaps informally, determined that they will not proceed to deliver a judgment upon the case which was argued before them because this bill relating to it has been pending before Congress and the President of the United States.

These things are known to us, and we know, also, that discussion of this bill in its relations to that case has been going on in the newspapers of the country.

I think I am safe, then, in saying that the second section of this bill was intended by those who are responsible for its introduction and who have given it their support for the express purpose of removing from the Supreme Court of the United States that jurisdiction which up to this moment it possesses, not to hear only but to render judgment between the authorities of the United States and a citizen of Mississippi who are parties before them in an issue at law in which the liberty of the latter is involved.

Mr. President, I put aside, then, the feeble and fruitless denial of the Senator from Illinois, that this is a bill which relates and was intended to relate to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court over a case pending before it upon which, after full argument, its judgment was about to be pronounced.

Next, we have from the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] an observation which can hardly be described as an argument, but which deserves some answer. He says why make so much ado about the repeal of this statute of 1867, or of a part of it, inasmuch as the people of the United States had lived prosperously and happily for nearly eighty years without any such enactment; that, inasmuch as their judicial system had been found sufficient for their wants for all the purposes of the administration of justice among them down to the year 1867, it is not becoming and it is not seemly that so much objection should be made to the repeal of that part of the law of 1867 which is effected by this bill.

Mr. President, that would be very well if it were not for two very important facts which the Senator overlooked, but which I will now state. In the commencement of 1867 we had extended over the southern country in time of peace an extensive military jurisdiction affecting the citizens of that section of the Union in all its parts, and our officers, the agents of our Freedmen's Bureau, and other persons of the North were brought into intimate relations with individuals in the South. Under such circumstances it was apprehended that constant occasion of dispute and of difficulty between them would arise; and hence Congress thought proper to pass a new habeas corpus act infinitely more extensive than any one which had been previously enacted in this country, extending to subjects and to persons that had not been affected before that time by our laws. Previous to the enactment of the act of 1867 the remedy by habeas corpus for the delivery of the citizen from illegal imprisonment had been almost entirely under the authority of the States. In their courts and by their authorities liberty was sufficiently vindicated; and it had not been thought necessary to arm the courts of the United States with very extensive jurisdiction for the protection of the citizen. But, sir, Congress then began to treat this southern country as without legal State governments, as without political organizations which we would recognize as legal and effectual for all the purposes for which State organizations or governments are established; and as we assumed to ourselves and asserted for ourselves new and extensive jurisdiction in that section of the Union, it was necessary that we should arm our courts as well as our military authorities with new and unusual powers.

Any one who will examine the act of 1867 will see that it is most extensive in its enactments and in its operation, having been purposely made so. A new or extended system of Federal jurisdiction having been asserted by us in that part of the Union, it became proper, if not indispensable, for the purpose of congruity and uniformity in our system, that the different magistrates and judges and courts should be subjected to a review of their decisions by some judicial authority, and for that reason, by the law of 1867 we did confer, not only jurisdiction upon the circuit courts of the United States in the several judicial districts, but appellate powers upon the Supreme Court itself, in cases arising in those circuit courts. That was necessary to the system established by the law of 1867. It was indispensable to that scheme of government and action which Congress then framed and imposed upon the southern country. Without this what would have been the consequence? Conflict of decisions everywhere; one judge or magistrate deciding one way in one section, and another in a different way in another section. I mean decisions upon the rights of the freedmen: decisions upon the boundaries between military and civil authority; decisions upon the character and extent of the authority left to the provisional State governments in the South, for they were soon afterward declared provisional by our laws. It was necessary that your system of administration should have coherence and uniformity in the South; and for that proper and indispensable reason you provided that there should be an appellate power exercised by the Supreme Court of the United States, so that a case might be brought here, and upon being determined by our highest judicial tribunal, the decision should become the law of the country and binding upon all inferior tribunals, whether of the United States or of the several States.

Now, Mr. President, under that statute this case came up to the Supreme Court from the circuit court in the State of Mississippi, and it involved one of the gravest and most important questions which can arise under Federal law—the question whether Congress can organize the southern country into military districts and confer authority upon the military commanders of those districts to try, or cause to be tried, by military commission criminal offenses, and cases involving the civil rights of the citizen; and whether by the exercise of that jurisdiction the ordinary provisions of public law which have heretofore obtained throughout the United States can be dispensed with; whether persons not in the military or naval service of the United States can be tried as if they were in such service by military tribunals in a summary manner, and subjected to such punishment, undefined by civil law, as the military authorities may think proper to impose. That case was brought up from one of the circuit courts to the Supreme Court, and it underwent prolonged and exhaustive debate. The voices of counsel who were heard on both sides of that great controversy almost reached this Chamber and echoed in our ears. They spoke in a much more appropriate forum, in a place much better suited to the case than this would be. They did not speak to the law-making power, although they spoke of it. They addressed themselves to a judicial tribunal, to one of the three great departments into which the Government was divided when it was established, and one adapted by its Constitution and by its qualifications for hearing the case and for giving a just and lawful judgment upon it.

The Senator from Nevada says, "Why make so much ado when we propose to take away the authority by which this appeal was brought into that court, and take away the authority by which the argument was heard by that court, and take away the authority by which judgment may be pronounced by that court? Why make so much ado when the law we repeal is only a year old; when twelve months only have elapsed since by the signature of the President of the United States it became a law and was incorporated among our statutes, and became one of those rules of civil conduct by which all the people are bound?" I tell the Senator we make ado about that because you remove from that statute of 1867 a provision which is indispensable to justice and which is indispensable also to the uniformity and fair operation of the system established by that law, which was itself new and extraordinary. Very true, before 1867 there was no pressing necessity for extending very far the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States in habeas corpus cases, because prior to that time you had never proposed to exercise the jurisdiction you then assumed over the inhabitants of one third of the United States. Prior to that time it had been thought that this Federal Government was confined within narrow limits; that its powers had been sparingly if not grudgingly dealt out to it by those who founded it and who put it in operation in 1789, and that the great mass of public power which presses upon the citizen and regulates his conduct, proceeded and must proceed from the government of his own State.

But, sir, when in 1867 you took a gigantic stride in your imperial career, when you grasped to yourself and drew to yourself large and unusual powers which you had not asserted before, it became necessary that your judicial system should be largely extended, so that the machinery by which you worked, the means which you employed, should be commensurate with the new jurisdiction which you assumed. The Senator from Nevada, therefore, makes a bootless complaint, makes one, at least, without weight, importance, or justice when he objects to us upon the ground which I have mentioned.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania give way for a moment that I may make a suggestion?

Mr. BUCKALEW. Certainly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My object in asking the Senator from Pennsylvania to give way is to learn whether we cannot arrive at an understanding. What was agreed upon yesterday is not, I learn, understood precisely alike. Some of us understood that the agreement was that the vote was to be taken absolutely at six o'clock this evening; but I learn that that is not the understanding of other gentlemen. Of course there is a misapprehension about it, and the matter should be settled.

Mr. BUCKALEW. The understanding very distinctly was that the vote was to be taken to-day.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But some of us understood that the hour was fixed. For one I am not willing to stay here much longer; indeed, I am not able to do so; and I am not disposed to take any part in the discussion and I desire to learn why we cannot have a specific agreement that the vote shall be taken to-morrow at one o'clock, and then let gentlemen who wish to speak take all the time they desire this evening.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I have no objection to that. I commenced my remarks by saying that I rose to speak at this time, and proposed to go on, because I intended to keep the agreement, which was that we should reach a vote to-day.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then as I wish to vote on the question, but do not feel disposed to stay here to listen to discussion, I rose to suggest, in accordance with the idea of my friend from Oregon, with whom I have spoken on the subject, that we had better have an understanding that we shall take the vote to-morrow at one o'clock, at all events.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If it can be understood that the vote shall be taken to-morrow at one o'clock, without discussion then, I have no objection.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I will go on, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Can we not have that understanding?

Mr. CONKLING. And let it be, of course, with the further understanding that no other business shall be done to-day.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That nothing except this discussion shall go on.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no objection to an understanding that the vote shall be taken to-morrow.

Mr. FESSENDEN. And then the gentlemen can take what time they please this evening for discussion.

Mr. CONKLING. And let it be understood that no subject except this will be considered to-day.

Several SENATORS. Of course not.

Mr. CONKLING. Then no Senator need wait here any longer, unless he wishes to do so.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I shall certainly object to any House bills being acted upon. [Laughter.]

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope if the suggestion I have made is agreeable all round, it will be generally understood, and we shall act upon it.

Several SENATORS. And let there be no executive session.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No other business whatever to-day.

Mr. HENDERSON. With this understanding I suggest to Senators that we take a recess until to-morrow morning at ten o'clock. That will leave us three hours to debate the bill.

Mr. BUCKALEW. That will accommodate me very greatly.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is impossible to understand in this part of the Senate Chamber what the agreement is. We should like to know.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Simply that the vote shall be taken at one o'clock precisely, to-morrow, and that no other business shall be done to-day except this.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is a queer way they have of doing business in the House of Representatives, and as one in the minority here, I do not choose to accept it. I do not choose to say, for the accommodation of a portion of the Senate, that we shall have an understanding that gentlemen may stay here and speak and do nothing else. I do not care about seeing any Senator put in the unpleasant position of making a speech when he appears to have no purpose in view but just to make a speech.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator objects to the arrangement, and it does not seem to be agreed to, of course we must go on.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do object. I would not wish to stay here to make a speech with the understanding over my head that all the rest of the Senators were going home and would not listen to me.

Mr. McCREERY. I submit a motion that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow morning at ten o'clock.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope not. There are committees to meet to-morrow morning, and to agree to that proposition would derange their business. I insist that we go on now according to the agreement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania abandon the floor?

Mr. BUCKALEW. I gave way informally for this little friendly chat. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved and seconded that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at ten o'clock.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is a violation of the agreement made yesterday that the vote should be taken to-day.

Mr. McCREERY. But I understood that there was a proposition for a new agreement.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Who made the proposition to take the vote at one o'clock to-morrow?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I made it, and it was agreed to by everybody, before the Senator from Indiana came in just now.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I regret very much that I did not hear it at first.

Mr. McCREERY. If my motion is construed as a violation of any agreement, of course I withdraw it.

Mr. COLE. The meeting of committees in the morning will not be in the way of the discussion of this bill in the Senate before one o'clock, and I hope we shall take a recess.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I know it will be in the way, because I am on a committee that meets at ten o'clock, a very important committee, a conference committee; and there are other Senators who are on such committees. Such an arrangement will very much interfere with them. If there is to be any further discussion of this bill I want it to go on now, and I want an opportunity to say a few words at the conclusion of the debate.

Mr. MORTON. We all want to vote on this bill, but some of us do not wish to stay here to-night to a late hour for that purpose, and are not physically able to do it. For my part I think we had better take a recess until to-morrow at ten o'clock, and then have it understood that the time between that hour and one o'clock shall be devoted to this discussion, and that at one o'clock the vote shall be taken. That will allow plenty of time to send the bill to the House of Representatives to-morrow, and answer every purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any motion submitted to the Senate?

Mr. COLE. The motion of the Senator from Kentucky is before Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood that to be withdrawn.

Mr. TRUMBULL and others. Let us have the question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suppose if no arrangement is arrived at, the Senator from Pennsylvania will continue his speech.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I am ready to go on, sir. The act of 1867 was intended to have special relation to freedmen in the South, to persons connected with the Government service, and to persons from the northern States sojourning in that section. As I understand, it was particularly intended to protect all these persons against possible hostility, injury, or outrage, while they were engaged in the performance of public duties or in the peaceful exercise of their private employments. But, sir, the law has a more extensive application than perhaps was intended by those who are responsible for its enactment. Such is the imperfection of human language that in a general statute intended for the advantage of the one race and of particular persons in another race, passed for their advantage, a great number of other persons are included. Although, as has been hinted to us in this debate, and as has been said more explicitly elsewhere, this law was mainly intended to curb the impertinence and to limit the authority of State jurisdictions, and to protect the freedmen and their political associates, it has a much more extensive effect. It not only includes negroes and radicals, but it includes all persons, whomsoever they may be, the whole of our population; those whose political opinions are sound and those whose opinions are not sound, judged by the political standard which we set up in Congress, or which may be set up elsewhere.

So, sir, it has unfortunately happened that this law of 1867, in the course of its administration, has been invoked in favor of a man who is not a favorite with the law-making power; has been invoked in favor of a man who used violent, perhaps improper language with reference to some military officer set over him in his district as his commander and superior. I think the language he used in his newspaper was described by his own counsel in the Supreme Court as "coarse." I suppose it was exceptionable language, not such as we would approve of or commend. Well, sir, in favor of a man who was not devoted to us in the late war, and in favor of a man whose language was unbecomingly or gross, this statute of 1867 has been invoked and a case of attempted punishment of him by the military authorities, in regular course has been brought, as I said before, into your highest court, the Supreme Court of the United States.

Now, sir, it is a misfortune, perhaps, that the protection and advantages of our laws cannot be confined exclusively to our friends; that when we attempt to make comprehensive enactments, general rules, put them upon the statute-book, and throw them out to the people of the country as the law for their conduct, it will happen that those laws will not discriminate in favor of persons we like and against those we dislike, that their operation will be equal upon friend and foe; that these our enactments, to use a figure of speech, once before used in our political history on a signal occasion, these enactments which we cast out to the country will fall like the dew of heaven upon all alike, upon rich and poor, upon the humble and the lofty, upon men with whom we sympathize and upon men whom we detest. This, sir, is characteristic of Justice herself; and when you frame her laws their effect and operation will be according to her nature, and the more perfectly they are so the more perfectly is the object of their enactment accomplished, and the more thoroughly have you secured the proper and legitimate ends for which Governments are established among men.

It is, therefore, with me no objection to the act of 1867, no objection to its continuance upon our statute-book, that it can be invoked in favor of a man belonging to a class for whom the law was not specially intended when it was passed. Will you withdraw this provision of law from your statute-book because its operation is equal, because, under the stubborn arrangements by which courts are constituted and by which courts are conducted and administered, you cannot select friend from foe and administer your system upon principles of favoritism or of friendship on the one hand or of hostility and enmity upon the other? But I suppose gentlemen will not say this law is to be repealed for that reason. They will not choose to proclaim it before the people of the country or acknowledge it to their own consciousness when they come to its exact and thorough consideration.

But there is another consideration perhaps more potent, more influential with them. This law is to be repealed, this jurisdiction is to be withdrawn from the Supreme Court, because it is necessary to preserve the reconstruction system enacted by Congress from molestation, injury, perhaps demolition, by the court. An humble man in the State of Mississippi, not admirable, perhaps, by his personal character or his past career, is able to carry the Congress of the United States into court and to demand judgment upon its most solemn enactments. What a spectacle! What an arrangement of things upon earth is that! A poor, humble, despised man in Mississippi, regardless of your dignity, of your constitutional authority, of the immense popular power you possess, can carry you, or rather your most solemn and deliberate work, into a quiet court before eight men, and there, upon logic and reason alone, not by passion, not by influence, not by brute force, not by physical power, not by the sword, but by logic and honest argument, may peradventure destroy what you have done, prostrate the edifice which you have reared, and give a new direction to the Government of the United States in the future.

It is this danger which appals men in Congress and out of it. Oh, what a spectacle is this! How it speaks of civilization, of the advance of mankind beyond their position in former ages! Great controversies in Government, great questions of political power, instead of being determined upon fields of battle by the mailed arm of the soldier or by the intrigues and corruption of polluted courts, may be decided by the voice of reason and justice in the courts of law, and those who speak the decision command the acquiescence and approval and blessing of mankind.

Mr. MORTON. I trust the Senator from Pennsylvania will allow me to interrupt him for the purpose of having the question settled as to what we are going to do to-night. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I can hardly give way to a motion of that kind.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire to state to the Senate that so far as I am advised it is agreed on all hands that as soon as the Senator from Pennsylvania concludes his speech we shall take the vote. I propose to waive, so far as I am concerned, any speech on this question, and my learned friend from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] has agreed with me to do the same thing.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Then we are pretty safe. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is understood that as soon as the Senator from Pennsylvania concludes the vote will be taken, and I hope, therefore, that the Senator will watch the hands of the clock as he proceeds.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, that puts me on my good behavior.

Mr. DAVIS. I am sorry that my honorable friend from Oregon does not treat me with as much respect generally as he does on this particular occasion. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana withdraw his motion?

Mr. MORTON. As the Senator from Oregon says there is an agreement on all hands that the vote shall be taken when the Senator from Pennsylvania concludes I shall not insist upon my motion. I was not aware of that fact before or I would not have made the motion.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Well, Mr. President, I will endeavor to concentrate myself as much as possible. Mr. President, this spectacle of a court holding within its hands a great and salutary power for the determination of public disputes awakens in my breast no jealousy and no apprehension. As a member of the Congress of the United States I am content that the judicial department of the Government shall hold all its powers complete, entire, untouched, undiminished, so far as the Congress of the United States is concerned. I would yield to it immunity from a spirit of meddling on our part, as I would claim for this department of the Government complete exemption and immunity from its interference with our just jurisdiction and powers. Now, sir, what have we done with regard to that court? Have we in no way interfered with it? Have we not sought to mold and to conform it, to some extent at least, to our own will? Let us turn to our laws. Let us see about the constitution of that court. Here is the statute of the 3d of March, 1837:

"The Supreme Court of the United States shall hereafter consist of a Chief Justice and eight associate judges, any five of whom shall constitute a quorum; and for this purpose there shall be appointed two additional justices of said court, with the like powers and to take the same oaths, perform the same duties, and be entitled to the same salary as the other associate judges."

Then follows the act of March 3, 1863:

"The Supreme Court of the United States shall hereafter consist of a Chief Justice and nine associate justices, any six of whom shall constitute a quorum; and for this purpose there shall be appointed one additional associate justice of said court, with the like powers, and to take the same oaths, perform the same duties, and be entitled to the same salary as the other associate judges."

Then comes the act of 1866:

"No vacancy in the office of associate justice of the Supreme Court shall be filled by appointment until the number of associate justices shall be reduced to six; and thereafter the said Supreme Court shall consist of a Chief Justice of the United States and six associate justices, any four of whom shall be a quorum; and the said court shall hold one term annually at the seat of Government, and such adjourned or special terms as it may find necessary for the dispatch of business."

These are the acts upon the statute-book in recent times relating to the constitution of the Supreme Court. We had sent to us the present winter, from the House of Representatives, a bill providing that upon constitutional questions two thirds of the judges should agree together in judgment in pronouncing any act of Congress violative of the Constitution of the United States. That bill was sent to a committee, and it remains unacted upon; but it was sanctioned, approved, and passed by one House of Congress. Here we have sent to us in the form of an amendment upon a bill in the first place, and now included in a bill vetoed by the President in the second place, a provision that that court shall not have appellate power to the circuit courts in habeas corpus cases, and that all cases that may be pending before the Supreme Court shall be taken away from it, and justice, so far as they are concerned, refused.

These are the several things done by Congress, including the one measure to which I have referred, passed by the House and yet pending here. The act of 1837 defines the Supreme Court so far as membership is concerned, almost during the entire period within our recollection. In 1863, the political majority in Congress desired an additional judge upon the bench of that court, and in pursuance of the power which was vested in them they took that additional judge; they selected him, of course, from among their political friends and assigned to him his place and the exercise of his duties among his colleagues upon the bench. In 1866, a vacancy existing in the court by reason of death, the President of the United States sent to us a nomination for the vacancy of Mr. Stanbery, then well-known as a distinguished member of the bar of Ohio and Kentucky, since Attorney General of the United States. That nomination was held for some time; action was not taken upon it; but one fine morning a bill was passed reducing the number of the judges of that court as vacancies should occur to seven. Vacancies should not be filled until the whole number should be reduced below seven.

Thus the filling of vacancies by presidential nomination and senatorial consent was stopped, prevented, for what purpose? It was provided that the next judge that died on that bench should leave a vacancy unfilled. I do not know whether anybody cogitated tables of mortality and made a nice calculation of the exact value of the chances. It was probably supposed that the judges senior in service would be most likely to depart this life and consequently depart from the discharge of their judicial duties first. At all events the court was left by that law at eight in number and with a prospect of reduction to seven, and the same political condition of affairs which then existed continuing down to this time there has been no change, no new law.

Now, is it not rather remarkable that here in 1866, when the business of the Supreme Court had increased very greatly; when its jurisdiction had been extended to many new subjects; when business was flooding in upon it from all sections of the country, and when here in Congress we were called upon to legislate for the relief of that court, because it was overworked—is it not remarkable that the number of judges, at such a time, should be reduced? Sir, we can all see what the explanation is. The explanation is political. It was not desired that the President, who at that time was entering upon the existing chronic difference with Congress, should fill a vacancy upon that bench by nomination, and, therefore, the law of 1866 was passed to cut down the number of judgeships from ten to seven. Well, sir, how was that court made up, and how does it stand under the law of 1866? Was it not pretty safely constituted for the objects which were in the contemplation of astute gentlemen? It is now made up of eight judges, five of whom were put upon the bench by the nomination and appointment of Mr. Lincoln. Pretty safely constituted! Judiciously made up! All right! All went smoothly; all was fair sailing, until the present winter, when we heard in the House of Representatives the first murmurings of Radical indignation against the Supreme Court; the mutterings of hostility against that court, and a bill was started and passed, and sent over here to curb and bridle that court, and to prevent a majority from determining against the validity of an act of Congress, although in their judgment it should be in plain conflict with the fundamental law which they, as well as we, are sworn to support.

Thus the court was to be curbed by an act of Congress and forbidden to discharge one of its most solemn and imperative duties, pronounced to be such by John Marshall in one of the earliest opinions upon our judicial records, luminous, demonstrative, unanswered ever since, and unanswerable in all future time. That court was to be forbidden to perform that function solemnly charged upon it and indispensable to the maintenance of any balance among the powers of Government, any just and judicious distribution of power among its departments.

Why did that bill slumber here? Was it not because it was found out or believed or supposed that even that bill would not save the extraordinary legislation of Congress from judicial condemnation? Was it not because it came to be believed or suspected that even under such a rule as that an honest judiciary could not maintain the laws enacted by the two Houses of Congress? Their enactments might be found to be deficient in that inherent life which belongs to a valid statute, namely, constitutionality. No, sir, that bill was dropped; you cannot endure even the test of a two-thirds vote upon reconstruction in the court you have reorganized and manipulated by the legislation which I have read.

How must you think the people look upon you politically? I am speaking in that aspect exclusively; and as this is a political bill it justifies my discourse of and concerning its provisions in a political sense. No, sir; a two thirds vote provision will not answer for protective purposes in these extraordinary times and with these extraordinary laws to undergo examination, not here where partisan passion speaks, not here where the inspiration of sensation newspapers is felt, not here where personal interests and party organization may mislead and distract the judgment; but in a serene and tranquil and just and honored court, whose voice when heard by the people will be respected and obeyed from the Penobscot to the Rio Grande, and everywhere within our borders, because it is the voice of justice speaking from its own temple words which the people will hear and take home to them as rules for both belief and conduct.

Therefore, sir, what do you do? Snrreptitiously, in a moment when attention was withdrawn, a quiet amendment goes on a bill in the House of Representatives and comes here and is put through without explanation and with postponement denied—to do what? To take from our great court the just power which it holds under your law, to defeat the pronouncement of its honest opinion, to save your reconstruction work from that just destruction which impends over it or which you suppose impends over it, to secure yourselves from criticism and review and reversal by any earthly power, to say and to proclaim that your will and your interests, and they alone, shall be the law of your conduct. Is not that this bill? Did not the men who introduced and passed it in the other House tell us so and tell the country so? Is not the court—armed with no military power, with no political authority, backed by no party passion—arrested now in the performance of its duty under the law? Struck at and wounded justice hesitates in her course; her judges tell you, "We pause; we suspend our functions; we await the action of the two Houses of Congress; they have power which we do not possess, and we are weak and helpless for the moment before them."

Mr. President, Dean Swift tells us that "the great evil to be guarded against in government is the summa imperii, the unlimited power in the hands of the one, the few, or the many." We suppose that in these two Houses of Congress we represent the popular voice of the people of the United States; of the majority of the people, in consequence of the expression of their judgment under our republican forms. Well, sir, one of the things best remembered by me is the astonishment and incredulity with which, many years ago, I read Mr. Madison's disquisition in the Federalist upon the relative powers and the relations of the different Departments of our Government, wherein he insisted (and he continued to insist on the point during his whole life) that the danger of encroachment by either one of the Departments of the Government upon the other was to be looked for here; here in Congress, here in the legislative branch; that the danger to our free institutions lurked here, where the voice of the people was organized, where the main mass of effective power was lodged, where the initiation of legislation pertained; and that against encroachment by this department the judicial and executive departments were to a great extent defenseless. He said this was our danger, and he wrote strong words upon it even late in life, when upon the verge of the grave he looked back with tranquil vision over his past career, over the debates which he had conducted in the Federal Convention, and over his experience as Chief Magistrate of this Union.

He left his words upon record, words of earnest exhortation to his countrymen, to look to Congress as the department which above all others would overstep the bounds of its just authority and encroaching upon the other departments, would disturb the balance of our system, and introduce into it evils and dangers not contemplated by the sanguine and sagacious men who established the Government and laid deep its foundations on the basis of popular power.

Well, sir, look at this work of ours concerning the Supreme Court; this past action of Congress and this bill. I need not go over the old story of what you have done to the executive department; how you have plucked from it time by time, month by month, one prerogative after another; how you have shorn the power of the President as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, so that you now speak to one third of the United States through the General of your Army. I need not tell you how you have stripped him of the power of control over all his executive subordinates by your tenure-of-office law, and how by many other enactments you have sought to impoverish that department, if I may so express myself, to strip and disrobe it of its constitutional garments and of its inherent and just powers. That may be a political question. You are engaged in a struggle for power; you suppose your true political antagonist is located in the executive chair. He speaks harshly and unkindly of you, and you in turn assail him and attempt to deprive him of influence, of the power to wound and to injure you with the people, because to the people you both look. Each courts the favor of the great mass in whom all sovereign power is lodged. Well, sir, at this time I shall say nothing about that contest, now protracted through a period of two years and a half. I will not attempt to hold the scales between you and your executive opponent, and determine upon which side is the balance of right or the balance of impropriety.

But, sir, I have a right in the conclusion of this debate to appeal to you on another point. Be satisfied with your political contest. Go to the people upon it and take their judgment, and as they decide so let it be. If in the adhering States—I mean those now represented in Congress, and about whose powers and functions there is no question—the majority say you are right, so be it; we submit to the inevitable, and what you shall enact will be our law for the future. If, on the contrary, judgment go against you, we shall expect your acquiescence and your submission to that popular voice from which there is no appeal. Fight out this battle, take its results honestly, and we may all, both majority and minority, obey as American citizens the decision which shall be made. That will be righteous and just conduct. No man will take any possible result, obtained in an honest manner, more cheerfully than myself. But while you are fighting this political battle, in the name of all that is sacred and excellent in our institutions, do not assail the temple of justice; do not enter its portals to pull the judge from his bench; do not enter that sacred place to despoil the court of its powers, to prostitute justice before the hot breath of your passions or your interests. And I think upon this point I have a conclusive argument, one that will go to the breasts of those to whom other considerations cannot successfully appeal; and that is, it is against your interests. He who assails justice embodied in her own court, who takes away the proper functions committed to the court under an honest law which you yourselves enacted, will not obtain popular favor, will not obtain the approval of the people, will reap no rich results in any future political harvest. Rather to him and to all concerned with him, when they attempt to pluck the ripe fruits of victory, those fruits will turn in their grasp to dust and ashes.

The question pro tempore. The question is, "Shall the bill pass notwithstanding the objections of the President of the United States?" On this question the Secretary will call the yeas and nays.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to state that Mr. GRIMES and Mr. JOHNSON are paired on this question. Mr. GRIMES, if here, would vote for the bill; Mr. JOHNSON against it. Mr. CORBETT and Mr. VICKERS are also paired. Mr. CORBETT, if here, would vote for the bill, and Mr. VICKERS against it.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 33, nays 9; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Cragin, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Davis, Dixon, Hendricks, McGroery, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, and Saulsbury—9.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Conness, Corbett, Doolittle, Drake, Fessenden, Fowler, Grimes, Johnson, Sherman, Sprague, and Vickers—12.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Two thirds of the members present having voted for the bill, it is passed notwithstanding the objections of the President; and it will be transmitted, with the objections, to the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPherson, its Clerk, announced that the House insisted on its disagreement to the second amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 900) to exempt certain manufactures from internal tax, insisted on its amendments to the third and fourth amendments of the Senate disagreed to by the Senate, and agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed Mr. R. C. SCHENCK of Ohio, Mr. SAMUEL HOOPER of Massachusetts, and Mr. W. E. NIBLACK of Indiana, managers at the same on its part.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference of the bill (S. No. 108) for the relief of Henry Greathouse and Samuel Kelly.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 328) to establish certain post roads; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at six o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 26, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PACIFIC RAILROAD FREIGHT TARIFF.

The SPEAKER stated that the first business in order was House joint resolution No. 168, to regulate tariff for freight and passengers on the Union and Central Pacific railroads and their branches, the pending question being on the demand for the previous question, on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] to refer the joint resolution to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

PRINTING OF REPORTS.

Mr. LAFLIN. I desire to report from the Committee on Printing the following resolutions, upon which I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House fifteen thousand and three hundred copies of the report of J. Ross Browne on the mineral resources.

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Treasury Department five hundred copies of the report of the commission on life-saving inventions.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to amend the first resolution by striking out "fifteen thousand" and inserting "one thousand."

Mr. LAFLIN. I have demanded the previous question on the resolutions.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. There is one demand for the previous question already pending.

The SPEAKER. That point of order being raised the resolutions cannot be received.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I object.

PACIFIC RAILROAD TARIFF—AGAIN.

The SPEAKER. The question before the House is on seconding the demand for the previous question on the motion to refer the joint resolution (H. R. No. 168) to regulate the tariff for freight and passengers on the Union and Central Pacific railroads and their branches to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. There is no quorum present, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] cannot get a vote on his motion, and I ask him to yield a few minutes for discussion until a quorum comes in.

Mr. PRICE. I presume a quorum will soon be here. The joint resolution, if it be referred, will be considered by the committee, and they will probably report it back on Wednesday next, and then gentlemen can have an opportunity of talking on it. I think the interests of the business of the House demand that the matter shall be disposed of now. The joint resolution has never been referred or even printed.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Let me say, in reply to the gentleman from Iowa, that the business of the House is not pressing and that the House cannot give its attention to a more important matter than this. I hope that, in a matter of so much importance, the friends of this measure will not attempt at this time to stifle discussion. The gentleman and his colleague [Mr. DOBBS] spoke for an hour yesterday, and made various reflections on gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. PRICE. The gentleman will excuse me—

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I think it is but fair that we should be heard for a few minutes only.

Mr. PRICE. There has been no stifling of discussion. The gentlemen on the other side have had an hour and a half to debate the matter. Let the joint resolution go to the committee, and when it is reported back it can be discussed.

Mr. HIGBY. I hope the House will not get a false impression from what has been said in reference to this matter. It is charged here that the Committee on the Pacific Railroad is unfriendly to having anything done with reference to this matter. That is untrue, entirely untrue, and the charge has been made without foundation. Now, I have only this to say, at some time I hope there will be discussion upon this question.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Wisconsin. Why not discuss the matter now?

Mr. HIGBY. Wait, if you please. It seems to me it would be more consistent, unless this House has lost all faith in the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, to refer this matter to that committee, have them consider it, and then, when they report upon it, there can be all the discussion necessary.

I am in favor of discussion; I wish to say something upon this subject myself. It will be borne in mind, however, that when this proposition first came before this House, on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. WASHBURNE,] its friends undertook to press it through under the operation of the previous question. There has now been an hour's speech made on each side. Now let the matter go before the committee, who can examine the present railroad law and see what can be done.

When I have the opportunity I think I shall be able to show that this proposition is in conflict with the railroad law as it now is, and that the proper way to accomplish the object gentlemen have in view will be to amend that law, unless we adopt a proposition to go into effect after the road is completed, which is not the one now urged by the gentleman from Wisconsin. I desire the House to understand that there is no disposition on the part of the committee, so far as I am acquainted, to have this matter suppressed, or to have the debate suppressed upon it. As to whether this resolution should go to that committee and receive their consideration, and then come back for debate, that is a question for the House to consider.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. My colleague [Mr. WASHBURNE] observed that there was no pressing business now before the House. I desire to say that the Committee on Reconstruction have ordered several reports to be made, and are only waiting an opportunity to make them. These are bills which, in the opinion of that committee, should be passed at once. Except the three days of this week, if we sit on Saturday for business, we shall probably not have much time for the consideration of business until the impeachment trial is over.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. If my colleague [Mr. FARNSWORTH] desires to save time, I would say to him that he could save it by allowing a little discussion on this matter now.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I have no objection to discussion. But it strikes me that it would be well to refer this joint resolution to a committee, have it printed, and then when it is brought back the House can discuss it to any extent. I hope, therefore, the previous question will be insisted upon.

Mr. HIGBY. I have no doubt the committee will be ready to report at any time it may be called by the House for reports.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Wisconsin. As the discussion yesterday reflected somewhat upon me, I would like to have a few moments before this matter is passed upon to explain to some extent the remarks I made the other day. I hope, therefore, the previous question will not be seconded, but that I will be allowed an opportunity to explain some misapprehensions which the two gentlemen from Iowa [Mr. PRICE and Mr. DOBBS] seemed to entertain in regard to the remarks I made the other day. As I said before, this is a very grave matter.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would suggest to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WASHBURNE] that he consent to allowing the previous question to be sustained if one hour of further debate is permitted upon this subject.

Mr. ALLISON. Who is to have that hour?

Mr. PRICE. I must insist upon my demand for the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move a call of the House. The friends of the railroad are all here—

Mr. PRICE. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. PRUYN. I would ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] to yield to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

Mr. PRICE. What is that?

Mr. PRUYN. To allow an hour more for debate.

Mr. PRICE. That is for the House to determine.

The question was upon the motion of Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, that there be a call of the House; and being taken, upon a division there were—ayes 33, noes 51; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WASHBURNE, of Wisconsin, and Mr. PRICE were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 40, noes 61.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. PRUYN. I hope the gentleman will waive that demand. Let it be agreed that we shall have one hour's discussion of this matter.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I did not distinctly hear the proposition of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. PRUYN.] If he will repeat it perhaps I may assent to it.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURNE] withdraw the call for the yeas and nays?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order without unanimous consent. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that a suggestion may be made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. PRUYN.]

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I object. I want the business disposed of.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Very well. I insist on the call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 45, nays 86, not voting 58; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Arnell, Bailey, Beatty, Cake, Coburn, Cook, Callom, Ferry, Fields, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Holman, Hotchkiss, Ingersoll, Johnson, Judd, Kelsey, Knott, Koonz, William Lawrence, Marshall, Maynard, Mullins, Niblack, Nicholson, Orth, Phelps, Plants, Spalding, Thaddeus Stevens, Taber, Taffe, Taylor, John Trimble, Van Aukens, Van Trump, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Thomas Williams, Wood, and Woodward—45.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Archer, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Barnes, Beaman, Book, Benjamin, Bingham, Boutwell, Brownell, Broomall, Buckland, Cary, Chanler, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Covode, Dawes, Dixon, Dodge, Driggs, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Gravelly, Griswold, Higby, Hill, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Huburd, Hunter, Jencks, Julian, Kelley, Kerr, Ketcham, Ladin, Lincoln, Loan, Mallory, McClurg, Meceur, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Morrissey, Mungen, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Perham, Pike, Pile, Poland, Polsley, Pomeroy, Price, Pruyn, Raun, Robertson, Ross, Sawyer, Scofield, Shanks, Smith, Aaron F. Stevens, Tieball, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, William B. Washburn, Welker, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—86.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Axtell, Barnum, Benton, Blaine, Blair, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Butler, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Cornell, Donnelly, Eckley, Ela, Eldridge, Finney, Gardfield, Grover, Haight, Halsey, Harding, Hawkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Jones, Kitchen, George V. Trimble, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Henry D. Washburn, and William Williams—88.

So the House refused to order a call.

During the roll-call,

Mr. GETZ said: I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. RANDALL] is detained from the House by serious sickness in his family.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

The question recurred on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I rise to a privileged question. I call up the motion made by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. WASHBURNE,] to reconsider the vote by which the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury relative to the Union Pacific railroad was ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order at the present time. The demand for the previous question, which is pending, prevents the calling up of any other business.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I give notice that, if the previous question be seconded and discussion cut off, I shall call up that motion to reconsider at the first opportunity.

On seconding the demand for the previous question there were—ayes 59, noes 40.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, and Mr. DODGE were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 63, noes 37.

So the previous question was seconded.

The question recurred on ordering the main question.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. On that question I demand the yeas and nays. Let us see who want to put a gag on the discussion of this question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 73, nays 54, not voting 62; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Benton, Bingham, Boutwell, Broomall, Buckland, Sidney Clarke, Covode, Dawes, Dixon, Dodge, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Griswold, Higby, Hill, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Hubbard, Jenckes, Johnson, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Lufkin, Lincoln, Loan, Mallory, Marshall, McClurg, McCormick, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Mungen, Myers, Newcomb, Nicholson, O'Neill, Plants, Poland, Polesie, Pomeroy, Price, Pruyn, Raum, Ross, Smith, Aaron F. Stevens, John Trimble, Twichell, Upson, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, William B. Washburn, Welker, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—73.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Bailey, Baker, Barnes, Beatty, Bromwell, Burr, Cary, Chanler, Coburn, Cornell, Cullom, Eggleston, Eldridge, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Halsey, Holman, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, Kelsey, Kerr, Koonitz, William Lawrence, Maynard, Moreau, Mullins, Niblack, Orth, Paine, Perham, Pike, Sawyer, Shanks, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Thaddeus Stevens, Stone, Taber, Taffe, Taylor, Van Auker, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Thomas Williams, Windom, Wood, and Woodward—54.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Axtell, Barnum, Beck, Benjamin, Blaine, Blair, Boyer, Brooks, Butler, Cake, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Ela, Finney, Garfield, Grover, Haight, Harding, Hawkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Humphrey, Jones, Ketcham, Kitchen, Knott, George V. Lawrence, Logan, Loughridge, Lynch, Marvin, McCarthy, McCullough, Morgan, Morrissey, Nunn, Peters, Phelps, Pile, Randall, Robertson, Robinson, Schoenck, Scofield, Selye, Shellabarger, Starkweather, Stewart, Stokes, Thomas, Lawrence S. Trimble, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Henry D. Washburn, and William Williams—62.

So the main question was ordered.

During the vote,

Mr. VAN WYCK stated that he was paired with Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania; otherwise he would vote "no."

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a privileged question. I make the request that, under the twenty-ninth rule of the House, the gentlemen who are interested in the result of this question may be permitted to withdraw their votes. If it be proper I make that point now.

The SPEAKER. That point cannot be made during a roll-call, as the gentleman from Indiana is aware.

Mr. HOLMAN. Must it be made before the roll-call?

The SPEAKER. It must. It cannot be made while the roll-call continues, and the roll-call continues until the Chair announces the result. Otherwise there might be roll-calls within roll-calls, the yeas and nays being ordered on the questions arising under the point of order.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The question recurred on the motion to refer to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Is it in order to move an amendment to the motion to refer?

The SPEAKER. It is not, as the previous question has been seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. PRICE. What reference does the gentleman propose?

Mr. INGERSOLL. The Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. PRICE. I do not object to its going to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask that this vote shall be considered as a test vote on this question; those in favor of the resolution will vote—

Mr. PRICE. I call the gentleman to order.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now rise for the purpose of asking the Clerk to read the twenty-ninth rule of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

"No member shall vote on any question in the event of which he is immediately and particularly interested, or in any case where he was not within the bar of the House when the question was put."

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 83, nays 49, not voting 57; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Archer, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Beck, Benjamin, Bingham, Boutwell, Broomall, Buckland, Cary, Chanler, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Covode, Dawes, Dixon, Dodge, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Griswold, Higby, Hill, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jenckes, Johnson, Kelley, Ketcham, Knott, Lufkin, Lincoln, Loan, Mallory, McClurg, McCormick, Miller, Moore, Morrell, Mungen, Myers, Newcomb, Nicholson, O'Neill, Perham, Phelps, Plants, Poland, Polesie, Pomeroy, Price, Pruyn, Raum, Robertson, Ross, Smith, Aaron F. #### MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States, was delivered to the House by Colonel WILLIAM G. MOORE, his Secretary.

REPORT ON MINERAL RESOURCES, ETC.

Mr. LAFLIN. I report from the Committee on Printing the following:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House fifteen thousand and three hundred copies of the report of J. Ross Browne on the mineral resources.

Also resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Treasury Department five hundred copies of the report of the commission on life-saving inventions.

Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to introduce these two resolutions together, and while I wish to demand the previous question I will yield to any gentleman who wishes to be heard.

If I correctly understood the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURNE,] he was disposed not to concur in the passage of the resolution. Perhaps he would desire to debate it. If any one desires to debate it I will yield a portion of my time for that purpose, simply remarking that, in my judgment, having carefully read the previous report of J. Ross

Browne, and having to some extent examined the manuscript of the report referred to in this resolution, I can say that since I have occupied my present position our committee has reported no resolution calling for the printing of extra copies which more fully meets my approval.

If the House, in accordance with the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois, shall see fit to amend this resolution by striking out "fifteen thousand," so as to leave it only three hundred, I shall certainly receive that as a most gratifying evidence of a decided improvement on the part of the House in a direction of which I shall endeavor to avail myself in the future whenever we may have occasion to submit reports of other kinds. But I submit to any intelligent member of the House that when we consider the vast importance of the mineral wealth of the United States, the large amount of money invested in their development, and when we consider also the ability, experience, candor, and integrity of the gentleman making this report, it certainly is not an extravagant number that is named in this resolution. If there is any one book that Congress publishes—I will not except even the agricultural report—which, in my judgment, will bring back to the Government a most profitable return for this small investment, I believe this report is of that character.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is needless for me to add more, and unless some one chooses to attack this report I will demand the previous question.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. Will the gentleman yield to me five minutes?

Mr. LAFLIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I do not rise, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of making any remarks against J. Ross Browne. He is an elegant and accomplished scholar and a most interesting writer. But I desire to say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAFLIN] and to members of this House that the report made by Mr. Browne last year was incorrect, from the title-page to the end, so far as it related to the resources of Montana; and I desire to state how he acquired his present statistics so far as Montana is concerned. The agent of Mr. Browne, Dr. Blatchley, of New York, furnished him with his facts, after a tour across the continent of sixty days. Now, will any man pretend to tell this House and the country that this Dr. Blatchley, passing across the continent for sixty days only, could make a report with any degree of accuracy in regard to the Territories of Montana, Idaho, Utah, Colorado, Washington, and the States of Oregon, Nevada, and California, and their immense resources, either mineral or agricultural?

Sir, I read this manuscript of Mr. Browne in his room, and I told him he must know it was not true. There are at least fifty gulches and hundreds of mines in the Territory of Montana that this man has never seen, as I know from my personal knowledge, because there are but few gulches in that Territory that I have not myself visited. The report is not correct in regard to Montana, and the reason why I object to the publication of it is simply that no false statement should go out to the people of the country with the sanction of Congress.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. It is impossible, Mr. Speaker, to hear the gentleman's statements on this side of the House. It is very important that we should know something about this matter before we vote on it.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. Mr. Speaker, the other day when this report was recommitted to the committee on my motion I thought that the committee ought to have consulted gentlemen who are acquainted with the Territory of Montana, such men, for instance, as Mr. Whitlock, who has been engaged in mining for the last ten or twelve years, and is one of the most intelligent miners in the country. Major Cullen, Mr. Hubbell, Mr. Bruce, Captain Huntley, and other intelligent gentlemen now in this city, who could have given the committee most valuable information as to the wonderful resources of this the youngest born of the Territories. Or, without being egotistical, they might have sent for myself or my friend from Idaho, [Mr. HOLBROOK,] who knows the country from one end to the other. We could have given them such information as might have been of use in reference to this report.

Mr. Browne can write elegantly and charmingly. He can delight us with the "Land of Thor," "Yusef," "The American Family in Germany," and fascinating sketches of frontier life, and pleasant tales, that certainly amuse, and perhaps instruct, but it is equally certain that statistics are not his forte. But, sir, when the Congress of the United States asks for a report upon the mineral resources of the country, they ought, at least, to have one that is true. You know, Mr. Speaker, that the mountains of Montana, of Colorado, of Utah, of Idaho, and of Arizona are filled with gold and silver. Rich jewels lie hidden in the mountains—the heart of the continent—that await only the busy hands of industry, aided by capital, to be plucked from their dark caverns and add to the world's wealth; but we want no bogus report made in relation to that country.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LAFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I am not here to controvert any of the statements which have been made to this House by the gentleman from Montana, [Mr. CAVANAUGH.] How far the author of this report has neglected to notice any particular mines, to subserve or to injure any private person's interests, I am unable to say. But I do say, with perfect confidence, that this is not the proper place in which to assail the integrity of J. Ross Browne.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. Will the gentleman allow me to set myself right?

Mr. LAFLIN. I must decline to yield. Anyone who reads the report presented by Mr. J. Ross Browne last year must become satisfied that if he did not render an honest and a candid report then he has most ingeniously convinced the community that he did so. I think every man who will examine that report will be satisfied that he has resisted all entreaties of interested miners and interested capitalists at the expense of truth to publish the value of their mines and increase the value of their property. For my part, I think that he has rendered the country an essential service, for which he deserves the thanks of this House and the thanks of the country; and I think, too, that if many of the capitalists of this country had read that report four years ago many of them would have been much richer, if not much wiser, than they are now. I now yield to the gentleman from Nevada for ten minutes.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada. If I understand the purport of the objection made against this report by the gentleman from Montana, [Mr. CAVANAUGH,] it is that it is not laudatory enough of Montana, and perhaps of Idaho. I, sir, consider, and so will every thinking man, that the best recommendation of that report is that Mr. Browne has not allowed himself to be carried away by the flattering accounts of enthusiasts, but that so far as the report does go it is at least true, and can be relied upon.

Mr. HOLBROOK. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada. Yes; if it is a short one.

Mr. HOLBROOK. I would ask the gentleman if he does not know that four fifths of the report is taken up with the description of mines in his own State, and more particularly of one mine—the Comstock ledge?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada. Mines deserve attention according to their magnitude, and if the Comstock ledge is described more extensively than any other in this report it is because it furnishes more than any twenty other mines in this whole country. It has furnished $80,000,000 within the last six or seven years, and when they can show any other mines that are equal to that they may justly make complaint if it is not noticed as extensively as this one.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. How many million dollars have the gold mines of Montana yielded in the last three years?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada. I will answer that question directly. That is the objection against J. Ross Browne's report. Now, then, that objection has little weight unless there be intentional and known mistakes made. The gentlemen who have asked me questions—the gentlemen from Montana and Idaho—have been to the room of Mr. Browne and have examined his report more extensively than I have, and I know, and so do they, that he has said to them, "I cannot take your statements simply, unless you bring me some proof that you have produced more gold and silver than is stated in my report."

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I desire to correct that statement here and now; so far as I am concerned, J. Ross Browne never said any such thing to me.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada. I do not care what the gentleman contradicts. Mr. Browne said that in his room and said it to the gentleman.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I deny that he said any such thing to me.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada. With the amount of compensation allowed him, and in the time which he had to prepare the volume, he could not travel all through that country from Lower California to the verge of Montana. He had to rely upon the vouchers of the shipments of gold and silver through express offices, and upon the statements of the most scientific writers that could be found in the different localities, as to the features of their particular localities.

I have sought the floor on this occasion more particularly on account of the attack made upon Dr. Blatchley, in connection with his report upon Montana. Now, I have known Dr. Blatchley for many years. I know that for fourteen or fifteen years he has devoted his time and attention almost exclusively to mining subjects in connection with the Pacific coast regions. I know, further, that in the various vicissitudes and exigencies that have arisen in the various portions of Montana, he is recognized to be as capable and expert a mineralogist as they have had there; not excepting even the noted individuals who have been sent from this coast as professors upon the subject. Although those professors might have been well read in books, they were not more so than is Dr. Blatchley; and they were woefully deficient in that experience which he has acquired, pick in hand, among those mountains.

Now, I venture to say, that although his report may not do Montana full justice—and I doubt whether it does—I claim that it contains all that he could be sure was correct. Now, if the gentleman from Montana [Mr. CAVANAUGH] could have proved by the shipping lists of the express offices that more metals had left Montana than was reported in that book, it would willingly have been incorporated there.

I have no doubt that as gold can be transported more easily than the same value of silver, much has been taken away from Montana which does not appear upon the lists of shipments. But the writer of books—the man who writes reports—must be relied upon as worthy of our consideration, even if he does not tell all that has been carried out in that way, if he tells the truth in all the respects about which he could inform himself.

Now, in this case, Mr. Browne has put in his book only what can be relied upon; that information which has been acquired from the sources to which I have referred, so that this Congress and the people to whom this book will be distributed can know that it is true to that extent, and that probably the full truth has not been reached. That is just the merit of this report.

I rise simply to vindicate this report, more especially than the other, by saying that there has been an attempt made in it to strike out the laudatory expressions, so as to rely simply upon the statements and facts he has been able to gather. For that reason this report deserves a consideration which it would not be entitled to if it indulged in high-sounding terms and statements.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CAVANAUGH. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAFLIN] yield to me for two minutes?

Mr. LAFLIN. I feel as though I would be trespassing upon the patience of the House if I should allow this debate to go on. But I will yield to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. CAVANAUGH] for two minutes.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. Say five minutes.

Mr. LAFLIN. Very well, five minutes: and after that I will yield to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. HOLBROOK] for five minutes.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I now desire to deal frankly and fairly by the House; I desire to deal frankly and fairly by this report; I intend to deal honestly and justly by Mr. J. Ross Browne. Personally there is not a man in the country whom I respect more, as an author or a gentleman, than Mr. Browne. But when my friend from Nevada [Mr. ASHLEY] pronounces a eulogy on Dr. Blatchley and his report, I will say that he must have reference to the report on Nevada, and not the report on Montana. Sir, he remained in Montana only three weeks, and I say here, and I challenge contradiction, that he never examined a mine in that Territory during all the time he was there. He may have used a pick and shovel in Nevada and California—and so have thousands of equally intelligent gentlemen—in every mining company in the Territories. But we are seeking after the truth, and I repeat that, so far as Montana Territory is concerned, that report is not true. I am not here for the purpose of making a stump speech in behalf of my Territory nor in behalf of the West. But when the Congress of the United States orders fifteen thousand copies of a certain report it should know that the report is true.

Now, sir, one word in reply to the remark of the gentleman from Nevada, [Mr. ASHLEY,] that I went to J. Ross Browne's room, and that he made the statement reported by the gentleman. I went to the room of J. Ross Browne, it is true, but at his request. Knowing from my own personal knowledge that his report of the year previous was false from the title-page to the conclusion in reference to my Territory, I read his report, stating to him wherein he was wrong. He was obliged to confess that his information as to the resources of Montana was obtained from Dr. Blatchley. Perhaps Mr. Browne is not to blame, but I do know that this man Blatchley spent most of his time in the saloons, on the streets, and not in the mines of that Territory.

When the gentleman from Nevada speaks of the Comstock lode sending to the States so many millions within the last six years, I ask him how many millions Montana has added to the nation's wealth? Why, sir, even J. Ross Browne himself has been forced, though reluctantly, to admit in his report that we sent to the States $65,000,000 within the last three years. The manifests of your steamers sailing from California show millions and millions of shipments annually. Where do they come from? They come from Idaho and Montana, from Oregon, from the northern mines. Because our merchants and the merchants of Oregon and of Washington Territory trade with San Francisco our gold is shipped to the East by way of San Francisco, and that city and State obtain credit thereby which rightfully belongs to Montana.

Mr. J. Ross Browne says in this report that our Territory has produced $12,000,000 the present year. If he had been correctly informed he must have known that we produced over twenty millions. I am not here, Mr. Speaker, to advertise Montana, her mines, or her agricultural resources. They speak for themselves, and require no eulogy from me.

"She springs a queen from verdant vales and mountains flecked with gold."

I simply ask members to examine carefully this report before ordering it to be printed, that this House may not be responsible for sending to the world statements which are false.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LAFLIN. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Idaho, [Mr. HOLBROOK.]

Mr. HOLBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I have only a word to say in regard to this proposition. The gentleman from Nevada, [Mr. ASHLEY,] in his remarks on this subject, seems to suppose that I am opposed to the printing of this report. Such is not the case. I believe the country will derive a vast amount of information from the report. It will call the attention of the eastern section of the country to our mines in the distant West. It will doubtless be the means to some extent of inducing capitalists to make investments in that country, which we at the present time very much need.

But, sir, I cannot allow that report to go unchallenged and uncontradicted, so far as its statements concern the Territory of Idaho. I do not mean to censure Mr. Browne for the report which he has made. Considering the comparatively small amount of the appropriation made by Congress for the purpose of carrying out this examination, it was impossible for Mr. Browne to go there and devote to the work the time necessary to enable him to make an accurate and truthful report. No man starting from New York and crossing this continent, passing over hundreds of thousands of square miles of mineral territory, and spending there a period of only about sixty days, could undertake to make a full and accurate report in regard to the mineral resources of that country.

A great portion of that report, however, I can heartily indorse, believing it to contain information valuable to the country; and I rose only for the purpose of correcting the impression which might have been created by the remarks of the gentleman from Nevada, that I oppose the printing of the report. My object was not to advertise the mines of Idaho.

Mr. LAFLIN. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from the San Francisco district.

Mr. AXTELL. Mr. Speaker, I do not think I shall wish to occupy the attention of the House for five minutes, and rise now simply to attract attention to the fact of the capability and capacity of J. Ross Browne to make this report. While I presume his personal history is well known to most of the gentlemen who have the honor to occupy seats here, yet it may not be known that he is one of the oldest and best-informed citizens of the Pacific coast, arriving there as early as 1849, being engaged in public affairs, part of the time in the employ of the Government and at other times in the employ of private companies. Again, as a prospector, he has traveled extensively over that country, more so perhaps than any man now living. And, sir, I call attention to this fact for this reason: any man may go from the Atlantic to the Pacific and travel through California, and yet be unable for want of the right knowledge to make a report on the country, either as to its agricultural or mining interests.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Was Mr. J. Ross Browne ever either in Montana or Idaho?

Mr. AXTELL. I cannot answer. I do not know whether he ever was there or not. I do not desire any controversy with the gentlemen who so ably represent those Territories. I wish the wealth of those Territories was fully understood by the people of the United States.

The point I wish to call attention to again is that J. Ross Browne has established such reputation for capacity and accuracy, he has such a character of mind for obtaining statistics and other information necessary to enable him to make such reports, that his reports to-day in California and elsewhere are, so far as I know, in greater demand by people who have actively prospected portions of that country than any other document issued by Congress on this or any other subject during this session—I mean any other report called for by Congress so far as my constituents are concerned. I receive constantly letters and requests desiring me to send forward copies of the report of J. Ross Browne on our mineral resources.

The scope and force of the objection of the gentlemen from the Territories who have spoken are that this report is in the nature of a romance; that, as he was a writer of romances before, he wrote his reports in the same vein. I understand that his book on Norway gives descriptions of what he saw. There is no romance, however, about figures. I have understood that from my boyhood, and have had a painful understanding of it. There is no romance in mathematics. This report is made up of facts and figures, and it cannot be said to be a romance because its writer happened to be an author of romances. And I desire it to be understood that the people of the Pacific coast are justly proud of J. Ross Browne, not only as a writer of fiction, but an accurate writer of facts, and we believe that when he claims to state what is true he does tell the truth.

Mr. HIGBY. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for five or ten minutes.

Mr. LAFLIN. I yield to the gentleman for five minutes.

Mr. HIGBY. I have not examined the manuscript of Mr. Browne, but I have given some examination to the report he made last year. The delegate from Montana [Mr. CAVANAUGH] has made a statement which, in his cooler moments, I think, he will withdraw. He said the last report was false from its title page to its conclusion.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I said only so far as Montana is concerned.

Mr. HIGBY. I did not so understand the gentleman, but I take his correction.

Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding I have not examined the manuscript, I am better satisfied with it possibly than I would have been before the remark of the gentleman from Montana. Mr. Browne, like other men, is expected to picture the imaginings of the people with respect to the gold and silver belt. Now, sir, we have had enough of such false things published to the people of the East, by which millions of capital have been induced to come from the East and West seeking investment, purely, sir, upon these false reports with reference to the mineral regions in the West and in the interior. I have taken some pains since I have been here to try to impart such knowledge on the subject that people would not be led off by false and delusive ideas upon this subject.

Now, sir, it must be very clear to members of this House that it is utterly impossible for one man to go through the whole belt of country and make these investigations. I know in my own part of the State a gentleman, who probably possesses as much knowledge as almost any other man on this subject, who has made it his business to travel and investigate the subject for a term of years. Not only that, but he has got up a work that is very creditable on account of its fullness and correctness. I allude to John S. Hittell, of the city of San Francisco. I do not pretend to say it is in every respect correct, for it is utterly impossible for any one man to accumulate information on this subject which shall be correct in every particular at this time. I know of regions of country in California that were condemned as mining districts fifteen years ago. The general impression was that they were worthless for mining purposes. And yet heaps upon heaps of gold have been taken out of these very belts. And, sir, I should not think it strange if information should be given to the country five years hence controverting some things which are contained in this book, and which are now generally believed to be true. If Mr. Browne has failed to carry out the imaginary ideas of all men throughout this mineral belt, I am glad he has been so reserved and cautious in what he has written.

Some gentlemen seem to be disappointed because Mr. Browne has not given everything at full length. But yet there is a great deal of merit in this report. It is utterly impossible to have investigated the whole mining region of Montana, Idaho, Colorado, Washington, and Arizona in six months, or even a year, and make a perfect report to Congress. Such information as it was possible for him to get I have no doubt he has presented to Congress. It is meager, I presume. I do not know how it could be otherwise.

Now, I know Mr. Hittell has traveled several months through my portion of the State, and I know the manner in which he has accumulated his information. If some men that he had to assist him were dilatory or indolent, and have in some respects failed to acquire all the knowledge they might have acquired, it is nothing strange when we consider the number of men necessarily employed in furnishing such an amount of information in reference to this belt of country.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LAFLIN. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has agreed to allow me to make an amendment reducing the number to five thousand two hundred.

Mr. LAFLIN. I am not aware of any such arrangement. [Laughter.] If the previous question is voted down he can offer his amendment.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I do not wish to have any misunderstanding, but I gave a valid consideration to the gentleman. I told him if he would permit me to offer this amendment I would give him my share of the copies. [Laughter.]

Mr. LAFLIN. But I told him that was altogether too selfish a consideration to suit me. [Laughter.] I renew the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolutions were adopted.

Mr. LAFLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (H. R. No. 328) to establish certain post roads; when the Speaker signed the same.

GREATHOUSE AND KELLY.

Mr. FARNSWORTH submitted the following privileged report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 108) for the relief of Henry Greathouse and Samuel Kelly, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate agree to the amendment of the House, with the following amendment, to wit: strike out the word "five" in the amendment of the House of Representatives, and in lieu thereof insert the word "eight," and that the House agree to the same as amended.

J. F. FARNSWORTH,
T. W. FERRY,

JAMES A. JOHNSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

P. G. VAN WINKLE,
A. RAMSEY,

JOHN CONNESS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. This claim of Kelly and Greathouse is for carrying the mails for one year upon certain routes in the Territories without any contract. The claim presented by them was, I think, for $25,000. By the Senate bill the accounting officers of the Post Office Department were directed to settle with them and pay them not exceeding $12,000. The House amended it by limiting the amount to $5,000. The Senate disagreed to that amendment and asked for a committee of conference. We have compromised the matter by agreeing that the amount shall not exceed $8,000, which is $4,000 less than the Senate had put it at in their bill and $3,000 more than our amendment.

The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. FARNSWORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPORT OF MR. COWDIN.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 18th ultimo, relating to the report of Mr. Cowdin, I transmit a report of the Secretary of State and the documents to which it refers.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, March 25, 1868.

The message and the accompanying documents were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REMOVAL OF JAMES B. STEADMAN.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in reply to a resolution of the House of the 23d instant calling for all the reasons assigned by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for asking the removal of James B. Steadman, United States collector at New Orleans, Louisiana; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

REPAIRS OF NEW YORK CUSTOM-HOUSE.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in response to a resolution of the House of the 26th of February, asking for the amounts paid for repairs on the New York custom-house during the past two years; which was referred to the Committee on Retrenchment, and ordered to be printed.

CHIPPEWA INDIANS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, submitting estimates of appropriations for the different bands of Chippewa Indians in Minnesota; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REMOVAL OF POLITICAL DISABILITIES.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the memorial of the constitutional convention of South Carolina, asking the removal of political disabilities from John D. Ashmore and forty-two others, citizens of South Carolina; which was referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

PROTEST OF KENTUCKY LEGISLATURE.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Governor of Kentucky, transmitting the memorial of protest of the Legislature of Kentucky against the constitutional wrong and injustice of refusing their just representation in the House of Representatives.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky. I move that the communication and protest be referred to the Committee of Elections and printed in the Globe.

The motion was agreed to.

The communication of the Governor and the protest are as follows:

STATE OF KENTUCKY, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
FRANKFORT, March 17, 1868.

SIR: In compliance with the request of the Legislature of this Commonwealth, I have the honor to inclose you the within memorial of protest adopted by that body during the late session.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN W. STEVENSON.

Memorial of Protest.

The General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, acting for and on behalf of the people of Kentucky, are constrained to enter a most earnest and solemn protest against the great constitutional wrong and manifest injustice which has been done this people in the failing and refusing to admit their just representation on the floor of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, on the presentation of their legal certificates of election, duly authenticated, and each of the said representatives possessing all the qualifications prescribed by the Constitution of the United States.

We solemnly protest against the assumption of power to make and apply new tests and qualifications for membership, not only not authorized by or contemplated in, but we hold clearly prohibited by, the Federal Constitution, as nothing less than a usurpation culminating in violation of vested right and an assault upon the liberty of a free people.

The essential principle of our free government is that it is the Government of the people, made by the people, and carefully framed with the special view of reserving all power in the people which it was not found essential to concede, and which was not actually given by the Constitution to their representatives and public servants.

It being impracticable for the people to assemble in mass and deliberate upon measures of public policy, representative agents of the people are at once a palpable necessity, and the highest object of the Constitution is to define and limit their powers and duties. The Representative is but the agent of the people, and the Constitution is the warrant of his authority. It is his power of attorney, and he cannot transcend the limit of its authority. Nay, he is required to make solemn oath to support the Constitution and be bound by its restrictions.

The Constitution plainly enumerates and defines the powers of Congress; and by all rules of legal interpretation that body could assume no power not expressly granted therein. But the people, jealous of the growing anxiety of their agents for more power, and fearing their public servants should aspire to rule as masters, determined, after a short experience, to add the tenth amendment to the Constitution, which provides that—

"The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people."

The force of this constitutional inhibition is in nowise weakened as regards the Congress, because it applies alike to all the departments of the United States Government. It is the people saying plainly to their public servants in the United States Government, "You have your warrant of authority; whatever powers are not expressly given you in the Constitution we, the people, reserve to our State governments and to ourselves."

Where, therefore, the Federal Constitution, in the second section of the first article, provides that "No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained the age of twenty-five years, and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen," it has defined all the qualifications which may be exacted by any power or authority, save and except that each House may require, in addition, satisfactory evidence that a member has been legally elected.

The provision of the fifth section of the first article, "That each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members," means only this, and can be made to mean nothing more. Nor can the qualification be altered or enlarged indirectly by the requirement of an amplified oath; for the Constitution not only prescribes and defines all the qualifications that may be exacted, but as plainly and definitely declares the oath which shall be required of a Representative in Congress. In the third clause of article six is provided: "The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support this Constitution."

Considering, then, the restrictions of the tenth amendment, before quoted, what authority has Congress to add to the substance of this oath; and how may it be done without a direct infraction of one of the dearest rights of the people therein reserved—the right to elect whom they may choose, possessing the qualifications defined in the Constitution, as their Representative? To deny the right of any people to elect a Representative of their own choosing is practically to deny them the right of franchise, or any participation in framing the policy of their Government. Their election is a mockery if a ruling power may direct for whom or for what class of men their polls shall be cast; and when they submit to this their liberty is destroyed and they are made slaves.

But beyond all questions of power we earnestly protest and utter a solemn warning against the dangerous precedent of amplifying the prerequisite qualifications or the oath of office to conform to the views of the ruling majority, as conceding a power which Congress not only does not, but ought not, possess. Such power would always be capable of the greatest abuse, and lead necessarily to the most deplorable practices. The tendency of a test-oath on political sentiments is to perpetuate the ascendancy of the party in power; and the authority once established the temptation to use it for that object becomes too strong for resistance in times of high political excitement and rancor. If this Congress may apply through the oath of office a test of present or past political sentiments, another Congress, controlled by the devotees of the Grand Army of the Republic, may require that each member shall swear to having actually served a specified term in the Army or Navy. Or, the tables being turned and that great organization vanquished in its struggle for supremacy, another Congress may enact an oath that would disqualify for membership any one having served in the Army or Navy of the United States.

Political enthusiasms are often epidemic, and carry the populace, for the time being, on a single idea. A party predicated on one idea, (as anti-masonry, know-nothingism, &c., in the past), attaining a majority in Congress, would seek to perpetuate its ascendancy by requiring an oath of admission to conform to its peculiar tenets.

And so protesting, in the name of the people of Kentucky, and of their great chart of liberty, the Constitution, the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky does hereby declare:

1. That in a Republican Government the right of representation is a franchise which the people may not safely relinquish, and of which they cannot be deprived and remain free. The right of a people to representation implies the right for them to choose their Representatives, and a denial of the latter involves a destruction of the former; hence a government is no longer republican when this right of the people is destroyed.

2. The Constitution of the United States, which is the creature of the States, and which constitutes the only bond of the Federal Union, prescribes the qualifications which must be possessed by members of Congress; also the mode of choosing them, and the right conferred by the Constitution on each House of Congress to "judge of the election, qualification, and returns of its members," does not authorize the denial of representation to the people of a State or district, nor authorize the application of any new or additional tests or qualifications for membership.

3. To reject a Representative duly chosen, because of any political sentiments which he may have held or may hold, is at once a flagrant violation of the Constitution and a ruthless annihilation of freedom itself; because freedom consists in the right to be represented by whomsoever a majority may select: Provided, There be no disqualification in the member so chosen embraced within the provisions of the Federal Constitution.

4. Each and every of the Representatives elected by the people of the State of Kentucky to the Fortieth Congress was not only duly elected, but possessed all the qualifications required by the Constitution, and the exclusion for a single day of any one of them upon the grounds alleged by the controlling power in the House of Representatives was an infraction of the constitutional rights of the people which demands our most unqualified denunciation; and in the name of an injured and outraged people we do most solemnly and earnestly protest against such action, which, if persisted in and established as the policy of the Government, will render the elective franchise a farce, and what we have been taught to regard as constitutional liberty but a solemn mockery.

Resolved, That his Excellency, the Governor of this Commonwealth, be requested to forward a copy of this declaration, duly certified, to the President of the United States, to the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress, and to the Governors of each of the States, with a request that it be laid before their respective Legislatures.

JOHN T. BUNCH,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

WILLIAM JOHNSON,

Speaker of the Senate.

Approved March 9, 1868.

JOHN W. STEVENSON.

By the Governor:

S. B. CHURCHILL, Secretary of State.

Mr. CHANLER. I move to reconsider the votes by which the communications were severally referred; and to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I rise to a privileged question. I call up the motion submitted on the 26th of February by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WASHBURN] to reconsider the vote by which the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury relative to the Union Pacific railroad was ordered to be printed.

I congratulate my friend from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] on his success in preventing my being heard this morning by getting the previous question on his motion to commit the joint resolution to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, of which he is chairman; and, as I have now an hour to discuss this question of the Pacific railroad just as fully as I would have had if the gentleman had yielded to me, I will yield ten or fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. WASHBURN.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I was desirous at the close of the remarks of the chairman of the Pacific Railroad Committee [Mr. PRICE] and his colleague [Mr. DODGE] yesterday of making a few remarks in reply and in explanation of what I had previously uttered on this floor, thinking that I had in some respects been misunderstood, and that it was but right that I should have a few moments for explanation. But, sir, so determined were the friends of this great monopoly to stifle discussion that they resisted every appeal that I could make to allow me even that poor privilege. That I am now enabled to defy all attempts to silence discussion is in no degree due to the friends of these roads, but in spite of them. It is simply due to the fact that I had the foresight some time since to enter a motion to reconsider a vote upon a proposition connected with the Pacific railroad. I entered that motion because I thought an occasion might arise such as has actually arisen here.

Now, I wish to advert very briefly to what was said by my friend from Iowa, the chairman of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, [Mr. PRICE.] He said we should not have been heard here upon this subject had it not been for what he called the unfair course which I had pursued toward his committee. Now, I beg to assure him, and to assure every member of that committee, that I believe I have pursued no unfair course toward them; that I have said nothing here which the facts did not warrant me in saying; that I was not perfectly justified in saying. It was the last thing in my thought to reflect upon that committee, and I did not in any way reflect upon them. I stated that I had become satisfied when I offered the resolution that there would be great delay in reporting, even if the resolution did not sleep in the committee "the sleep that knows no waking," which I feared it would.

That was the language to which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] took exception. How far he was justifiable in taking exception to that remark a few facts will show.

Now, for the facts upon which I based that declaration, and I will leave the House and the country to judge whether or not I had good reason to believe that the committee intended to let that bill sleep on, whether they were friendly or unfriendly to it. I introduced that bill as long ago as the 9th of December, and it was referred to the Pacific Railroad Committee. Nothing having been heard from it, and thinking that perhaps the committee would not be called for some time, or that there might be very considerable delay, I introduced, on the 17th of February, the joint resolution which was discussed yesterday. A motion was made to lay that joint resolution on the table. Who voted against laying it on the table? Certainly not my friend from Iowa.

Mr. PRICE. Do me the justice to say that I did not vote the other way.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I will; I was going to say that. I will say that he was not found voting at all, from which I certainly had the right to infer that he was not particularly friendly to the joint resolution. There are three members of the committee who did not vote; I do not know why. I did not at the time notice whether they were present or not; but I have directed my attention to the matter since, and I find that my friend from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] did not vote for the proposition.

I will say, however, that in conversation with him afterward I understood him to say that he was in favor of some such proposition as this. I have stated that before, and I state it now. And I will state further, that notwithstanding that I had reason to believe the committee, as a committee, would not report in favor of such a proposition as this. I think I had good reason for believing that the committee was unfriendly to the proposition, because on the 12th instant the question again came up, and but a single member of the committee voted in favor of it—my friend from Iowa, [Mr. PRICE;] Mr. DONNELLY and Mr. MALLORY voting to lay it on the table, and the rest of the committee not voting. Now, I suppose, that may not be entirely inconsistent with his declaration that he was in favor of such a proposition; but then I had no reason from that vote to think he was warmly in its favor.

The gentleman says in his speech that I ought to have known that the committee intended to report it, because he had told me so. Well, he did tell me that the committee intended to report something, and that they were considering the matter; and he said yesterday that the committee had instructed him to write to these different companies and find out what their earnings and expenses were, and what they thought would be right.

Now, if the committee are friendly to this proposition it is most astonishing that they should wait until they could hear what the wishes of these railroad companies are. The calling on these companies to learn what should be done to protect the people sounds very like some fable I have read at some time. Now, my friend represents a State blessed with vast flocks of sheep, and, if I mistake not, a colleague of his in the last Congress was a great shepherd. Now, what would be thought of that former colleague if, when his sheep appealed to him for protection against the wolves, whom they alleged were claiming more mutton than enough to satisfy their reasonable appetites, he should say to them, "I have written to the wolves to know if they are not going it rather too strong, and to ask if they could not suggest some measure by which you may be restricted in your forays upon my flocks?" It occurs to me that that would be about a parallel case to that of my friend from Iowa calling on those roads for information; and, if I mistake not, I read in Æsop's Fables, when I was a boy, a fable very much resembling something of this kind.

Now, sir, the gentleman seemed to think that because I commented upon the acts passed in 1862 and 1864 I was therefore making a wholesale condemnation of the members of the Congresses that passed those acts. He is justified in drawing no such inferences. Those acts are matter of record, and they are fit subjects for comment here or elsewhere; and because I disapprove an act it by no means follows that I call in question the action of the members who carried that act through. The gentleman will not undertake to deny that he has had occasion to comment unfavorably upon acts of Congress when he would by no means intend to comment in unfavorable terms upon those whose judgment induced them to vote for such acts.

Now, sir, I am the last man who would attribute any improper motives to my friend from Iowa. I know perfectly well why he voted in favor of this Pacific railroad act. He felt, as the country felt, that the road was a necessity; and as I have heretofore remarked, it is the disposition of our people when they want a thing not to look far into the future; not to count the cost; not to look far forward to see the consequences. I think it was in this respect that my friend from Iowa was at fault.

Hence he did not take care to provide proper guards. The country was at war at the time, and war was the great absorbing topic, and we were then in the habit of voting such vast sums that many measures passed without proper scrutiny. Certainly no man who knows my friend from Iowa would attribute to him any improper motives in voting for such a bill as this. But, sir, I do say that the act of 1864 was very insufficiently guarded. I say, as I have said before, (and no man here has attempted to deny it, for it cannot be denied,) that every restriction embodied in the act of 1862 for the protection of the people was wiped out by the act of 1864. That the gentleman from Iowa has not attempted to controvert. He has not attempted to controvert any proposition which I submitted, but he has addressed himself to these little matters which are of no consequence, so far as the country is concerned. I did expect that he would try to meet and answer some of the points I made, but, sir, he failed entirely to do so, and my speech stands to-day unanswered, and, I may say, unanswerable.

Now, sir, I subscribe entirely to what the gentleman said in regard to reputation. He quoted Shakspeare and quoted it well, and with good effect; but, sir, "it is a good divine that follows his own teachings." Now, when I was on the floor before, I thought it due to the road to say (because, as I have said repeatedly) I feel most friendly toward it, that I believed its bonds were as good security as there possibly could be. I said it because I believed it, and I did not mean to say anything that was not true or anything to injure this road. But the gentleman from Iowa thinks otherwise, and if so, it is right the public and the road should have the benefit of his opinion. He said that it occurred to him that somebody must have bonds to sell, or I would not have made that declaration. Well, now, after having spoken eloquently and justly in regard to attributing improper motives to men, I thought it a little strange that the gentleman should make such an observation as that. If he would allow me to quote Shakspeare (I cannot begin to quote it as well as he) I would say to him—

"Do not, as some ungracious pastors do,
Show me the steep and thorny way to heaven;
Whilst,
Himself the primrose path of dalliance treads,
And recks not his own read."

I know it was a loose observation on the part of the gentleman. He did not intend, I know, to imply that in what I said in regard to the bonds of these railroads I was influenced by any personal interest of myself or any friends of mine. If he did, let me say here that I never owned a Pacific railroad bond; I never saw one; I have no friend, so far as I know, who owns one; I know of no man upon the face of the earth who owns one. If he wishes it to go out that in the declaration I made in regard to the security of these bonds that I was in error, be it so.

The gentleman, when he spoke of my allusion to the Oregon bill, misconstrued my language, as he will see if he reads it again. I stated then and there that I understood the gentleman was opposed to it; and I did not say that the committee was in favor of it at all. I referred to the matter to show that these schemes were pressing upon Congress. He will not deny that there is such a scheme before that committee; and, sir, "their name is legion." In this morning's Chronicle I see the description of another Pacific railroad scheme, to build a road from Cairo down through Arkansas, New Mexico, Old Mexico, and the Lord knows where; and it is commended very kindly to the consideration of Congress.

And, sir, I allude to all these simply that members may understand the extent of these schemes; for I will undertake to say there are Pacific railroad schemes now on foot which would require at least two hundred or two hundred and fifty million dollars in subsidies if they are carried out.

Now, sir, I had occasion before to comment on what is called the Sioux City railroad. I stated some facts which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] yesterday undertook to controvert. I have a little map here which will show any man who has any curiosity on the subject whether I was in error or not. I stated then, and this map will show I was correct in all I have before said on this subject.

THE SPEAKER. The gentleman's fifteen minutes have expired.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman five minutes farther.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Now, sir, it was stated by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] that the change in the law of 1864 was at the express solicitation of the gentlemen from Minnesota. The members from Minnesota were not present when the statement was made, and I could not deny it then. I could not believe it to be true; I could not believe that the members from Minnesota would have sacrificed the interests of their State, as it seems to have been sacrificed, and as I see one member from that State now present, I beg to inquire of him whether he consented to any change of the law by which the Sioux City railroad was to be built in another direction than that provided in the act of 1862?

Mr. WINDOM. I will answer the gentleman's question. I wish to say that I never did consent to it, and one of the chief complaints I have had to make against the Pacific Railroad Committee is that, by some manner of means unknown to myself, it secured this alteration. When the bill was first introduced I insisted on it as it was passed, and that was made the condition upon which it was passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. That is what I stated in my speech, and I thought I was not in error.

I will state further that the act of 1864 in no way changed the act of 1862 except in this respect, that it released the Union Pacific railroad from its obligation to build the road from Sioux City to join the Union Pacific railroad, and to authorize, but not required, another road to build it; but, sir, it did not change in any manner the direction of the road. It required the road should be upon the nearest and most practicable route.

Mr. ALLISON. I only desire a moment, Mr. Speaker, to make an explanation of what I stated yesterday in reference to the Minnesota delegation. I then stated that I believed they were in favor of that legislation. I was called upon this morning by the gentleman from the southern district of Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM,] and he said that he did not assent to it. Therefore, sir, to that extent I did him injustice. But I remember the matter distinctly, and I call on the chairman of the Pacific Railroad Committee to say whether it is so or not, whether the Minnesota delegation did not press upon that committee the exact change made with reference to the Sioux City branch?

Mr. PRICE rose.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I cannot be further interrupted.

I wish to call the attention of the House and the country again to the fact that no material allegation I made here in my speech has been disputed. They cannot be disputed.

If I had time I should like to review the remarks of the other member from Iowa, [Mr. DODGE,] but I am limited, and cannot do it. He makes out the best case possible for the road. He has done that well as he does everything well; but he makes no case, and he can make none impeaching what I stated in my speech.

It is well known, Mr. Speaker, that a measure of this kind commends itself to the favor of the country, and it is strange that such opposition should be developed here.

My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] heard "a lion in the lobby roar" the other day, and was frightened nearly out of his wits; but now here is a whole drove of lions surrounding and besieging the Capitol, "meager, gaunt, and grim," licking their very chaps and peering in at our very doors, and yet the gentleman from Massachusetts is as unconcerned as was Daniel in the lion's den.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's five minutes have expired.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I would have much preferred to have submitted my remarks when the question to refer the joint resolution was before the House for action; but my esteemed and honorable friend from Iowa, [Mr. PRICE,] my neighbor, who represents a district right across from mine, on the other side of the "great Father of Waters," refused to yield to me for that purpose. Now, sir, I am at a loss to know the reason which induced him to press upon us the previous question, refusing a full discussion of this subject. Certainly, sir, he must have known that nothing I could have said would have detracted from the effect of the eloquent speech he made yesterday, and I regret he so persistently refused me the privilege of saying a few words at that time, as my purpose was simply to review the legislative history of this Pacific railroad business in 1864, which, being familiar with, I beg leave to assure gentlemen is a very interesting history.

Mr. PRICE. Will the gentleman allow me to say why I did not permit him?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will not treat you as you treated me. I am a Christian, and return good for evil. [Laughter.]

Mr. PRICE. And you might add "and a member of Congress." I say to the gentleman what is the truth in reference to this matter, that I had promised half a dozen friends I would call for the previous question on the motion to refer, and I could not help it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am very sorry for that, that my friend from Iowa comes up here and acknowledges he had pledged himself to call the previous question on so important a matter, so as to cut off all discussion.

Mr. PRICE. Having promised I was bound to perform.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry the gentleman was betrayed into such promises. I now desire to say that after the extraordinary developments touching the Union Pacific Railroad Company as to the character of the company, the gigantic power which it is commencing to exercise, its extortions from, and its oppressions of, the people; after the disclosure of the illegal and fraudulent issue of hundreds of thousands of Government bonds to enable a private company to build a railroad in the State of Iowa, in a southeast direction, under the pretext of building a Pacific railroad, the question has become one of national importance and magnitude, and as such must attract universal attention. I come not here to speak of the original act of 1862. That act had its inception in a spirit of liberal and enlightened legislation, and was passed in the interest of the Government; while it made the most liberal provisions for the purpose of accomplishing the work, it yet guarded the rights of the public. But I come to speak more particularly of the amended act of 1864—an act surrendering nearly all the rights reserved to the people—and, as that act has challenged the severest criticism, and is likely to become historical, I propose to put on record the history of its passage through the House of Representatives.

The Thirty-Eighth Congress met on the 7th of December, 1863, and on the 16th of that month the Speaker appointed a select committee on the Pacific railroad consisting of Messrs. STEVENS of Pennsylvania, Wilder, Steele of New York, PRICE, Cole, Noble, DOXNELEY, McBride, Steele of New Jersey, McCLEURG, AMES, Yeaman, and Sweat.

On the 16th of March following, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] introduced, by unanimous consent, a bill entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,'" approved July 1, 1862; which was referred to the Pacific Railroad Committee. (Congressional Globe, volume 51, page 1142.)

On the 2d of June the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] reported back this bill, as introduced by the gentleman from Iowa, with a substitute, which was ordered to be printed, and its consideration postponed for one week. (Congressional Globe, volume 52, page 2671.) On the 10th of June the bill was again brought before the House and went over as unfinished business. (Congressional Globe, volume 52, page 2842.) On the 16th of June this bill came before the House at a night session. The gentleman from Indiana, from the Aurora district, [Mr. HOLMAN,] moved an amendment, as follows:

"And that said road shall be a public highway, and shall transport the property and troops of the United States, which transportation thereof shall be required free from all toll or other charge."

That proposition was discussed until the hour expired that evening for the consideration of the bill. The gentleman from Indiana pressed his amendment upon the House with great ability and energy, and was replied to by a member of the Pacific Railroad Committee, [Mr. Steele, of New York,] who, in the course of his remarks, said:

"And here allow me to disagree with my distinguished friend from Indiana in the idea that the men who are engaged in this great public enterprise are engaged only with the hope of making money. I could name to him many patriotic men who have come forward with their $10,000 and $20,000 to put into this road, for the purpose of encouraging the enterprise—and I need not go out of this House to find some of those examples—without any hope or expectation of ever being pecuniarily benefited by the advance thus made."

The gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] in reply to Mr. Steele, said he was startled, as a Representative on this floor, when it was said—at a moment when we were voting away $95,000,000 of the public treasure and uncounted bodies of the public land without any recompense whatever—to hear the intimation made by the gentleman from New York, that benevolent men on this floor had stock in the corporation by which this road is to be constructed.

Mr. Steele, in reply to Mr. HOLMAN, said that this subscription was made by members of Congress as a matter of patriotism, and assailed the gentleman from Indiana in a manner in which it is fashionable to assail all men now who propose to save anything to the Government, charging that his—

"Ideas were so contracted and belittled by looking at small expenditures, that he could not appreciate the possibility of a man having patriotism enough to invest in a work of great public necessity for the purpose of encouraging that work, without some idea of dollars in it."

The bill went over until the 17th of June. On the 18th the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] urged that action be taken upon it; but in this he was antagonized by Mr. Rice, of Massachusetts, chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, who claimed that that day had been set apart for the consideration of reports from the Committee on Naval Affairs; and it was postponed.

The consideration of the bill was again resumed in the evening session of June 21, and no gentleman who was here at that time will ever forget the extraordinary scene which was presented. The lobby mustered in its full force. I say nothing here of the shameful means which it is alleged were used in a "confidential way" to carry through this bill; but I do say that the scene was one of the most exciting and animated that I have ever witnessed in a service of nearly sixteen years. The galleries were packed with people interested in the measure, by lobbyites, male and female, and by shysters and adventurers, hoping for something to "turn up." Your gilded corridors were filled with lobbyists, who broke through all rules and made their way upon the floor and into the seats of members. The amendment referred to, of the gentleman from Indiana, was first up for consideration, and I felt it to be my duty to speak on the general character of the bill. I undertook to show by a Senate document, which I hold in my hand, the amount of the liability for bonds issued and interest thereon under the law for the purpose of building a Pacific railroad would be $95,088,000; but which document I am advised somewhat overstates the amount, as the estimate was made upon a greater number of miles than the real length of the road.

But the amount of the liability was, at any rate, so enormous that even at that era of vast and unheard-of appropriations of the public money it should have alarmed the Representatives of the people and challenged the closest attention. In my speech on that occasion I compared the different sections of the original law of 1862 with the modifications proposed by the act of 1864, which we were then considering. I beg leave to read from the Congressional Globe, volume fifty-three, page 3152, some remarks which I then made:

"I come now to the tenth section of the bill, and I confess to a sort of admiration of the sublime audacity which parties must have to come here and ask Congress to enact such a provision into a law. I have called attention to other provisions of an extraordinary nature, but this proposed enactment throws all others far into the shade, and stands out in bold relief as an indication of the 'base uses' that this company have conceived the Congress may be put to in their behalf. I carefully read the section that every gentleman may know its exact meaning and purport:

"Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That section five of said act be so modified and amended that the Union Pacific Railroad Company, the Central Pacific Railroad Company, and any other company authorized to participate in the construction of said road, may issue their first mortgage bonds on their respective railroads and telegraph lines to an amount not exceeding the amount of the bonds of the United States authorized to be issued to said railroad companies respectively. And the lien of the United States bonds shall be subordinate to that of the bonds of any or either of said companies hereby authorized to be issued on their respective roads, property, and equipments. And said section is further amended by striking out the word 'forty' and inserting in lieu thereof the words 'on each and every section of not less than twenty.'"

"Now, it will be recollected that the fifth section of the existing law provides for the repayment of the bonds issued to the company, and declares that the issue and delivery of them to the company shall ipso facto constitute a first mortgage on the whole line of road and telegraph, together with the rolling stock. This was the security which Congress had a right to demand of any company that should be organized. It was its duty to require it, unless it was intended to surrender everything and place the most gigantic interests at the feet of the company without control and without challenge. We donated, as I have before stated, millions upon millions of acres of the public lands for this purpose; then we agreed to give our bonds for the amount, with the interest thereon, of $96,000,000, and if Congress had required less than a first mortgage as its security it would, in my judgment, have been derelict in duty to the country, whose interests in this regard it can alone protect."

"What is now proposed by this amendment? I demand that gentlemen shall look at it; let the mirror be held up to nature. Nothing less than that the Government, with its liability of a hundred millions, shall relinquish its first mortgage and subordinate its lien to the liens of all the companies created for building the road. The bonds of the United States are to be issued to the company, and the Government is to have no prior lien for its security; but by this provision the company, representing as it may but one per cent, or a little over of the amount that the Government is liable for, is to subordinate that Government to its own interests, raise money on the security of the means that the Government has furnished, give a first mortgage for the security of that money, and leave the United States as a second mortgagee, obliged to pay off the first mortgage before it can be in a position to take advantage of any security there might by possibility be as a second mortgagee. But who is wild enough to believe that, should the provisions of this section become a law, the remaining security of the Government will be worth a straw? It is worse than idle to contend that we shall have any security left for all our liability if this bill shall pass. And further, by the fifth section of the law bonds cannot be issued till forty consecutive miles of the road are fully completed and equipped. It is now proposed by this tenth section to strike out forty and make it twenty. This company, not content with snatching from the Government the security it now holds for the bonds it issues, cannot even wait to finish the forty miles of road at present required before grabbing what is proposed to put into their hands, but they must cut it down so that they can go in on twenty miles. Sir, on my responsibility as a Representative, I pronounce this as the most monstrous and flagrant attempt to overreach the Government and the people that can be found in all the legislative annals of the country. When we look at the original law with all its liberal and just provisions, when we look at the company organized under it and see how far it has failed to meet its proper obligations, and consider the extraordinary amendments here proposed, are we not filled with astonishment at what is demanded of us as the guardians of the people's rights? Indeed may we now exclaim:

"Can such things be,
And overcome us like a summer's cloud,
Without our special wonder?"

I desire here to state, in justice to my distinguished friend from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON,] that he proposed an amendment to the bill which was adopted, and which in effect secured the lien provided in the sixth section of the act of 1862, notwithstanding the provision of the bill declaring the bonds issued to the company a first lien upon the road.

After closing my speech the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. PRICE,] from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, replied to me with his usual vehemence and zeal, justifying the bill, and urging with all his power its adoption by the House. He was followed by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] both gentlemen addressing most of their remarks in reply to the observations I had the honor to submit, the gentleman from Iowa alluding to a conversation he had overheard between some gentlemen near him, in which it was said that if the things I had charged against the bill were true "it ought not to pass." But it did pass.

Finally, before the close of that evening session, the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana requiring that the property and troops of the Government transported over this road should be carried free of charge came up for action. The gentleman from Indiana expressed the hope that as it was ten o'clock a vote should not be taken until there should be a fuller House.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania replied that the House was full enough, and as gentlemen understood the amendment they might as well dispose of it now as at any other time. And the House did dispose of that amendment, so reasonable, so proper, and so just, by rejecting it, by a vote of 39 yeas to 82 nays, as follows:

"YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Cobb, Coffroth, Cravens, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Finck, Hale, Harding, Herrick, Holman, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Knapp, Marcy, Middleton, James R. Morris, Nelson, Norton, Orth, Pike, Samuel J. Randall, Stiles, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Elihu B. Washburne, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, and Williams—39."

"NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, Beaman, Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brooks, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cole, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, English, Fenton, Frank, Ganson, Garfield, Gooch, Grider, Griswold, Benjamin G. Harris, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Lagersoll, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Knox, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, Morrison, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Noble, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Perham, Pomeroy, Price, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Ross, Schenck, Scott, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stevens, Stuart, Sweet, Thayer, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Wadsworth, Ward, William B. Washburne, Whaley, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Winfield—82."—Congressional Globe, vol. 53, p. 3156.

I wish the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] could have had an opportunity to explain to the House and to the country his reasons for voting against an amendment of that kind after having given this company the enormous subsidies and untold millions of acres of land, equal to twice the area of Great Britain and Ireland. I wish he could have given a reason for not imposing that condition upon this railroad company when it had been imposed on every other railroad built by a grant of land.

On the 22d of June the House again resumed the consideration of this bill, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] got on an amendment for a grant of land for the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company. A long discussion followed on many of the provisions of the bill, participated in by Mr. Sweet, of Maine, a member of the Pacific Railroad Committee, and by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. PRYOR,] who, though connected with the building of the road, was not satisfied with the bill, with that sense of honor which belongs to him, refused to vote, furnishing an example that might well be followed.

On the 21th of June (Congressional Globe, volume 53, page 3244) I moved to strike out the tenth section, which provided that the Union Pacific Railroad Company, the Central Pacific Railroad Company, and any other company authorized to participate in the construction of said road, might issue the first mortgage bonds of their respective railroad and telegraph lines to an amount not exceeding the amount of the bonds of the United States authorized to be issued to said railroad companies respectively, and that the lien of United States bonds should be subordinated to that of the bonds of any or either of said companies which were thereby authorized to be issued by said railroad companies on their respective roads, property, or equipments; and which provided, further, that the fifth section of the original act should be further amended by striking out "forty" and inserting in lieu thereof "on each and every section of not less than twenty." And other startling provisions were in the bill doubling the amount of land, making a grant amounting to more than double the area of Great Britain and Ireland, as I have before said. Upon that amendment the yeas and nays were ordered, and that section, thus subordinating the security of the United States to that of these companies was retained, and the amendment rejected by a vote of 38 to 81:

"YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Arnold, Bailey, John D. Baldwin, Boutwell, Cobb, Creswell, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Farnsworth, Halé, Harding, Harrington, Herrick, Holman, William Johnson, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, Law, Marcy, McDowell, Morrison, Nelson, John O'Neill, Orth, Rogers, Edward H. Rollins, Scofield, Sloan, Spalding, Stiles, Thayer, Tracy, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, and Joseph W. White—38."

"NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Ashley, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blair, Blow, Boyd, Brooks, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cole, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Denning, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eldridge, Eliot, English, Finck, Gooch, Griswold, Benjamin G. Harris, Higby, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburt, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Knapp, Knox, LeBlond, Littlejohn, Long, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Morrill, Daniel Morris, James R. Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Noble, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Perham, Pomeroy, Price, Samuel J. Randall, John H. Rice, James S. Rollins, Ross, Schenck, Scott, Shannon, Smithers, John B. Washburne, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Williams, Wilson, Windom, Winfield, and Benjamin Wood—81."—Congressional Globe, vol. 53, page 3244.

The previous question having been ordered and the bill having passed to its third reading, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] called for the reading of the engrossed bill, which resulted in postponing its final passage until Monday, June 25. The bill was on that day brought again before the House and was passed by a vote of 70 to 38; which vote is recorded in the Congressional Globe, volume fifty-three, page 3267, as follows:

"YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Ashley, Augustus C. Baldwin, Beaman, Blaine, Blair, Blow, Brandegee, Brooks, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Coffroth, Cole, Creswell, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Denning, Dixon, Donnelly, Eliot, English, Fenton, Garfield, Griswold, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburt, Jenekes, Julian, Kalblich, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Moorhead, Morrill, Morrison, Amos Myers, Noble, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Patterson, Perham, Pomeroy, Price, John H. Rice, Ross, Schenck, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stevens, Stuart, Sweet, Thayer, Upson, Webster, Wilson, Windom, and Benjamin Wood—70."

"NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Bailey, Bliss, Boutwell, Chandler, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Gooch, Grider, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Holman, Philip Johnson, Kernan, Knapp, Law, LeBlond, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, McKinney, John O'Neill, Orth, Radford, Robinson, Rogers, Edward H. Rollins, Scofield, Stiles, Thomas, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburne, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, and Fernando Wood—38."

The members of the present Congress who voted for the bill were as follows: Allison of Iowa, Ames of Massachusetts, Ashley of Ohio, Baldwin of Massachusetts, Beaman of Michigan, Blaine of Maine, Brooks of New York, Dawes of Massachusetts, Dixon of Rhode Island, Donnelly of Minnesota, Eliot of Massachusetts, Garfield of Ohio, Griswold of New York, Higby of California, Hooper of Massachusetts, Hubbard of Iowa, Jenekes of Rhode Island, Julian of Indiana, Loan of Missouri, Marvin of New York, McClurg of Missouri, Moorhead of Pennsylvania, O'Neill of Pennsylvania, Perham of Maine, Pomeroy of New York, Price of Iowa, Ross of Illinois, Schenck of Ohio, Stevens of Pennsylvania, Upson of Michigan, Wilson of Ohio, and Windom of Minnesota.

Those members of the present Congress who voted in the negative were as follows: Boutwell of Massachusetts, Chandler of New York, Holman of Indiana, Orth of Indiana, Scofield of Pennsylvania, Washburne of Illinois, Washburn of Massachusetts, and Fernando Wood of New York.

The bill then went to the Senate and came back with amendments upon which a committee of conference was ordered. On the 1st of July the committee of conference reported, bringing in such new matter as would, in my opinion, be in violation of every rule which governs committees of conference in legislative bodies. Gentlemen by turning to the Globe, volume fifty-three, page 3480, will see that the new matter so introduced covers nearly a page of nonpareil. And this report, changing so materially the bill as acted upon by the House and Senate, was gagged through; the opponents of the measure were not permitted to have it printed and postponed, so that they could see what it was. I struggled in vain for the printing of the report and for its delay until the members of the House could have an opportunity of reading it; but the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] demanded the previous question, which was seconded and the main question ordered to be put; and it would seem incredible that in a matter of legislation involving interests so vast and pledging amounts of money so enormous, even the yeas and nays were refused; that even tellers were refused. I read from the proceedings as reported in the Globe, volume fifty-three, page 3481:

"Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays on agreeing to the report; and tellers upon the yeas and nays.

"Tellers were not ordered; and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

"Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded tellers on agreeing to the report.

"Tellers were not ordered.

"The report was agreed to."

Thus ends the story of the action of the House touching this extraordinary legislation, which will go into the history of the country.

I now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BAILEY] the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has six minutes remaining.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I presume that gentleman will be recognized at the conclusion of my hour.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize some one on the opposite side of the question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I will demand the previous question, which will give me an hour to close the debate.

The SPEAKER. That rule only applies to members reporting bills from committees.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. PRICE. I ask the gentleman if he will not give me the balance of his time, or a portion of it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Most assuredly. I told you I was a Christian. [Laughter.] I yield three minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. PRICE. Yes, sir; and the gentleman has just corroborated the statement which I made yesterday; and as I like corroboration, and particularly from eminent sources, I will repeat what I said yesterday, that it is altogether possible for a man to be a member of Congress and a Christian at the same time. [Laughter.] And now the gentleman, who has been a member of Congress longer than any one else upon this floor, has stated twice, on his responsibility as a man and a citizen and a member of Congress, that he is a Christian, and thereby I have established by proof what I alleged, and I want it to go to the country that it is a fact.

Now, sir, let me say that the scene in this House to which the gentleman has referred is very well remembered by me. I occupied a seat just upon the right of where I now stand and I remember that on that "memorable night" the gentleman arose here with a written speech, as he has done to-day, which I presume had laid in his desk for some time until it was fit to be given to the House; and to my astonishment, because I did not expect anything of the kind, he challenged the House, or at least those who were in favor of the construction of the road across the continent to the Pacific coast, to answer it. And it reminds me of the day and of another occasion, when a certain other challenge was given; and to the best of my ability upon that occasion,

"Upon the word, Accouter'd as I was, I plunged in," and the result of the vote will show who sank and who swam. My speech in answer to the speech of the gentleman in the Thirty-Eighth Congress which he has read to-day, was printed in the Globe, and I will just refer the gentleman and the country to that answer in the Globe. That is all the answer I have to make on that point.

There is one other item in the gentleman's speech which I wish to notice. He has referred to the immense subsidy of lands given to the Sioux City branch of the Pacific railroad that my friend from the Dubuque district [Mr.

ALLISON] has specially in charge. I say that those very lands which the gentleman now seeks to make the House and the country believe are of so much importance, but a few days ago he stated with equal vehemence and determination and positiveness were not worth surveying! Now, I will just let the gentleman answer himself. If they were not worth surveying six or eight days ago, how does it happen that they make this railroad corporation so immensely wealthy as to cause the indignation of the gentleman from Illinois upon that railroad company for the reception of the lands? [Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] has two minutes.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Most of the lands are in the State of Iowa. The gentleman ought to know that one of the reasons for getting that bill through was to get lands for Iowa for the Burlington and Quincy railroad.

Mr. PRICE. This is the Sioux City railroad.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let the country understand that the Sioux City branch, instead of running toward the Pacific ocean, runs to the east in the State of Iowa, and is twenty-five miles further from the Pacific ocean when it gets south than it was when it started. These were the lands that I referred to.

Mr. PRICE. The gentleman said lands on the same parallel in Dakota were not worth surveying.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The lands in Dakota on the same parallel are all surveyed, as the gentleman from Iowa well knows.

I wish I could have given the gentleman more time. I wanted him to explain why he subordinated the first lien of the country to this Pacific Railroad Company. I wanted him to tell his constituents and the country what induced him to commit—as I believe he did conscientiously; I do not challenge his motives—this great outrage on the people.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, subsequently said: Mr. Speaker, I understand that the gentleman from Iowa, from the Burlington district, [Mr. WILSON,] thinks I omitted a statement in my speech which was due to him, in regard to an amendment which he moved to that railroad bill. I will incorporate that statement in my speech, for I certainly do not intend to do any injustice to him or to any one else.

Mr. HIGBY obtained the floor, and moved that the time of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, be extended for half an hour.

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent.

No objection was made.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am much obliged to my friend from California [Mr. HIGBY] for his courtesy. But I will move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table, unless my friend from New York [Mr. BAILEY] desires to be heard for a short time.

Mr. HIGBY. I liked the gentleman's speech so well that I was willing to have him go on.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I believe the consent was given to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] upon the condition that he himself should speak.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to yield to others for explanation of the pending measure.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BAILEY] does not desire to speak now. I therefore move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. BURR asked and obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the cases of Mrs. Mary E. Wooten and Mrs. Stout for presentation in the Senate.

LEVEES IN ARKANSAS AND MISSOURI.

Mr. LOAN. Is it in order for me at this time to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the House referred to the Committee on Freedmen's Affairs House bill No. 745, to provide levees to secure the low lands of Arkansas and Missouri from inundation, and to encourage the settlement thereof?

The SPEAKER. When was the bill referred to the committee?

Mr. LOAN. On the 17th of February.

The SPEAKER. The time for reconsideration has expired, under the following rule of the House:

"When a motion has been once made, and carried in the affirmative or negative, it shall be in order for any member of the majority to move for the reconsideration thereof on the same or succeeding day."

EIGHTY-FOURTH NEW YORK VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I ask unanimous consent to submit for consideration at this time the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Paymaster General be directed to inform this House why the members of the eighty-fourth regiment of New York volunteers, who served three years, are allowed only fifty dollars additional bounty.

No objection was made; and the resolution was entertained.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN WYCK] that it is customary to address such inquiries to the head of the Department and not to the head of a bureau.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I will modify the resolution accordingly, if there no objection.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object to the resolution if it is to be in that form.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is before the House by unanimous consent and open to amendment.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I move to amend by striking out "Paymaster General," and inserting "Secretary of War."

The amendment was agreed to; and the resolution, as amended, was then adopted.

IOWA AND MISSOURI LAND GRANT.

Mr. ANDERSON. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Public Lands a bill, to be printed and recommended, granting lands to the Iowa and Missouri State Line Railroad Company, and for other purposes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object.

NAVAL STOREKEEPER AT RIO, ETC.

Mr. ARNELL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to inform this House upon what authority an officer of the grade of paymaster in the United States Navy is employed as a resident naval storekeeper at Rio Janeiro and elsewhere, at a greater salary than that provided by the law of June 17, 1844.

ADMISSION OF ALABAMA.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I now report back from the Committee on Reconstruction House bill No. 935, to admit the State of Alabama to representation in Congress, with an amendment in the form of an additional section.

Mr. PIKE. Was this not assigned to come up after the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Reconstruction are authorized to report at any time.

Mr. SPALDING. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] yield to allow me to offer an amendment to this bill?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I will hear it read.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to move to amend this bill by striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

That the constitution framed by the convention of Alabama, which was submitted for ratification by the people at an election commencing on the 4th day of February, 1868, is hereby declared to be the fundamental and organic law for a provisional government for the people of Alabama, so far as the same is not in conflict with the Constitution and laws of the United States. And the officers elected at said election shall, on the 1st day of May, 1868, qualify as provided in said constitution and the ordinances of said convention, and immediately thereafter enter upon the discharge of the duties of their respective offices.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Governor at any time after he shall have qualified and entered upon the discharge of the duties of his office may, by proclamation, convene the Legislature chosen at said election. The Legislature, when so convened, shall possess all the power conferred by said constitution, which may not be in conflict with the Constitution and laws of the United States. And the Legislature is hereby further empowered to submit said constitution to the qualified electors of Alabama for ratification at such time or times as it may designate. And said Legislature is also empowered to submit the constitution, as framed by the convention, with or without amendments proposed by the Legislature.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That whenever the people, by a majority vote of the qualified electors of Alabama, shall have ratified a constitution submitted as aforesaid, and the Legislature of the proposed State organization shall have ratified the amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and known as article fourteen, the constitution of Alabama may be presented to Congress for its approval.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the district commanders shall furnish all necessary aid in enforcing this act, and the act of March 2, 1867, entitled "An act to provide for a more efficient government of the rebel States," and the acts supplementary to and amendatory thereof shall remain in full force except as modified by this act, until Alabama shall be restored to representation in Congress.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I have no objection to allowing a vote to be taken on that amendment.

Mr. SPALDING. My amendment is substantially the same as a proposition offered yesterday in the Senate. It is not my own production at all.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I now call for the reading of the bill as reported from the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill as reported. If there is no objection, the bill as amended by the committee will be considered as an original bill, so that it may be still further amendable.

There was no objection, and the bill (H. R. No. 970) to admit the State of Alabama to representation in Congress was read a first and second time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the people of Alabama, in pursuance of the provisions of an act of Congress entitled "An act for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, and the acts supplementary thereto, have framed a constitution of State government which is republican in form; and whereas, at an election commencing on the 4th day of February, A. D. 1868, a large majority of the legal voters of said State, voting at said election, voted for the adoption of said constitution: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the said State of Alabama shall be entitled to representation in Congress as soon as the Legislature of said State, the members of which were elected at the election mentioned in the preamble of this act, shall have duly ratified the amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and known as article fourteen.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the commanding general of the military district in which Alabama is included to notify the members of the Legislature of said State, chosen at the election held in February, 1868, to assemble at the capital of said State within thirty days after the passage of this act.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That said State of Alabama shall be entitled to representation in Congress and reorganized as a State of the Union upon the following fundamental conditions: that the constitution of Alabama shall never be so amended or changed as to deprive any citizen or any class of citizens of the United States of the right to vote who are entitled to vote by the constitution herein recognized, nor so amended or changed as to allow any person to vote who is excluded from office by the third section of the fourteenth article of the amendment to the Constitution of the United States, until the disabilities imposed by said section shall have been removed in the manner therein provided; and Congress shall have power to annul any amendment to the constitution of Alabama or any act of the Legislature of said State contrary to the provisions of this section.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] will be regarded as pending as an amendment to this bill.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM.]

Mr. BINGHAM. I move to amend by striking out the third section of the bill as reported.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] yield to permit that amendment to be offered?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to occupy the attention of the House for less than half an hour, and then I shall yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.]

Mr. KERR. Before the gentleman proceeds I desire to make a suggestion. It is that the bill as reported, together with the amendments pending, be ordered to be printed, that they may be on our tables to-morrow.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection that order will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Illinois whether the bill as reported, differing, I understand, in some respects from the bill heretofore under consideration, has been printed?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It has not.

The SPEAKER. The bill with the pending amendments has just been ordered to be printed.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to repeat what I said the other day in regard to the admission of Alabama. I wish, however, to call the attention of the House to the language of the reconstruction act of March 22, 1867, providing for the formation of constitutions by the rebel States, and their admission to representation in Congress. Why? Because objection is made to this bill and to representation upon the ground, as alleged, that the majority of the registered voters in that State were not in favor of the Constitution; that a majority of the registered voters did not vote upon the question. Now, I will read that section of the act of March 22, 1867, applicable to this question:

"SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That if, according to said returns, the constitution shall be ratified by a majority of the votes of the registered electors qualified as herein specified, cast at said election, (at least one half of all the registered voters voting upon the question of such ratification,) the president of the convention shall transmit a copy of the same, duly certified, to the President of the United States, who shall forthwith transmit the same to Congress, if then in session, and if not in session, then immediately upon its next assembling; and if it shall, moreover, appear to Congress that the election was one at which all the registered and qualified electors in the State had an opportunity to vote freely and without restraint, fear, or the influence of fraud, and if the Congress shall be satisfied that such constitution meets the approval of a majority of all the qualified electors in the State, and if the said constitution shall be declared by Congress to be in conformity with the provisions of the act to which this is supplementary, and the other provisions of said act shall have been complied with, and the said constitution shall be approved by Congress, the State shall be declared entitled to representation, and Senators and Representatives shall be admitted therefrom as therein provided."

Now, sir, it is very true that a majority of the registered voters of Alabama did not vote at this election. If some eight or ten thousand rebels had come to the polls and voted against the constitution at that election we should have been bound by the provisions of this act, if we approved the constitution, to admit that State. All that was necessary to comply with the letter of that act was that some few thousands of rebels should have gone to the polls and have voted against that constitution, for there were seventy thousand votes polled in favor of that constitution. And does it not seem strange, is it not preposterous, that we should refuse to admit Alabama as a State or accord her representation in Congress because a few thousand rebels did not come up and vote against this constitution? That is all there is of it. That is the effect of this law. All the law required was that a majority of the registered voters voting at that election should vote in favor of this constitution; that more than one half of the registered voters should vote in favor of the constitution.

Again, that law provided that if Congress shall be satisfied a majority of the legal voters of the State was in favor of the constitution the State should be admitted. If a majority of the legal voters voted for the constitution there was no necessity to be satisfied about it at all. That would not only have been affirmative but positive evidence that the majority were in favor of it. I mention this to show to the House the intention of the law was that Congress should exercise a general superviion over the matter, and if Congress were satisfied a majority of the registered votes were in favor of the constitution the State should be admitted.

Now, sir, the object of this section, the object of this provision, well understood at the time by the members of the House and of the Senate, was to protect the loyal men of those States in having a fair election. We did not want to admit the State under a constitution framed by the rebels, and who might have it adopted by taking possession of the polls. These provisions were all inserted for the protection of the loyal men, and not for the protection of the rebels. No man ever dreamed that it would be necessary that Congress should require the rebels to go to the polls and vote against the constitution before we should admit the State. No member had any such intention. We have seventy thousand and upward of eligible voters of Alabama voting for this constitution under all the disabilities and adverse circumstances which attended that election, under menaces and threats, with their lives in their hands, in the midst of a furious storm. We have seventy thousand and upward returned as having voted for this constitution.

One fact not mentioned in the debate before us was that three counties were not returned by General Meade to General Grant, because the vote was declared illegal. Here were fourteen hundred votes cast for the constitution. That is more than one half of the votes of those counties. There is another fact not mentioned before. In Lowndes county nearly twenty-five hundred votes were cast, nearly all for the constitution; but the ballot-boxes were stolen and destroyed by the rebels.

And there is still another fact I wish to mention. The gentleman from Missouri wished to know when this matter was up before how many white people voted at this election. The official returns show that about seven thousand white men voted in favor of the adoption of this constitution. And I will say, in connection with this, that over twenty thousand white men in Alabama are members of the Union League.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I desire to know how this fact was ascertained to be true. Did they vote separately, or were they registered as white men?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I will tell you how it was ascertained, and in stating this it will appear that more than seven thousand white votes were cast. It appears affirmatively that seven thousand white men voted for the constitution in this way. At most of the polls the officers of election were directed to ascertain the votes of all the colored men by putting a distinguishing mark upon the ballots as they were polled. In that way they ascertained how many white men voted. It was done under the direction of the officers. But at some of the polls this course was not pursued; no mark was placed on the ballots.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. Then the evidence is not official.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It is official so far as this fact affirmatively appears. Now, it appears that seven thousand of the ballots were thus marked as having been given by white men. How many were given by white men that were not marked at those polling places where they did not take this precaution does not appear.

Mr. KERR. I desire to inquire of the gentleman whether the fact he has just stated has been returned according to any law, either of Congress or of the State of Alabama.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. That fact is not returned by General Meade, and I am not aware that any law requires it.

Mr. KERR. Then how is it that this information comes into the possession of the committee?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I have received this information by telegrams and letters from Alabama.

Mr. KERR. Oh, telegrams and letters!

Mr. FARNSWORTH. From gentlemen of unquestionable character; from intelligent and trustworthy sources.

Mr. BECK. I desire to ask a question. Has the Committee on Reconstruction received any information that seven thousand white men voted for the constitution?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I have received it. Whether the Government has or not I do not know.

Mr. BECK. What I ask is, has the Committee on Reconstruction received it in any form?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I am not aware that it has; but I say I have received it from the most trustworthy sources, and I think some other members of the committee and of the House have received it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I will not yield. I do not propose to occupy much time myself. I do not think this kind of discussion is very profitable.

Mr. BECK. The gentleman made a remark about three counties being disfranchised. I will state why they did it.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The gentleman will have an opportunity to make the statement hereafter.

Mr. BECK. I think not. I can state it in one minute. The three counties disfranchised are Baine, Colbert, and Jones. There were ten new counties formed by the convention in 1866, namely: Clay, Cleburn, Crenshaw, Elmore, Hale, Lee, Bullock, Baine, Colbert, and Jones. The last three were thrown out and not allowed to cast their votes for the ratification of the constitution. There were not over three hundred colored men in these counties. There was hardly a colored man in Jones county, and very few in Baine county, and twice as many white as black in Colbert county. Those counties were rejected. The rest of the ten, in a majority of which there were three colored men to one white, were recognized as counties and permitted to vote.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I do not understand the gentleman as referring to the same three counties that I referred to.

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir; I refer to Baine, Colbert, and Jones, the only three that were rejected.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. If those are the three counties the facts are these: when they voted for the convention they gave fourteen hundred more than half the votes registered in those counties, and they were all thrown out in this election by reason of some illegality. What is the presumption? If fourteen hundred more than half the registered voters in those counties were in favor of the convention when the question was fairly put to the people of Alabama whether they were in favor of or against the reconstruction acts or this method of reconstruction, how many are we to presume would have voted for this constitution? It is just such things as these, just such tricks as these—the destruction of ballot-boxes, the forcible prevention of men from attending the polls, all sorts of frauds, menaces, corruption, bribes, deprivations of employment, threats against lives—it is this kind of things which prevented a majority, and an overwhelming majority, of the registered votes of Alabama being given in favor of this constitution. Why, Mr. Speaker, no man can examine the affidavits which this committee has—and we have eighty of them and upward—no man can examine those affidavits without coming to the conclusion that a very large majority of the voters of Alabama are in favor of this constitution and would have voted for it, and would vote for it to-day if they could.

Mr. KERR. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. No; I decline to be interrupted.

Mr. KERR. I only wanted to know if these affidavits have been printed.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Now, sir, with what kind of grace can we be asked to refer this constitution back to the people of Alabama when we have declared by law that, as to all the rest of these States, the majority of those voting shall govern on the question of the adoption or rejection of the constitution? Why should we say to Alabama, after she has gone through this struggle, after she has voted and voted so largely as she has done under all the adverse and disadvantageous circumstances which surrounded her, that she shall again go through the expense and labor and struggle of voting on this constitution? Why should we say to the rebels, and thus flush them still more with their supposed victory, "You have beaten our friends in Alabama; go and beat them again?" Why should we encourage this system of fraud and violence which was practiced by these men? Why, sir, I hold here in my hand evidence—evidence of men who voted and whose votes were not counted, and those who tried to vote and were prevented by violence from voting—which, if it was before the Committee of Elections in a contested-election case, would be deemed sufficient to unseat any member of this House and give the seat to the man for whom these men tried to vote and did vote. We have such evidence here of men enough to make up a majority of all the registered voters in the State.

I will refer to some of the evidence where the numbers are given of those who were prevented from voting in different counties:

J. E. Summerfield proves a diminution of seven hundred votes, or from seven hundred to twelve hundred votes—I take the minimum—in his district through misconduct of judges and rebel sympathizers.

A. J. Applegate testifies to the loss of one hundred votes at Huntsville. There is abundance of evidence of violence and intimidation, but I only give the cases where they prove an actual number of votes lost.

A. Wood and Thomas D. Fister and others prove the loss of four hundred and seventy votes in Calhoun county.

J. H. Bone proves the loss of five hundred votes in Madison county.

Jacob Black proves the loss of one thousand votes in Barbour county.

Lewis M. Douglas corroborates the evidence of Applegate as to Huntsville, and proves the loss of eight hundred and thirty-four votes in Madison county.

L. D. Lusk proves the loss of two hundred votes in Marshall county.

Moses Boisseau and others prove threats, &c., in Elmore county.

About three hundred votes are proved to have been lost in Wetumpka county. Those three hundred votes were lost by being stolen out of the ballot-box after they were voted and destroyed.

J. A. Zordy testifies to the tearing from the votes of the part ratifying the constitution, thus losing about fifty votes. That was one of the dodges resorted to. The tickets had the names of the persons for whom the people were voting for State officers upon them and also "for the constitution." They would get hold of tickets that were in the hands of colored men and clandestinely tear off that portion for the ratification of the constitution.

Now, everybody knows that it is not at all probable that a man would go to the polls and vote for officers under a constitution without voting for the constitution itself. That was one of the tricks the rebels resorted to; to tear off the words "For the constitution."

Tobias Lane, of Marengo county, proves that four hundred tickets were stolen from the ballot-box, and that large numbers of voters were prevented by threats, &c., from voting.

W. H. Pruitt, assistant registrar at Wetumpka, proves that nine hundred men were unable to vote on account of the insufficiency of ballot-boxes, and because of threats; and also that votes were taken from the boxes. At one precinct in Dale county the election was suspended for one day, all the registrar's books were destroyed, and voters were deterred from voting by threats. The witnesses testify that the number of votes lost, to which they approximate as nearly as they can, was probably five hundred.

Besides this, we have the affidavits of some seventy-nine or eighty men who were turned out of their employment, and expelled from their houses, because they went to the polls and voted.

Now, here is proof of a sufficient number of votes to constitute a majority of the registered votes of the State of Alabama, to say nothing of the men who stayed away from the polls, fearing for their lives if they went, to say nothing of the thousands and tens of thousands of men in that State who would have gone to the polls and voted for this constitution if they had dared to do so.

Now, while the offices in Alabama—I do not allude to the military offices, but to the civil offices—are chiefly in the hands of rebels and rebel sympathizers, while the sheriffs and constables and magistrates and other officers in that State are rebels, how can you expect that under such circumstances, and in such a storm as they had there during the election, the loyal people of Alabama could do better than they did do?

Gentlemen ask me how they can do better hereafter. I will tell them. Put the offices in the hands of loyal men; let the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, members of the Legislature, magistrates, sheriffs, constables, &c., be loyal men; clothe the loyal men of that State with the entire power of the State, so far as the civil power is concerned, and then we will show you a different result at the elections.

Now, sir, taking into consideration the vote which was given under the circumstances, then place the State in the hands of loyal men, with the offices controlled by loyal men, I ask what would be the result at the next election? Why, sir, we would carry the State by more than a two-thirds majority of all the registered voters there. I have no doubt of it.

I would not ask for the admission of Alabama if I thought it was to go into the hands of rebels. The committee of which I am a member do not desire the admission of a rebel State. But we do desire that the agony of the loyal men of that State shall not be prolonged. And if we do not admit them under the circumstances I have narrated, then we can be justly charged with holding the promise to the ear and breaking it to the hope. They have done precisely what every other revolted State is required to do under the act which we passed at this session; they have adopted their constitution by a majority of the voters voting at that election.

I now yield the remainder of my hour to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.] The SPEAKER. The gentleman has occupied twenty-eight minutes of his hour.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, justice to the good citizens of Alabama and to the union men of every other unreconstructed State demands the passage of this bill. And I believe that the law of March 23, 1867, not only justifies but demands the admission of Alabama under the constitution framed by the recent convention. Sometimes the letter killeth when the spirit giveth life, but in this case we have both the letter and the spirit to justify the action proposed by this bill. The law provides some regulations of the details of the elections and requires that a majority of the registered voters should vote at the election. But it does more. When Congress was adopting it it did not forget the spirit of the democracy of the South and the possibility that it might resort to force or fraud to prevent a fair election, and it reserved to itself the right to make the broadest and most searching examination of the conduct of the election. It did not agree to bind itself to accept formal returns as conclusive and binding on its judgment, but reserved to itself the right to inquire whether voting had been free, and without restraint, fear, or the influence of fraud. It made this reservation in express terms. The act of March 23, 1867, provided that—

"If it shall moreover appear to Congress that the election was one at which all the registered and qualified electors in the State had an opportunity to vote freely and without restraint, fear, or the influence of fraud, and if the Congress shall be satisfied that such constitution meets the approval of a majority of all the qualified electors in the State, and if the said constitution shall be declared by Congress to be in conformity with the provisions of the act to which this is supplementary, and the other provisions of said act shall have been complied with, and the said constitution shall be approved by Congress, the State shall be declared entitled to representation, and Senators and Representatives shall be admitted therefrom as herein provided."

Now, sir, I am abundantly satisfied that a majority of the qualified electors of Alabama desire the adoption of that constitution. I believe, sir, that the typographical and clerical errors in making the registration alone deprived thousands of such electors of their votes. The votes thus excluded would have swollen the seventy-one thousand actually accounted for to the required majority. Wherever a register made an error of a letter in a name, wherever a mistake was made in copying the lists of voters, and wherever, in the imperfect printing, establishments throughout the State, an error was made in printing the registers' lists, the Union was deprived of the services of a man and reconstruction of the vote of a qualified elector. I have no doubt that by this means alone enough votes were rejected to have changed the reported result. Again, sir, the vote for the constitution was the last on a long printed ticket. Every one who voted for officers under that constitution voted or believed he was voting for its adoption. Yet, it being well known that the loss of a few votes at each poll would tell largely in the aggregate result, there was organized throughout the State a system by which the privilege of looking at the tickets of voters should be sought by apparent friends, and that while the voter's attention was engaged in conversation by a third person the vote for the constitution should be torn from the ticket, the mutilated ticket be refolded and handed back to the voter. This system was found to have been practiced all over the State. By counting as votes for the constitution all those cast for candidates for the offices it ordains, and which were intended to support it, you supply nearly, if not quite, the number of votes required by the provision on which the Democracy rest their opposition to the admission of the State.

But, sir, I refer to other illegal means by which the result was affected, and for the purpose let me say that I do not go back to letters brought me so long ago as yesterday; but from those which I have opened since I came to my seat. I will read one or two extracts. A cotton planter, one who served as a surgeon in our Army, rising, I believe, to the position of the surgeon of a corps, who I have known from boyhood, and for whose endurance, courage, and veracity I can vouch, writes thus:

"The courts of this county are being held, presided over by rebel judges, with packed juries, in violation of military orders and law, so that there is not the shadow of chance for a northern man nor freedman to receive justice. If Congress will admit us we can correct many of these evils through the Legislature and Governor, and take care that the like shall not be repeated. We can then also protect ourselves in every particular without assistance from any other source, as we have nearly one hundred thousand true, loyal freedmen, who would rally to a man in support of law and order and maintain them. Such is the business and social ostracism that now exists here that unless Congress does admit us many will be compelled to leave, and we have none to spare. I trust Congress will not abandon the loyal men of Alabama in this crisis and turn us over to the cruelties of these unprincipled rebels, but will speedily relieve us from our present sufferings and oppressions, and give us the opportunity, so that we can easily take care of ourselves."

Mr. Speaker, the paragraph just read may not seem to be pertinent to the line of suggestion I was presenting; but in the letter I find the following, clipped from one of the papers of that section:

"We had overlooked the following resolution unanimously adopted at its last meeting by the Democratic club of Marion:

"Resolved, That the members of this club, in their social intercourse, will not recognize any man as a gentleman or a friend to his country who may accept any appointment to office under the reconstruction acts of the Congress of the United States."

In another letter received to day, dated so late as the 20th, the writer incloses a pleasant little clip from the Tuscaloosa Monitor. I beg gentlemen to listen to it, that they may know how voters had reason to believe they would be treated by their "Democratic" brethren if they courageously expressed their opinions at the polls under the law of Congress. It is not copied from a Republican paper. It is no misrepresentation, but is here in the type of that model Democratic organ the Tuscaloosa Monitor:

"We reiterate the advice hitherto offered to those of our southern people who are not ashamed to honor the service of the 'lost cause' and the memory of their kith and kin whose lives were nobly laid down to save the survivors from a subjection incomparably more tolerable in contemplation than in realization. That advice is to touch not a loyal-leaguer's hand; taste not of a loyal-leaguer's hospitality; handle not a loyal-leaguer's goods. Oust him socially; break him pecuniarily; ignore him politically; kick him contemptuously; hang him legally; or lynch him clandestinely—provided he becomes such a nuisance as Claus or Wilson."

Claus and Wilson were well-known white Union men.

Gentlemen of the Republican party, are you willing to declare to the Union men of Alabama that you will not interpose the power reserved to you as I have shown by the express terms of the law for their protection when the Democratic press of that State openly advises clandestine assassination; and the representatives of the Democratic party of the North stand here pleading the cause of that party and practically approving the course of that press? No; let it go forth to-day, if it may be, to the Democratic citizens of the other unreconstructed States, that Congress takes cognizance, not only of the votes registered on the poll-list, but of the manner in which the election is conducted; that it will guaranty to every Union man the right to vote, and if his vote shall be withheld by fraud or violence it will count it as having been given, and given for the reconstruction of the country. If you do not do this you give the violent and lawless the advantage of their own wrong and invite the Democracy of the South to persecute our friends in the other nine unreconstructed States.

For nearly three hundred miles Alabama is coterminous with Mississippi, where the election is still to come off. On the North she bounds Florida, where the election is still pending. On her long eastern line, for more than two hundred and fifty miles, she bounds Georgia, where the election is still pending. Our action on this question is eagerly watched in those States, and can it be that Congress will indorse the doctrines of the Tuscaloosa Monitor, that the Union men of those States should only vote at the risk of being "clandestinely assassinated." Sir, if, with the information before us, we refuse to admit Alabama, may God have pity upon the Union men of Florida, Mississippi, and Georgia! In their name I appeal to the Representatives of the Republican party to enforce the reconstruction law in its own humane spirit. In their name I ask you to proclaim to the country that you find vital power in that clause of this law which says if the election be without restraint, fear, or the influence of fraud, you will then look at its results as officially reported, but if it be tainted with these influences and you still find evidence that the constitution meets with the approval of a majority of the qualified electors in the State, you will treat it as though fraud and violence had not prevented the free and fair expression of opinion on the subject at the polls.

Sir, the interests of the country, too long distracted by the rebellious spirit of the Democracy of the South, demand the immediate settlement of this question. In 1860 there were nine hundred and sixty-three thousand two hundred and one inhabitants of Alabama, nearly one million, and notwithstanding the desolation of the war her population has largely increased. More than a million people are without organic government. There is no court within the limits to which a man who honors the country's flag can appeal with certainty of having the law honestly administered or justice done him under the civil or criminal law. No officer in the State government—whether of the State, county, or township—is in sympathy with the Union men. All the machinery of the law, all the patronage, all the influence of official station and power is cast against the friends of the country, and so as election day approached every effort was made to inspire Union men with fear and to keep them from giving free expression to their opinion. It is wonderful that more than seventy thousand of them, under these circumstances, should have made their way through floods and over almost trackless fields to distant polling places and incurred such imminent risks as they did to cast their votes. Contemplate the fact, sir. A million people, occupying very nearly fifty-one thousand square miles of American territory, are without government, and subject to a despotism set up over them during the time of the rebellion and organized in the interest of the confederacy. No officer of the pretended government is in sympathy with the Government of the United States, nor do they generally recognize Union men, whether white or black, as having any rights which law protects or which they are bound to respect. To relieve them from this terrible condition a majority of the qualified electors appeal to us to admit them as a State under a constitution the provisions of which will compare favorably with the constitutions of the northern States; containing one provision, wisely inserted, which appears in none of ours, by which through no judicial trick, through no political machinery, can any part of the citizens ever be disfranchised by reason of race, color, or previous condition, as was done in Pennsylvania by a conspiracy between an expiring bench of judges looking for reappointment, a corrupt State administration, and a State convention from which the people expected no action on the subject of suffrage. In that respect the constitution of Alabama is superior to our own.

Mr. WOODWARD. I wish to inquire of the gentleman what bench of judges in Pennsylvania he alludes to when he makes the remark he has?

Mr. KELLEY. I speak of that bench of judges whose terms were cut short or would be by the adoption of the constitution.

Mr. WOODWARD. What constitution?

Mr. KELLEY. The constitution which was then being framed, or which had just been framed, and was in a few days to be submitted for adoption—the constitution of 1838.

Mr. WOODWARD. I submit to the gentleman—

Mr. KELLEY. Having but thirty minutes, I yielded for a question but not for one of my friend's judicial dissertations. It seems to me that my colleague is like the Irishman at a fair; whenever he sees a "nigger's" head he is bound to have a clip at it. [Laughter.]

Sir, the constitution framed by the Alabama convention is republican in form. And in order to perpetuate its republican character its framers inserted a provision in the substance of an oath that shocked one of my colleagues who is not now in his seat, [Mr. BOYER.] It is a provision to prevent forever the disfranchisement of any man who has not been convicted of crime. It requires every citizen, before his acceptance as a voter, to swear as follows:

"That I accept the civil and political equality of all men, and agree not to attempt to deprive any person or persons, on account of race, color, or previous condition, of any political or civil right, privilege, or immunity enjoyed by any other class of men."

My colleague, with pious horror, threw up his hands and, as if appealing to God, cried out, "And this in the name of republican government!" Yes, and in the name of the Republican party, in the name of a party charged with the extension and perpetuation of republican government and inspired by the humanity and the Christian benevolence that have carried the Republican party upward and onward in a few years from a hopeless and almost voiceless minority in this House and Senate to a continuous majority of two thirds in both Houses, sustained by over two thirds of the people of the country, and given it the ability to bind as with chains a would-be usurper and bring him to the bar of justice for trial, and, as I trust, to conviction for his crimes. Yes, sir, in the name of republicanism and republican government, I implore Congress to admit Alabama and to proclaim to every refractory rebel in the South and to every timid Union man there that each State that will bring to us a constitution providing, as that of Alabama does, for the right of every freeman to hold land and enjoy common schools, and securing the right of every freeman, not only for a brief term, but until that constitution shall be altered, to enjoy without the fear of disfranchisement suffrage and all other political rights, shall be admitted; and that the right of admission shall not be withheld, even though terror inspired by Democratic threats of "clandestine assassination" may have kept some of the qualified electors who, if free from restraint, would have voted for it, from the polls, if they can bring that fact as clearly to the mind of the House as it has been brought in the case of Alabama.

Sir, with such continuous lines as I have indicated, southern Alabama is the outlet to the Gulf for a broad stretch of country beyond her limits. She is, in herself, not only in her dominions, but in the diversity of her soil and climate and the wealth and variety of her native resources, a magnificent empire. She embraces four distinct belts of country. Upon the Gulf coast and for some distance above it, you find the towering pine trees of the region known as the piney woods country; and were I familiar with Milton as my friends from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN] and Iowa, [PRICE,] this morning proved themselves to be with Shakspeare, I would give you a description of them from that author, for they equal the Norwegian pine with which he compared the masts and spars of his imaginary vessel. North of this is a broad belt producing cotton which is scarcely equalled and not exceeded by that grown slightly inland on the coast. North of that again is the wheat belt, a region in which gold, iron, copper, and various other minerals are found along navigable streams and easily accessible for use. Then among the mountains of the northern counties from which hardy men to the number of fifteen hundred, in defiance of the confederate powers, rallied under Spencer and went to fight the rebels under the flag of the Union, is a rich bucolic region in which cattle may be herded by the thousand, and which might be made to supply our present population with wool. And yet all that wealth is paralyzed, and all that capacity to afford cheerful homes to millions of people is shut against the immigrant from Europe or the over-crowded cities of the East, and Congress is asked upon a technical, dry, dead-letter construction of a particular clause in the law which is qualified and overruled by subsequent provisos of the same section, to keep it thus closed forever if the Democratic party of the State continues as refractory and turbulent as it is and has been.

I do not wish to detain the House, but I felt it proper that, having seen the grandeur of this State, having mingled—not as a soldier, for I have been but a poor civilian—with her soldiers when they wore our blue, guarded our flag, and were ready to meet in deadly conflict the rebels in their own State, and having been in large intercourse with Union men who have lived on the soil from their birth, who plead to me and through me to Congress for protection, I felt it but proper that I should at least make my voice heard and say what I have done. And, sir, in closing, I again implore the Republican party of the House to take the responsibility, and come promptly to the performance of their high duty, and announce to the still contumacious rebels from Texas to the northern line of the unreconstructed territory, that if they do not leave voting free as the air, and make it safe to the Union man as he would be in a northern State, we will, despite their violence, accept the constitutions proposed and admit the States, let the election returns foot up as they may. The reconstruction acts were not meant to authorize a lawless minority to overawe and govern their peaceable neighbors by violence, and it would be treason to so construe them.

Mr. PLANTS. Mr. Speaker, for seven years certain vacant seats here have silently witnessed that Alabama has been out of her proper relations to her sister States in the Union. Her voice has not been heard in these Halls. For good or for evil she has had no share in the counsels of the nation. During all these years this member of the Union has been paralyzed. Like the stricken soldier the great Republic has thus been marred in its fair proportions. But I have ever believed that the vitality of the general system, aided by careful nursing, would restore the disabled member to its proper functions, when the living forces of the sound body would again circulate through it, giving to it not only its former strength, but a vigor and beauty never before enjoyed.

That Alabama has been for years, and still is, unrepresented on this floor is a fact disputed by none. But whether she has in the mean time been in the Union or out of it has been the subject of a controversy as interminable as it has ever seemed to me to be inconsequential.

The boundaries of the United States are clearly defined in the Constitution and the treaties and laws made in pursuance thereof. The territory of which Alabama consists is and ever has been within the limits of the United States as thus defined. In this respect she certainly has not been out of the Union; but in our peculiar form of government something more than a definite and inhabited district of country within the boundaries of the United States is necessary to constitute it a State in the Union. Utah and Dakota have clearly-defined boundaries; they are inhabited by citizens of the United States, and are as perfectly in the Union as New York and Ohio; but they are not States. To constitute a State in the Union requires not only the Territory and inhabitants, but also a political organization, a corporate body, a government republican in form, and sustaining certain relations to the Government of the United States under the Constitution thereof. The form of a proposed State government is to be found in its constitution; but a constitution may be complete in all its parts and republican in form without the existence of a government in fact.

By the common law of this country the government of a State is vested in certain departments—legislative, judicial, and executive. But to put these departments into operation there must be officers duly elected and qualified to perform their various functions. The form of the government is expressed in the constitution, but the government itself consists of these officers. There must be legislators elected and qualified to enact the laws; judges must be elected and qualified and courts organized to adjudicate upon these laws; and executive officers likewise duly qualified to carry into effect the laws and judgments of the courts. It is these officers, for the time being executing these functions, who constitute the government. And while such an organization may have all the elements of a State in the general meaning of that term, it is not yet entitled to representation in Congress and is not a State in the Union, although within its geographical limits. There remains yet that every legislative, judicial, and executive officer of such State shall take a solemn oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and that duly elected and qualified Senators and Representatives be elected to Congress. When all this has been done, and Congress has approved it, then, and not until then, is it a State in the Union.

Alabama was once, by all these tests, a State in the Union. Has she by all or any of them been out of it? I maintain that, as to her territory and people, she never was, but that as a political corporation—a government—she did in fact cease to exist, at least in such connection with the Union as alone constitutes a State thereof. The nerves, so to speak, through which alone the vital forces of the national system flowed to her were severed, and she became to the Union what the palsied arm is to a healthy body, and as unable to restore herself as is a nerveless limb. Her restoration can only come by reestablishing through her the circulation of the national life. The constitution of Alabama was but the expression of the form of her government. The government itself consisted of the several officers for the time being in whom were vested the several powers defined in the constitution. The nerves which gave these officers—the government—connection with and life from the Union were their solemn oaths to support the Constitution of the United States and the presence of her Senators and Representatives in Congress, bound by the same solemn obligations. These were the conditions which gave to Alabama her proper relations to, and the rights of a State in, the Union. So long as she continued to fulfill these conditions so long her relations to the Union and her rights therein remained. These conditions broken, her proper relations to the Union and her rights as a State therein ceased, while her territory and her people remained amenable to the Constitution and the treaties and laws made in pursuance thereof. But did she continue to fulfill these conditions and thus remain in the Union as a State? Or did she violate these conditions and thus sever her connection with and lose her character as a State government therein?

I know, Mr. Speaker, that gentlemen who have a purpose to accomplish argue that her State government remained intact through all the war; that she never lost any of her rights as a State in the Union; that at any moment through all the bloody years of her rebellion she had a perfect right to be represented here and in the Senate, and that she now has that right, under her old constitution, in absolute defiance of any law or condition that Congress may prescribe. If the wish is always father to the thought, it is possible that gentlemen have brought themselves into the actual belief of this monstrous position, for it is difficult to determine how far partisan feeling may pervert the judgment.

It is not my purpose, Mr. Speaker, to recite the history of the rebellion. Its scenes of horror and madness are but too sadly familiar to us and to the country. Nor is it my purpose to recount the part taken therein by Alabama. That, too, has passed into history. It is sufficient for me to say that her Representatives in this Hall and her Senators in the other end of the Capitol left their seats cursing the Union and trampling the sacred obligations of the Constitution beneath their feet. Forswearing their allegiance to the Union and severing the ties that held them to it, they hastened to connect themselves to the southern confederacy, and while it lived gave all their energies to its support and the destruction of the Republic. Yet gentlemen tell us that she had, nevertheless, during all this time, a perfect State government; that that State government was all the time in the Union; that she had continuously an indisputable right to send Representatives and Senators to Congress, and that a refusal to admit them was then, and is now, unconstitutional and revolutionary!

Let us examine this proposition a moment. Had Alabama a State government, in the constitutional meaning of that term, after every officer composing it had renounced his allegiance to the United States and had sworn to support the confederation? I most distinctly assert that she had not. There can be no State government, in the American sense of that term, without legislative, judicial, and executive departments, filled with legislative, judicial, and executive officers duly elected and qualified to exercise these several functions. And, sir, one of the absolutely essential qualifications is the being "bound" by oath or affirmation to support the Constitution. It is not enough that he simply take the oath. He must be bound by voluntary assent. In article six of the Constitution will be found these emphatic words:

"The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound, by oath or affirmation, to support this Constitution."

This is the supreme law of every State. Without this "binding" there can be no such thing as a Legislature. Whatever a body of men may style themselves or be styled by others, without this binding oath they cannot be a Legislature. But during all the years of the rebellion those who constituted the so-called Legislature of Alabama refused to be so bound, but swore to support the confederacy instead. Alabama, therefore, had no Legislature. So, too, every judicial officer, every judge of a State court, before he can be a judge must be bound by the same oath. Without it there can be no judiciary. But the so-called judges of Alabama refused to be so bound, but did bind themselves to the confederacy; Alabama, therefore, had no judiciary.

Again, sir, by the same supreme law every executive officer of a State must be bound to the Union by the same oath. There can be no Governor or other executive officer of a State until this essential condition has been complied with. But the so-called Governor and executive officers of Alabama refused to be so bound—to take this oath—but did bind themselves to the confederacy. Alabama, therefore, had no judiciary. But without legislative, judicial, and executive officers duly elected and qualified, and bound to the Union by the obligation to support its Constitution, there could be no State government; and without a State government there could be no representation in Congress according to the Constitution. It is true we admit to this Hall, but not to vote, delegates from the Territories; but they are not in any sense members of Congress, nor can a Territory be represented at all in the Senate. By the terms of the Constitution nothing but a State Legislature can elect a Senator. But Alabama, as I have shown, had no Legislature, and could not therefore elect Senators.

The people of Alabama and the land they occupied remained in the Union. But the State government, as a political corporation in the Union, ceased to exist, and having so ceased it could not restore itself. In the very nature of things, as well as by the terms of the Constitution, it could only be restored to its proper relations to the Union by the sanction and under the authority of the United States.

I need not stop, Mr. Speaker, to discuss this last proposition, for it is admitted by all parties except the open and very poorly disguised rebels. The only controversy is as to who shall prescribe the terms and authorize such restoration. The President, by his solemn proclamation, declared that "the rebellion destroyed all civil government in Alabama." To this most solemn and public declaration I give my full assent. Congress, too, agreed with the President that "the rebellion had deprived her of all civil government, and that no authority but that of the United States could restore her." But Congress did not understand that the President was the United States in the meaning of the Constitution.

All parties, therefore, assent to the proposition that the State government of Alabama was absolutely destroyed, and could only be restored by the authority of the United States. And here arose two questions of vital importance, not only affecting the present emergency, but to stand as precedents for all coming time. These were, first, who shall give this authority to restore the State government? And second, who shall authoritatively sanction it as republican in form when presented for that purpose and admit her to all the rights of a State in the Union? On these propositions the President and Congress differed. The President claimed the prerogative without the pretense of lawful authority and in palpable violation, as it seems to me, of the whole theory of our institutions, to grant that authority, to order elections for members of conventions, to prescribe the qualifications of voters, to appoint judges of the elections, to prescribe the forms of the oaths to be taken, to disfranchise the great mass of the loyal inhabitants, amounting to a clear majority in several of the States, to call conventions and appoint the times and places of their meeting, and to determine their qualifications, and even to dictate the provisions to be inserted in the constitutions to be formed. He claimed, further, the absolute authority to approve and confirm the work of his conventions so created by his sole mandate, and to bind the United States for all time by his action.

This was the claim put forth by the President. And in the recess of Congress he proceeded to execute his imperial decree. When Congress met this stupendous scheme was presented to us as the perfected plan of reconstruction and the demand made upon us to register the edict. Senators, fresh from the cabinet of Jeff. Davis and the rebel congress, and representatives of like antecedents, presented credentials from these President-made State governments, and demanded admission to Congress, backed by the insulting declaration of the President that all we had to do was to examine their credentials and see that they were in due form.

At the audacity of this assumption of more than kingly power not only Congress but the country was astounded! We demurred and refused to register the decree, and the President and the whole rebel voice of the country denounced us in terms that I do not care to repeat. An appeal was taken to the people—with what result the Republican majority on this floor is the sufficient answer. The President chose to persist in defiance of the overwhelming popular condemnation, and Congress proceeded calmly, and in the face of difficulties and obstructions thrown in the way by the Executive which the people will never know, to pass the several reconstruction laws. The purpose of these laws being to restore these States and to guaranty to each of them a republican form of government as the Constitution required to be done. By the authority and under the provisions of these laws the people of Alabama have acted, and as the result of their action have presented to us a constitution, and they wait to-day, as the loyal millions of the other unrepresented States are waiting, in anxious suspense for our action thereon. And shall we disappoint their hopes by refusal or unnecessary delay?

I do not propose to consume the time of the House by an examination of the constitution she has presented to us. It has been upon our desks for some weeks, and has, no doubt, been carefully considered by every gentleman present. I will simply say that in my opinion it is not only republican in form, but, in the matter of manhood suffrage, it is eminently so, and might well be taken as a model by other communities. For myself, I think it should not have stopped at manhood suffrage. I would be glad to see in all our constitutions all disabilities arising from sex as well as race and religion removed; but I know the time for this has not yet come, and I will not reject the attainable good because I cannot secure the unattainable better. Impartial manhood suffrage is a long step in advance, and the rest will come as true civilization advances. It is but a question of time and the refining influences of education and social progress. Why, then, should we not accept this constitution, restore the State to her proper relations to the Union, and admit her Senators and Representatives to Congress? It would be useless to argue with those who are in sympathy with rebels or who have predetermined to place the government and loyal people of the State in rebel hands. The leaders of the Democratic party in the North know full well that the only hope they have of ever obtaining control of this House depends upon the success of the effort to disfranchise the Union black men in the South and filling the vacant seats here with rebels. I do not say that the leaders of the Democratic party of the North are rebels; but they know, and the country knows, that every rebel who may find a seat here will be an acquisition to the strength of the Democratic side of this House. Argument, therefore, with a view of securing support to this bill from that side would be in vain; but it may be well, for a moment, to consider an objection urged with a slight show of plausibility, founded upon a supposed failure of the people of Alabama to comply with the terms of the reconstruction laws.

It is asserted not only here, but proclaimed through every rebel and Democratic paper in the land, that the proposed constitution was defeated by an overwhelming majority of the voters of the State. This has been so persistently repeated that many who have no means of correct information no doubt believe the statement. But is the statement true? We have just had the report of General Grant, announcing the vote so far as received, a few districts not yet returned. And how stands that vote? Can the people, who have been told that the constitution was voted down, believe that the vote in fact stands 70,812 for the constitution and only 1,005 against it? Yet such is the fact. I admit that probably the whole vote will not show a clear majority of all the men in the State qualified by registration as voters. By a strange and inexplicable provision of the reconstruction law it was required that the vote on the constitution should show a clear majority of all the qualified voters in the State. Not that a majority should vote for the constitution, but that a majority should vote; and then if a simple majority of those voting were found in its favor it should be held as adopted. I do not question the motives of those who persisted in forcing this provision into the law, because I do not and never did comprehend their purpose. It seemed to me then, and does still, that if the President and Jeff. Davis, with Jerry Black to aid them, had framed this provision, it could not have been more ingeniously devised to aid the rebels, discourage and oppress the loyal people of the State, and secure the defeat of the constitution! It will be seen by this strange provision that every opponent of the constitution was relieved from the trouble of going to the election, as he would be counted against it whether he voted or not. By the same provision all of both parties who might die between the date of registering and voting were to be counted as having voted against it! So, too, all who were sick or had removed from the district or from any other accident or unavoidable cause were detained from the polls were counted in opposition.

And, as if this was not sufficient, its very terms called into play all the malignant hate of the rebels, and virtually invited them to exercise all their resources of deception, fraud, intimidation, and open violence to keep voters from the polls, for every one so prevented from voting was counted as having voted with the opposition!

Sir, in view of this provision there need be no surprise at the evidence of fraud, threats, and violence presented by the committee as having been used to keep men from voting. This evidence is sufficient to startle the country. But I shall not detain the House by repeating it, and especially as we virtually invited it. The only wonder is that in the face of these obstacles and dangers so very large a vote was cast. Nothing less than the conviction of the people that their freedom or slavery depended upon the ballot could have induced so many to risk all present dangers and to overcome all surmountable obstacles in order to vote. In spite of every difficulty the vote, as just announced by General Grant, stands, as I said, more than seventy thousand for the constitution and less than two thousand against it! Yet gentleman say it is defeated; not, be it remembered, because there are not votes enough in its favor to carry it, but because there are not enough against it! For all admit that if there had been ten or twenty or forty or even sixty thousand more votes cast against it than there were, and not another in its favor, it would have been carried triumphantly!

Sir, this most astonishing effect of the vote results from our blunder and not from the fault of the loyal people of Alabama. And shall they be made to suffer from our mistake? How can we, how dare we, refuse our assent to the petition of these people, and in consequence of a technical failure, if even such there be, to comply with this absurd provision of our own act, turn them over to the tender mercies of their rebel enemies?

Mr. Speaker, the evidence before us shows conclusively to my mind, and I am sure to every unprejudiced mind in this House who will examine it, that a clear majority of the living and resident voters of the State did, in the face of such obstacles and dangers as are inconceivable to those not so circumstanced, vote at that election; and for the constitution. Being satisfied, therefore, beyond a doubt that the spirit of the reconstruction law has been fully complied with, and its letter even substantially so, I shall vote for the bill.

Mr. KERR obtained the floor.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I desire that an order shall be made to print what I shall offer to-morrow as an amendment to the bill.

Mr. KERR. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I have no objection to its being printed, but there are two amendments now pending.

The SPEAKER. One is in the nature of a substitute, and the other is an amendment to the original bill.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Mine is an amendment to one section of the bill.

The SPEAKER. It is an amendment to strike out all after a part of the second section and insert, which is in order. In the absence of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] the Chair has assigned the floor to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. KERR.]

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. PAINE. I ask the gentleman from Indiana to allow me to present a memorial.

Mr. KERR. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. PAINE. If agreeable to the gentleman from Indiana, I will move that the House adjourn.

Mr. KERR. In one moment I will yield for that motion. I desire to suggest that the numerous affidavits that have been referred to by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] be printed for the information of the House and laid upon our desks before this matter is disposed of. I hope the gentleman will consent that an order shall be made for the printing of those affidavits.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I have no objection, but I doubt if they can be printed by to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that the bill and amendments will first be printed. That is the rule at the Government Printing Office; and then the affidavits will be printed if there is time.

Mr. KERR. I think they can be printed.

The SPEAKER. The order to print will be made if there be no objection. The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will send an order to the Printing Office to have them printed by to-morrow.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I wish to state that I desire to call for a vote on this bill to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. At what time?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Can it be discussed during the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. To-morrow is private bill day, and unless the House by a majority vote should set aside private business this bill will not come up until after the morning hour.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Then I will ask the previous question at half past three o'clock to-morrow, so that we can get the vote by half past four.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move that the morning hour be dispensed with to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. That cannot be done until the day arrives.

Mr. KERR. I now yield to gentlemen who desire to introduce some bills, and then for a motion to adjourn.

SHERMAN, WILLIAMS, and MORGAN as conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move that the House accede to the request of the Senate and appoint a committee of conference. The motion was agreed to.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

FOREIGN AND COASTING TRADE.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 266.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 266) to regulate the foreign and coasting trade on the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. CHANDLER. As the Committee on Commerce have reported an amendment to the bill in the nature of a substitute, I ask that the substitute only be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The substitute only will be read unless the reading of the original bill is called for by some Senator.

The Secretary read the amendment of the Committee on Commerce, which was to strike out all of the original bill after the enacting clause and to insert the following in lieu thereof:

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to hear some explanation of this bill. It is a very long and, it strikes me, a very important bill, and it has been on our tables but a day or two. I have never seen or heard of it before. I should like to have an explanation of where it comes from, what it means, and what the operation is.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is a bill that materially affects the commerce of the northwestern lakes and changes the present rules and regulations to a considerable extent. Under existing laws a vessel taking in a cargo at Buffalo destined for different points between Buffalo and Chicago is obliged to take out a manifest and general papers at every port where she discharges cargo, paying custom-house fees. This bill changes that. It authorizes the captain of the ship at the point of departure to state upon his manifest what his cargo is and where it is to be delivered, and not compel him to report until he reaches his final port of destination. For instance, a propeller at Buffalo, her final destination being Chicago, will take on cargo for Cleveland, Detroit, Mackinaw, Milwaukee, and other points, and is compelled, if she lands in the night, to await the opening of the custom-house to get out her papers, and is subject to great delay and expense. This does away with that, and authorizes him to state upon his manifest every port at which he proposes to stop until arriving at the end of the voyage and what is to be delivered there. That is the chief end of section one.

Then there is a proviso applying to steamers plying only upon the Niagara, Detroit, and St. Clair rivers. A vessel that is worth, perhaps, eight or ten thousand dollars will touch every five or six miles upon each side of those rivers, and is obliged to take out a manifest every time she touches Canadian soil and touches American soil, thus compelling a small vessel of very slight value to pay in many instances as high as fifteen or eighteen hundred dollars. This bill does away with the multiplicity of manifests which heretofore she has been compelled to go through with. It reduces somewhat the fees which are paid by these small steamers. It saves a great deal of time and trouble and a vast amount of labor which is deemed useless.

Then the general fees are not materially altered, although they are slightly changed. The large sums paid by these small steamers are reduced, and the fees generally are changed somewhat, but very slightly. For example, as the fee-bill now stands, the fee "for granting license, including bond and oath, above twenty and not over one hundred tons," is one dollar; this bill makes it seventy cents. "For certifying manifest, including master's oath, and granting permit to vessels to go from one district to another over fifty tons," the fee is now fifty cents, and it is here made fifty cents. "For debenture or other official certificate not otherwise provided for" the fee is now twenty-five cents, and this bill makes it twenty cents. In some cases the fees are raised slightly, but the general effect is to leave the amount about the same.

The bill was very carefully considered by the Committee on Commerce, and unanimously reported. I have in my hands a petition, signed, I believe, by nearly all the shippers on the lakes, and certainly by all in Detroit, earnestly urging the passage of the bill. It is a bill which is deemed of very great importance to the commerce of the lakes. If there are any other points in regard to which Senators desire explanation I shall be happy to tender it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to have this bill lie over, in order that I may look into it. I have now seen it for the first time, and know nothing about it. I should like to know from the Senator from Michigan if the bill has been examined at the Treasury Department?

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to look into it and see what its effect is to be. I have had no opportunity, seeing it now for the first time, to form any opinion about it.

Mr. CHANDLER. Very well; but I beg to say to the Senate that I shall call it up to-morrow morning. I can say to the Senator from Maine that our ships are about coming out within a week or two, and it is deemed very important by the shipping interest of the lakes that the bill should pass before the opening of navigation, which will take place about the 1st of April. I hope there will be as little delay as possible, and I shall endeavor to call up the bill to-morrow morning.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I want an opportunity to examine it carefully before it is taken up, and I do not know that I shall have that opportunity by to-morrow morning.

The bill was postponed until to-morrow.

NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. CATTELL. I move to take up for consideration Senate bill No. 440, which was reported from the Committee on Finance, and is a bill supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864.

Mr. HOWE. I wish to say to the Senate that there are several bills here reported from the Committee on Claims, and it has been several times said that this day, Friday, should be set apart for passing upon those bills. We have not enough of them, I think, to occupy the Senate more than an hour or two to-day, and I would be very glad if the Senate would allow those few cases to be passed upon. Some of them have been hanging here a long time, and others have been reported recently.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARLAN] was broken off in the midst of a speech the other day by the calling up of the special order at one o'clock; and there was a general understanding that the bill on which he was speaking should be considered this morning. I hope that will be taken up, and the Senator allowed to conclude his speech.

Mr. HOWARD. I was about to call the attention of the Senate to that bill.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator from Iowa is prepared to go on.

Mr. HOWARD. The bill referred to is the bill relating to the Central Branch Union Pacific railroad. I hope it will be taken up. The Senator from Iowa is very anxious to finish his remarks on the subject.

Mr. CATTELL. In regard to the bill which I now ask the Senate to take up I will only state that the Comptroller of the Currency, in the particular circumstances which surround him at present, is desirous that this bill reported by the Finance Committee, if passed, should be passed soon; and I trust that as it is a bill of considerable public importance it will be taken up. It can probably be disposed of between this time and the termination of the morning hour.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not rise to object to the proposition of the Senator from New Jersey on his statement that the bill will only occupy the time of the Senate between this and one o'clock; but I give notice that at one o'clock I shall ask the Senate to take up for consideration the naval appropriation bill. I think it is quite important that we should act on that bill, so that it may go back to the House of Representatives very soon.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope the Senate will consent to take up the bill to which I have referred, the one we had under consideration the day before yesterday. The Senator from Iowa had not completed his remarks upon it, and is now under the necessity of leaving town for a short time on account of sickness in his family. I am very anxious to go on with that bill, and I hope the Senate will consent to do so.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire of the Senator from Michigan whether his motion is to take up that bill merely to enable the Senator from Iowa to complete his remarks, or with a view to continuing the consideration of the bill afterward?

Mr. HOWARD. Of course my purpose is to continue the consideration of the bill until we can reach a final vote upon it; but I wish at the same time to give the Senator from Iowa an opportunity to finish his remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That question is not before the Senate. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. SUMNER. On this question of taking up I desire to say that it does seem to me, considering that we have already entered upon the consideration of the bill now moved by the Senator from Michigan, that it has occupied so much of our time, that we have got so far in it, in all probability so near the termination of the debate, and that, in point of fact, one of our number was in the midst of a speech when the subject the other day was postponed, ought to take that up in preference to all other business that is not of the most urgent character, and press it to a conclusion. Of course we should give our friend from Iowa the opportunity of finishing his remarks. That is beyond all question; but, besides that, the bill being once again before the Senate, I think it would be for the economy of public time that we should proceed with it to its final disposition. I hope, therefore, that my friend from Maine will not press to-day his appropriation bill, at least to the exclusion of this other bill which is now moved by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire simply to state that the bill which the Senator from New Jersey moves to take up is one which, in the judgment of the Finance Committee, is very important. It is a bill of two sections only, and those sections being read, in all probability will commend themselves to the judgment of Senators, and we can dispose of that bill in the time we occupy in discussing the priority of business. I hope the Senate will take it up. It is a matter of importance in connection with the regulation of the currency; and surely the currency of the country is sufficiently deranged to command some consideration at the hands of Senators. The bill has been reported for some time, and has been lying on gentlemen's desks, and being a matter of much greater importance than the measure urged by the Senator from Massachusetts I think it ought to be taken up and considered. I live in the immediate vicinity of the railroad to which the bill urged by him relates; and while it is a proposition which perhaps a very large majority of my constituents feel interested in, I have taken no part in its discussion, and I do not know that I shall take any part in it. Yet, as I have been cognizant of all the circumstances connected with that road from the beginning, as I took part in the legislation of 1862, of 1864, and of 1866, I feel confident in my own mind that this is a much more important measure than that. While that proposes to increase the public debt of the United States, this proposes to do something toward reviving business by a correction of errors in our financial system.

Mr. FOWLER. While I am in favor of taking up at an early day the bill mentioned by the Senator from Michigan, there is another bill that I feel disposed to press. It is true it is not in my hands, and, therefore, I cannot bring it before the Senate; but I feel bound to mention it. One of the districts in my State has been here by its Representative for four months pressing its claims upon the attention of Congress, and as yet that Representative has not been admitted to his seat. The House of Representatives has passed a bill for his admission as one of its members, and that bill is now before the Senate, and has been before it for four or five weeks. I think we ought to act on that bill one way or the other, and let the people of that district know what they shall expect. They sent him here by a Republican majority of ten thousand votes, probably the largest Republican majority in any district in the State of Tennessee, and one of the largest Republican majorities in any district in the United States, a district that furnished more soldiers to the Union Army, in proportion to its population, than any other district in America. And yet this Representative has been kept out of his seat for four months, and the proposition to admit him has been four weeks before the Senate without any action upon it. I think the Senate ought to take up that bill and decide upon it at once. I feel disposed to vote with the Senator from Michigan in reference to the claim which he presents for this bill; but I think the measure to which I have just referred ought to be acted upon and disposed of.

Mr. CATTELL. I think the bill which I have moved to take up could probably have been disposed of in the time which the discussion in regard to taking it up has consumed. I hope gentlemen will permit it to come up, after the statement of two members of the Finance Committee as to its importance, and at least allow it to be proceeded with until the close of the morning hour.

Mr. THAYER. I observe that on almost every occasion when a motion is made to take up a bill more time is spent in the discussion of the question whether it shall be taken up than would be necessary to pass the bill. If there was less of talking and more of action I think we should accomplish much more. I hope we shall vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 16, noes 12.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, accordingly proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 440) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864.

The first section makes it unlawful for national banks located in the cities of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, or any of the cities named in section thirty-one of the act approved June 3, 1864, to pay interest on the deposits or balances of any other national banking association, or to offer any inducement, other than the prompt and correct transaction of business, in order to secure such deposits. It is made the duty of the Comptroller of the Currency to see that this act is observed; and upon a violation thereof by any national banking association he is to proceed, as in other cases of default, to appoint a receiver to wind up the affairs of such association according to the provisions of section fifty of the act of June 3, 1864.

By the second section it is provided that every national banking association selected as a depository of public moneys under the provisions of section forty-five of the national currency act shall deposit United States bonds with the Treasurer of the United States as security for such deposits; and whenever the public moneys deposited in such association shall exceed ninety per cent. of the par value of the bonds so held by the Treasurer as security the Treasurer is forthwith, by draft or otherwise, to reduce the amount of such deposits to a sum not exceeding ninety per cent. of the bonds thus deposited. If any officer or agent of any association designated as a depository of public moneys shall pay or offer to pay any money or other valuable consideration, directly or indirectly, for the purpose of obtaining or retaining deposits of public moneys, or if any officer or agent of the Government shall receive any money or other valuable consideration, directly or indirectly, for making such deposit of public moneys, such officer or agent is to be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof to be punished by a fine of not less than $1,000, or imprisonment for not less than one year nor more than five years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If no amendment be proposed the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. I suggest that before the bill is reported to the Senate any explanation that is to be made had better be made. The explanation may suggest amendments that some Senator would like to offer. I should be glad to hear the explanation.

Mr. CATTELL. Mr. President, the bill under consideration was reported to the Senate on the 16th instant from the Finance Committee, and its passage recommended by the unanimous vote of the committee. Considering the measure proposed one of great importance I beg the indulgence of the Senate while I state briefly the provisions of the bill and the reasons which govern me in advocating its passage. As the title indicates, the bill is an amendment to the act creating the national banking system commonly known as the national currency act. Of this system from its inception I have always been an earnest advocate. Its superiority over the old State bank system which it superseded is now universally admitted. Without stopping to discuss the question whether the creation of banks of issue under State authority was not the assumption by the States of a power reserved to the Federal Government by the framers of the Constitution, it is safe to say the power was at least doubtful; and all must admit that the escape from the evils resulting from a currency heterogeneous, unequal, and unsafe to one uniform, equal, and safe, is cause for congratulation, and I venture to say that so radical a change in the character of the currency of a great country bringing with it so much to commend and so little to condemn, and in the transition disturbing so little the business and monetary affairs of the nation, is without a parallel in the history of the world.

And, Mr. President, I deeply regret the antagonism to this system which has been exhibited in some quarters, threatening its destruction even before its great advantages are fully developed. Since it seems to be conceded that paper money is a necessity in all great commercial countries, and banks of issue are recognized as legitimate agencies in promoting the trade and commerce of our own country, let us give a fair trial to that system which has delivered us from the financial anarchy that reigned under the irregular, unequal, and unsafe issues of the State banks, and has given us a single, uniform currency of equal value all over our broad land, regulated and controlled by the Government, and amply secured to the holders thereof by a pledge of Government bonds. The system has received the popular sanction. Doubts which existed in some minds at first have been removed by observation of the practical workings of the plan. The distinguished Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN,] when Secretary of the Treasury, said, in his report to Congress, December, 1864, when alluding to the national banks:

"The Secretary was not among the first to approve the plan adopted by Congress, and which seems to be receiving the popular sanction. Time and observation of its effects have, however, convinced him that the system, if not without defects, is based upon sound principles, and is entitled to all the benefits of a fair trial."

Having myself been brought into close connection with the system, and having carefully observed its workings and studied the principles upon which it is based, I concur with a recent writer, who says:

"If the national banking system shall prove as great a benefit as we believe it to be it will give to the administration of Mr. Lincoln a distinction in history only second to that acquired by the abolition of slavery and the successful conduct of the war."

I have chosen to say thus much in regard to my estimate of the national banking system lest in advocating the measure now before the Senate I might be supposed to be inimical to the plan. In what I have already said I do not mean to be understood as claiming that the system is a perfect one. There are, doubtless, some defects which can be remedied by the wisdom of Congress, and it is because I am anxious that the system should in all respects commend itself to the public favor and bear the most rigid scrutiny as to its soundness and its conservative influences in the monetary affairs of the nation that I advocate the amendment proposed in this bill, which, in my judgment, will remedy one of the principal defects. The first section of the bill provides—

That it shall be unlawful for national banks located in the cities of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, or any of the cities named in section thirty-one of an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864, to pay interest on the deposits or balances of any other national banking association, or to offer any other inducement, other than the prompt and correct transaction of business, in order to secure such deposits; and it is hereby made the duty of the Comptroller of the Currency to see that this act is observed; and upon a violation thereof by any national banking association he is hereby authorized and required to proceed, as in other cases of default, to appoint a receiver to wind up the affairs of such association according to the provisions of section fifty of said act.

This section is intended to break up, as far as possible, the pernicious practice of the payment of interest by one class of national banks to other national banks on their deposits or current balances. In my judgment, the payment of interest on current deposits or balances of either banks or individuals is illegitimate banking, injurious alike to the banks themselves and the people. Banks are properly lenders of money, not borrowers, and when they bid for money one rate of interest for the purpose of loaning it out at a higher rate they depart from their legitimate business, and become speculators in money, which not only tends to enhance the rate of interest, but also to bring into actual use and risk the reserve of the country, which is manifestly unsafe and unwise, because this reserve is the conservative power of the legitimate business of the country, the necessary balance to steady the financial ship. Moreover, the tendency of this practice is to draw capital unnaturally to the great commercial centers to the impoverishment of all other localities; and thus, while it produces a scarcity of capital for legitimate trade at one point it produces a temporary plethora of money in the cities, which, being loaned on call to stock-brokers and speculators, tends to produce unsteadiness in business, excessive fluctuations in stocks, facilitates, in the present condition of affairs, the gambling gold operations of Wall street, and is productive of mischief alike to the community and to the banks themselves.

This view is sustained by a highly intelligent committee of New York bank officers, appointed a few years ago to examine this subject and to report upon it to the clearing-house association of New York. In this report, which is an exceedingly able and interesting one, they say:

"We believe that the system of allowing interest on current deposits is unsound in principle, unsafe in practice, and that it operates injuriously both upon the banks themselves and upon the commercial community."

And near the conclusion of their report, in urging upon the banks the adoption of an agreement not to pay interest upon balances, they express the opinion—

"That no simple measure can be adopted of a public or legislative character that will so effectually secure the good of the country at large without the least admixture of evil."

Now, let us look for a moment at the practical working of this practice of paying interest on bank balances under the provisions of the national currency act. The thirty-first section of the act reads as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That every association in the cities hereinafter named shall at all times have on hand, in lawful money of the United States, an amount equal to at least twenty-five per cent. of the aggregate amount of its notes in circulation and its deposits; and every other association shall at all times have on hand, in lawful money of the United States, an amount equal to at least fifteen per cent. of the aggregate amount of its notes in circulation and of its deposits. And whenever the lawful money of any association in any of the cities hereinafter named shall be below the amount of twenty-five per cent. of its circulation and deposits, and whenever the lawful money of any other association shall be below fifteen per cent. of its circulation and deposits, such association shall not increase its liabilities by making any new loans or discounts otherwise than by discounting or purchasing bills of exchange payable at sight, nor make any dividend of its profits, until the required proportion between the aggregate amount of its outstanding notes of circulation and deposits and its lawful money of the United States shall be restored: Provided, That three fifths of said fifteen per cent. may consist of balances due to an association available for the redemption of its circulating notes from associations approved by the Comptroller of the Currency, organized under this act, in the cities of St. Louis, Louisville, Chicago, Detroit, Milwaukee, New Orleans, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Pittsburg, Baltimore, Philadelphia, Boston, New York, Albany, Leavenworth, San Francisco, and Washington city."

Now, it will be observed that by the provisions of this section the banks outside of the redemption cities are required to maintain a reserve of fifteen per cent. of their liabilities for circulation and deposit. This reserve is presumed to be the conservative power of the system to be kept in lawful money at all times unused and not subjected to risk. But the law further provides that three fifths of this amount may consist of balances due from other banks located in either of the redemption cities. The country bank cannot, without violation of the law, use this money reserve in their own business; but they may send it to a bank in one of the cities named, and virtually loan it to them at such rate of interest as may be agreed upon, while the city bank must, of course, reloan it at a higher rate of interest, thus putting the reserve at work as if it were usable capital, and virtually destroying the conservative power intended by the requirement of the specified reserve. Nor is this all. The country bank finds that with the rate of interest allowed them by the city banks, and with the profits on exchange drawn against its city funds, the temptation is strong to keep even a much larger sum at the redemption centers than the three fifths of the reserve provided for by law. An examination of the figures in the quarterly reports of the national banking associations, made in accordance with law, discloses the fact that a sum much larger than three fifths of the reserve is kept by the country banks on deposit at the redeeming agencies. Let us look at the figures.

The aggregate of circulation and deposits of all the national banks on the 6th of January, 1868, was $836,039,306, requiring a reserve by law of $168,470,000. Aggregate amount of circulation and deposits of banks located outside of redemption cities, $405,395,131, requiring a reserve of $60,809,000. Now, three fifths of this amount is $36,485,400; and this is the sum we might naturally expect to see in the banks of the redeeming cities to the credit of the national banks. But what is the fact? A further reference to the figures of the quarterly statement of the 6th of January, 1868, will show that—

The national banks really have on deposit in the redemption cities.....	$39,513,242
But the banks located in redemption cities report that they have at their redeeming agencies in New York, which is included in the above sum, and must be deducted in order to show the actual amount of deposits by banks outside of redemption cities.....	17,732,018
Balance.....	$71,781,224

If these figures be correct, then the country banks have over seventy-one millions of their money—about one third of the entire amount of their capital—withdrawn from the communities in which they are located, and for whose accommodation they were established, and placed on deposit in the redemption cities. Now, it is said, and I think with great justice, that the West and Southwest have not their fair share of banking facilities. You will hear this, I imagine, before the session closes, from my friend, the Senator from Missouri, [MR. HENDERSON,] in a somewhat impressive form. You will, if I mistake not, find him demanding, in the name of the people he represents, either an extension of the limit of circulation or a more equitable apportionment of that now existing; and yet, in the face of the admitted fact that circulation is frequently short of the actual requirements of trade in the interior, it is gathered up and expressed to the large cities to swell the bank balances upon which interest is allowed. I am aware it may be said that the reserve, even if kept at home, could not be used, which is undoubtedly true; but, as I have shown, the amount actually kept at redemption points is about twice as much as is admissible to be counted as reserve, and to the extent of this excess the practice impoverishes the localities from which the capital is withdrawn.

I object, therefore, Mr. President, to the practice of paying interest on bank balances, because, so far as the reserve is concerned, it is an indirect method of using what is required by law to be kept unused—free from all risk, and immediately available. This fund should be literally what the term implies, a reserve; this it ceases to be when deposited in another bank upon conditions which make its use a necessity, just as fully as if three fourths of it were used in discounting by the country bank itself. And so far as the excess above the reserve is attracted from its natural channel by the payment of interest, I object to it, because it tends to divert capital from its legitimate sphere, and accumulates it at the commercial centers only to foster speculation and work mischief. The amount of these bank balances are always largest when they are least wanted, and always rapidly reduced when their withdrawal is the most inconvenient. It would be easy to show, also, that the profit to the city banks adopting this policy is more apparent than real; but as my argument is not addressed to bank managers, I will not detain the Senate on this point further than to say that, as a bank officer under the State law, and also under the national system, I have always resisted the payment of interest on bank balances as unsound in finance, wrong in principle, and, to say the least, doubtful as a source of profit.

I trust this feature of the bill will meet the approbation of the Senate, and that it will become law. It has the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency, who thus speaks upon the subject in his late very able report to Congress:

"Attention is respectfully called to a practice prevailing more or less in the banks of the principal cities, of paying interest on the balances of country banks—a practice characterized by the Chancellor of the Exchequer of England, in commenting upon the causes which led to the crises of 1857, as 'one eminently liable to abuse, and containing within it elements of danger, and to which many of the evils of the recent crises may be attributed.'"

"Country banks keep deposits with city banks for the purpose of facilitating exchanges in carrying on their own business; and ordinarily it is to be presumed they find a profit in doing such business, and in keeping a working balance in the city banks. The funds so placed are needed, and properly belong there, but will not be allowed to exceed the amount actually necessary for the current demands of business. The payment of high rates of interest on such balances attracts all the spare capital from the country to the commercial centers, while it is still payable on call. This capital would not remain dead or unemployed, but it is drawn away from the country where it is needed, to the business centers, where the rate of interest is higher. The cities then come into competition with the country, and compel borrowers in the country to pay higher rates."

"But, as the banks pay interest for such deposits, they must be used; the city banker becomes a broker, a seeker after investments; he must get more interest than he pays or he will lose money; he must loan it on call, for it is payable on demand, and it will always be demanded when he wants it most. Deposits are the reserve of the country, and the deposits of the country banks, at the centers of trade, are their reserves for all demand liabilities. Required by law to keep a reserve equal to fifteen per cent. of their deposits and circulation, three fifths of this reserve may consist of balances due from the city banks. Forbidden to use their reserve in their own business, they remit it to New York, where it is not held in reserve, but it is loaned to stock-brokers and speculators. Receiving interest on the amount under the name of a deposit, they really loan it on call to the city banks, which in their turn loan it at a higher rate of interest."

The second section of the bill is intended to apply additional safeguards to the public moneys deposited in such national banks as are or may be designated as depositories of public moneys.

It will be remembered that the House of Representatives passed a bill abolishing these depositories in certain localities, which was referred to the Finance Committee, and after a careful examination of the subject was reported back to the Senate with a recommendation that it be not passed.

The Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McCulloch; the Treasurer of the United States, General Spinner; the Comptroller of the Currency, Mr. Hulburd; and Mr. Van Dyck, the Assistant Treasurer at New York, from each of whom the committee sought information, all concur in the opinion that it would be unwise for the Government and inconvenient to the public to disperse with the services of these institutions in receiving the deposits of the collectors of internal revenue. Mr. Van Dyck puts the matter so clearly in his reply to the inquiry of the Secretary of the Treasury, that I beg to call the attention of the Senate to his letter. He says:

UNITED STATES TREASURY,
NEW YORK, August 22, 1867.

"In regard to receiving the deposits of collectors of internal revenue I have not been able to see my way clear in the matter. The first objection relates to the time at which the deposit can be made here. Most of the collectors are so far away that their accounts for the day would have to be made up long before the close of business, in order to get them in here in season. Then they wish a certificate of the amount deposited to transmit, which I should be unwilling to give until the amount claimed had been verified by an actual count. The question also arises what they are to do with the balance of the day's collections. No bank would be willing to receive and keep it over night only to have it reclaimed the next day, and it is very questionable whether it could be safely left in the office. Besides, now, each day's collections, as shown by the books, must be deposited, and a comparison between these and the books of the bank will always show whether the whole has been duly deposited. But if we split up the business between different days, there will be more difficulty in tracing discrepancies and another door opened to irregularities."

But a stronger objection is found in the fact that very many payments are made in checks on all the banks in this city and Brooklyn, which institutions are widely scattered and distant from this office. The several banks receiving the deposits collect these checks through the clearing-house, but in our case they have to be collected by messenger. Think of the trouble and annoyance of collecting hundreds of these small checks in this way. We should need much additional help in the receiving department; we should have to keep open much beyond the usual hours; we should subject collectors (and they citizens) to much annoyance without commensurate advantage.

H. H. VAN DYCK,
Assistant Treasurer.

Hon. H. McCulloch, Secretary, &c.

Moreover the committee found upon examination that the Department held ample security for the sums deposited in the banks, a security which presents a striking contrast to the security given by assistant treasurers:

The total amount of United States deposits in national banks, designated depositories, on the 1st of January, 1868, was.....	$19,600,000
United States bonds held as collateral security for same.....	$7,827,000
Total amount at same period held by Assistant Treasurers.....	133,353,243
Security, personal bonds, for.....	1,955,000

So, as a question of security, it would hardly seem natural to withdraw deposits secured by a pledge of two dollars for one in United States bonds, and transfer them where in the very nature of the case it is impossible to have any security worth the naming other than the integrity and honor of the officer. Besides, it has been estimated, I believe, by the Secretary of the Treasury, and the United States Treasurer, that the services performed by the national depositories would cost the Government, if the labor were performed by its own officers, from $1,000,000 to $2,000,000 per annum.

Your committee, therefore, in view of the ample security held from the deposit banks—the convenience to the public, and to the collectors of internal revenue, and the value of the services rendered by the banks to the Government, fail to see any good reason why their use should at present be discontinued.

It is proposed, however, to guard more fully two points. First, to provide that not more than ninety per cent. of the par value of the bonds deposited as security shall be allowed in any designated depository; and, secondly, to make it a misdemeanor, punishable by fine and imprisonment, for any officer or agent of any association designated as a depository of public moneys to pay or offer to pay any money or other valuable consideration, directly or indirectly, for the purpose of obtaining or retaining deposits of public moneys, and visiting a like punishment on any officer or agent of the Government who shall receive any money or valuable consideration, directly or indirectly, for making such deposit of public moneys. Both these points are covered by the second section of the bill. A faithful observance of its provisions in regard to the first will render loss to the Government well nigh impossible, and the intimation that improper influences may have been used to secure deposits has led the committee to recommend the stringent provisions against such a practice contained in the latter clause of this second section.

Believing, Mr. President, that the passage of this bill will result in great good to the legitimate business of the country at large, that it will remedy one of the most serious defects of the national bank system, and thus make the system still more effective in its operations and still more popular with the people, I sincerely trust it will meet with the favorable consideration of the Senate and become a law of the land.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, to my mind this bill is an excellent one for the city banks; but if I can trust to an experience of some thirty years connected with country banks I think it would break them all up; and it rather seems to me to have been gotten up for that purpose—not, of course, by the Senator from New Jersey—but somehow or other it looks to me as if this was a great combination of the city banks to make more money out of the country institutions. I do not see how the country banks can exist if you are to prevent them from receiving interest upon the deposits they have in the cities. They are compelled to send their funds to the cities for the redemption of their notes because the notes go there first. I believe the bank law makes it a part of their duty to redeem their notes at certain designated cities. They have only a portion of the year when they can do business at home. The business of the country banks comes from the agricultural products and the mining products of the neighborhoods in which the banks are located. During the time when the farmer is preparing his stock for market he borrows from the country bank. When the feeder is buying his lean cattle he borrows his money from the country bank. When the product goes to market there is a certain period of the year when the country banks have scarcely any business at home, except to lend money at long time upon accommodation notes made for the purpose of getting loans, and upon the payment of which at a fixed time they can never certainly depend. Their custom is, during the business season, to do the whole business of the country which is legitimate, and for which they expect to be paid in a reasonable time; and afterward the country banks in my State send their money to Philadelphia and in other States to other commercial centers, and receive an interest upon it while it remains there upon deposit. I have no means of knowing just now the amount of deposits in New York and Philadelphia belonging entirely to country banks, but they must be immense.

This bill will enable the city banks to control the country banks entirely, and induce them to place their money in the hands of brokers; for, after all, the system in the cities is to get as much money out of their unemployed funds as possible, the same as it is in the country. They lend money by the day, sometimes by the hour, to brokers upon stock securities, and they can call it in whenever they please. If this bill is to pass I shall propose to amend it by inserting after the word "deposits" in the twelfth line—

Nor shall any bank located in any of the said cities loan to brokers or other person engaged in stock speculations any portion of their funds.

It is just as important that you should save the city banks from making wild and improper loans as it is that you should save the country banks from doing wrong. In the course of my life I have seen at three different periods a general failure of the banks; and my experience is that in each case the failures began in the cities. The city banks were unable to pay their deposits to the country banks and stopped payments, and then the country banks were compelled to stop also. There will not be that danger under this system, however.

Mr. CATTELL. Allow me to ask my friend if that is not a very good reason why the country banks should not keep so much of their funds in these city banks, where they are in danger?

Mr. CAMERON. I expected that question, but there is nothing in it. When the city banks broke up, as they have always done at every crisis heretofore, the whole monetary affairs of the country stopped. There is a great system, and one stops with the other.

There is no reason why the country banks should be required to keep the reserved fund in any one particular bank. It is just as convenient, and more convenient, for a country bank to have its funds in the city than at home; and it is just as safe, because each is part of a great system, and if the system breaks down all go together.

I was not prepared for this bill to come up to-day. I did not think of it, indeed; nor did I believe it was going to be seriously pressed. I thought it was one of those schemes that are very often got up in the cities, and which I have frequently seen during my life got up for particular effect; but if it is seriously proposed to pass the bill I will offer the amendment which I have indicated.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Why not just as well go on with it to-day?

Mr. WILSON. There are other matters to be considered to-day.

Mr. CATTELL. Allow me to make a single remark to urge the early passage of this bill, if it is to be passed at all. As I understand it, some of the older and stronger banks in the city of New York have found out that, at any rate, if the principle itself is not wrong, they have been paying too great a rate of interest, and they have notified the banks in the interior that they must reduce that rate. Some of the banks, perhaps not so strong, taking advantage of that state of facts, are offering to pay the old rate of interest, four per cent. Consequently the country banks are, to a large extent, applying to the Comptroller of the Currency for permission to change their redeeming agency from one bank to another, and I think he anticipates great evil in concentrating into some of the smaller banks a very much larger amount of reserve than should be in a single bank. While this matter is in abeyance he will be somewhat embarrassed. He would prefer, rather than to decide upon those applications as they come along, to have the question settled whether the practice is to be dispensed with or not. It is for that reason that I should like to see the bill passed at once.

Mr. WILSON. I hope this bill will be postponed. I voted to take it up and to take the floor away from the Senator from Iowa on the bill which was laid aside the other day; but I understood, when we took up this bill, that it would occupy but a short time, only the morning hour. It has gone much beyond that, and I think we may as well postpone it until to-morrow.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I voted to take up this bill on the information of the Senator from New Jersey that it would probably not occupy much time, or only a few moments beyond one o'clock, and upon the idea that the bill which the Senator from Michigan had in charge would be likely to occupy a somewhat longer time; and also on an understanding with the Senator from New Jersey that he would yield to my purpose to call up the naval appropriation bill about this time. Now, I hope the Senator from New Jersey will have no objection to allowing this bill to pass over that I may call up the appropriation bill. I submit the motion that this bill be postponed and the Senate proceed to the consideration of the naval appropriation bill, and on that motion I wish to make a single remark—

Mr. CATTELL. I said to the Senator from Maine that if this bill led to discussion, so as to interfere with the appropriation bill which he proposed to bring up at or near one o'clock, I would make no opposition to postponing it. I should be very glad to have the bill passed, but if he insists on going on with the appropriation bill I shall not object to this bill going over.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I would suggest to the Senator from Maine whether we can take up that appropriation bill properly to-day? The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs and most of the members of that committee are away. I think it is desirable that they should be here when that bill is considered.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs is also a member of the Committee on Appropriations; he understood that the naval appropriation bill was to be called up to-day and made no objection.

Mr. CAMERON. This bank bill will most likely occupy some time. It is really a question between the city and the country banks, and when I can get the gentlemen here who are interested in the country to look at it I think there will be something more said about it than what I shall say. Besides, I want time to look into it further.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator from New Jersey consents that the bill may go over, and I have moved to take up the appropriation bill. I do not desire to antagonize the appropriation bill against the desire of the Senator from Iowa to finish his speech, but I do not understand that he makes that point at the present moment, and I confidently believe that if the Senate will proceed to the consideration of this appropriation bill it will not occupy more than an hour. With that expectation, I hope the Senate will allow the bill to come up. At any rate, I submit the motion.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope the Senate will take up the railroad bill in preference to the bill mentioned by the Senator from Maine. We have been engaged in the discussion of it a considerable time and I think have reached very nearly its close, and I really hope, for one, we shall dispose of that bill to-day, if possible.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not think the naval appropriation bill will occupy much time; and after it is disposed of the Senator will have an opportunity to make his motion. I feel bound to call that bill to the attention of the Senate now for the reason that it ought to go to the House of Representatives to be acted upon between this and to-morrow, as the Senate understands that we are to be engaged next week upon other matters.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine, to postpone the bill under consideration until to-morrow for the purpose of taking up the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. SUMNER. There seems to be a little misunderstanding here. Some Senators seem to think that the effect of refusing the postponement would be to keep the bill of the Senator from New Jersey before the Senate. Perhaps its first effect would be that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that if the motion prevails it will bring the naval appropriation bill before the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. I am in favor of proceeding with the unfinished business—

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is no unfinished business.

Mr. SUMNER. There is business that is unfinished, which has been before the Senate day by day for several days, and which may be finished now this afternoon, and the Senator from Iowa is in the midst of a speech upon it. Now, I do think it is the best economy for us to get rid of that this afternoon. Do not send it over to another day. Why should we have so many unfinished matters before the Senate? Here is the business of my friend from New Jersey, then the business of my friend from Michigan, all unfinished; and now my friend from Maine proposes to bring forward a third matter, which may be left unfinished. It does seem to me that we had better take up to-day the earliest matter which is still unfinished, and carry it to a conclusion.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. SUMNER. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If this motion does not prevail, then it will turn out that the bill under the direction of the Senator from New Jersey is before the Senate, and then certainly under the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts, that we should finish what is before the Senate, the propriety of action will be with the Senator from New Jersey, and the Senator from Massachusetts will not certainly reach his object.

Mr. SUMNER. No; I beg the Senator's pardon—

Mr. CAMERON. Will the Senator from Massachusetts give way to me for a moment. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to give me some time to prepare for the consideration of this bill; and in order to bring the question fairly, nakedly before the Senate, I move that the bill of the Senator from New Jersey be postponed—

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. There is a motion already pending to that effect. I have made that motion.

Mr. CATTELL. And I have said that, according to my arrangement with the Senator from Maine, I agreed to the postponement, and I certainly would accede to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania without a moment's hesitation.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I understand that.

Mr. SUMNER. Then do I understand that the bill of my friend from New Jersey is put aside?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not yet.

Mr. SUMNER. Can the motion be divided so as to vote first on postponing the pending bill without acting on the question of what bill shall be taken up instead of it?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I suppose not.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to have the decision of the Chair on that question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the motion is divisible.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask, then, for a division, so that we may have the question taken first on postponing the bill of the Senator from New Jersey, and then, after that, I would move to proceed with the railroad bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I submit that that cannot be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending motion appears to the Chair to be divisible, so that the first question will be on postponing the bill under consideration, and then the next question will be on taking up the naval appropriation bill, if the Senator from Massachusetts asks for a division of the question.

Mr. SUMNER. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the first question is on postponing the bill under consideration until to-morrow.

The proposition was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 480) in relation to the pay of grand and petit jurors in the District of Columbia; and

A bill (H. R. No. 566) to incorporate the Grueth-Verein of Washington, District of Columbia.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 108) for the relief of Henry Greathouse and Samuel Kelley; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

SUPREME COURT JURISDICTION—VETO.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives having proceeded, in conformity with the Constitution, to reconsider the bill (S. No. 213) entitled, "An act to amend an act to amend the judiciary act, passed 24th of September, 1789," returned by the President of the United States to the Senate with his objections, and sent by the Senate to the House of Representatives with the message of the President returning the said bill, has—

Resolved, That the bill do pass, two thirds of the House of Representatives agreeing to pass the same.

Mr. WILLIAMS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to present to the Secretary of State the bill entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to amend the judiciary act passed the 24th of September, 1789,' together with the certificates of the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, showing that the said act was passed by a vote of two thirds of both Houses of Congress, after the same had been returned to the Senate by the President with his objections and after the reconsideration of said act by both Houses of Congress, in accordance with the Constitution."

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine, to take up the naval appropriation bill for consideration.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope that will not prevail, and that we shall proceed with the railroad bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am a little interested in this railroad bill, as when it left off on the occasion next preceding the one on which my friend from Iowa was addressing the Senate I had the floor myself, endeavoring to obtain information from the chairman of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad; and I am in the middle of a speech, so to speak, although my speech has been overridden by the speech of the Senator from Iowa; but I certainly do not feel that I have a right, as representing a small portion of the people of this country, to let a local bill of this kind stand in the way of an appropriation bill, a finance bill that the proper appropriation or Finance Committee bring before this body. The usage, which has become a law with us almost, has always been, since I have had the honor to be here, to give way to these measures of finance. It has been considered that they were entitled, not by any written rule, but by the general consent of everybody, to take precedence, not only over matters of general legislation other than appropriations, but also over local bills. And yet my friend from Massachusetts seems to have a special regard for this railway that is three or four thousand miles away from him. If I did not know him so well I should almost believe that he had a special interest in it as well as a regard in the way, of course, of representing some peculiar client—I should rather say constituent—who was desirous to take two million dollars and a little upward of the people's money, for a good use, of course, to build a railway with.

But of course I do not suppose that; if I did not know him so well I should; but I know that no other consideration than that of the highest public welfare can possibly have any influence in his conduct. Therefore I believe it to be entirely a question of public welfare with him; and that is what leads me to feel surprised that, being animated only by such a sentiment of public welfare, he should oppose this local measure that may as well be passed, if it is to be passed, next week as this week, or next month as this month, against the Committee on Appropriations bringing forward their regular annual supply bill to provide for maintaining and carrying on the processes of the Navy.

I say it is against our traditions; and my honorable friend knows that as well as I and perhaps much better than I. And I am astonished that gentlemen should so persistently insist upon pressing local measures, however important they may be to the persons interested in them, however important they may be to the particular locality that is to be benefited by them, against measures of general concern providing for the general legislation and the general welfare of the country.

It is true, sir, that your Calendar is full of bills that are quite necessary to be passed, bills of general import, necessary, in some instances, to the preservation of the public money, in others to the regulation of suits against the United States. I have in mind a bill reported from a committee of which I happen to be an humble member, that it is of great importance should be passed immediately, regulating appeals from the Court of Claims, regulating the law of evidence there in the cotton cases where millions are at stake; and yet I do not feel at liberty to press a bill of that kind against the measure which the Finance Committee, or the Committee on Appropriations, which is only a branch of it, choose to bring forward. I certainly hope, therefore, that the friends of this Central Branch Pacific railway bill will be willing to give way to those usual considerations of courtesy and progress of business—I speak it in all sincerity—that have obtained here, and let those matters of general legislation be passed through, and then we will consider fairly their measure.

Mr. HARLAN. I think it is, perhaps, due to the chairman of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad that after the remarks submitted by the Senator who has just taken his seat I should state that I think the chairman is prompted perhaps somewhat on my account to urge the Senate to consider the railroad bill now. The gentlemen who have invested their money in the construction of the road which it affects have said to him and to me that they thought, from my former connection with the committee, when the law of 1864 was framed, and with the Interior Department for a short time while the law was being administered, I was personally conversant with facts which ought to be stated in the Senate with a view of arriving at a just conclusion on that subject; and I stated to the chairman of the committee that I probably should be compelled to leave the city to-night on account of the extreme illness of my father, I regret to say. For these reasons he desires to have the bill considered to-day. Personally I have no wish that the Senate should depart from any purpose they may have to dispose of other business. If it be the will of the Senate to take up that bill now I shall be ready to conclude the few remarks I began to submit a day or two since; but—

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Iowa that I understand it has been proposed, if it will be satisfactory, to take up that bill and allow him to conclude his remarks, and then to go on with the bill coming from the Committee on Appropriations; but I understand the chairman of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, who has that bill in charge, to insist not only that the Senator from Iowa shall conclude his remarks, but that the bill shall then be gone on with to the exclusion of all other business.

Mr. HARLAN. I know not what the wish of the chairman of the committee may be on that subject. I can only say for myself that I do not think that any remarks which I intended to make, or which I may submit, are of sufficient consequence to ask the Senate for a special hour in which to deliver them. If it is not the purpose of the Senate to take up the bill with a view of disposing of it I cannot make a request to be heard at this time.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I intended to say, and I think I did say, that I was very desirous of hearing the Senator's remarks on that subject; and I will now propose to the chairman of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, if it is agreeable, that the railroad bill be now taken up in order to give the Senator from Iowa an opportunity to address the Senate, with the understanding that at the conclusion of his remarks it shall be laid aside and that we shall proceed with the bill which I have proposed to take up for consideration—the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. SUMNER. It seems to me that all must agree that under the circumstances our friend from Iowa ought to be allowed to proceed, and after that it will be in the power of the Senate to determine whether to proceed with this matter to the end of to-day or to take up some other.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. To accommodate gentlemen. I propose that now this appropriation bill come up, and then I will yield to the honorable Senator from Iowa, and consent to have the appropriation bill informally laid aside to allow his remarks to be made on the other bill. It seems to me that will accommodate all.

Mr. SUMNER. It appears to me that that is not meeting the proposition in a proper way. And here allow me to make one remark in reply to my friend from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] He is against the railroad bill, and therefore he is very glad to-day to vote to proceed with the consideration of an appropriation bill; and he makes a very good argument—I applaud it as an argument in favor of proceeding with an appropriation bill. We have all listened to that argument (perhaps never delivered with more effect than on this occasion) from the first day that we have been in the Senate. It is a common argument.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will my friend permit me to ask the authority he has for saying that I am against the railroad bill?

Mr. SUMNER. I have understood that the Senator was against it; indeed, I thought he avowed so on the floor. I do not intend to attribute to the Senator any opposition which he has not expressed. I hope he is not against it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have expressed no opposition to the railroad bill. I do not know but that I shall be opposed to it, and I do not know but that I shall be in favor of it. What I have been desirous to do so far was to find out whether it had any merit in it. When I ascertain that I shall know whether I am for it or against it.

Mr. SUMNER. As I understand the Senator, he has not found out yet that the railroad bill has any merit in it. Indeed, I have understood, I have been told—I do not know by whom, and I do not know whether the Senator has expressed the opinion before on the floor or not—that he is against the bill; and now I learn from his own lips that he is trying to find out whether it has any merit in it. I think, therefore, I did not express myself too strongly when I said that he was against the bill. He resorts to a very natural argument by trying to antagonize against that bill an appropriation bill. Very well; he is perfectly justified in that, and I make no criticism; I make no complaint. I simply call attention to his speech as a common mode of opposition to a measure which a person is at least at the time not disposed to vote for. There the Senator stands.

Now, I have to say, on the other hand, that I am in favor of the railroad bill. The Senator made some allusions to the earnestness with which I have supported it. I will not say that he traveled a little too far when he made those allusions. I know he did not intend to do so. But I presented to the Senate the petition from these parties which is the basis of the present bill; and I think at a later day I introduced in some form or other the proposed enactment which was referred to the committee. Before I took that step I made it a point to give my best attention to it. I did not introduce that petition until I had studied the question according to my manner and ability. I felt that there was occasion for remedy; that certain parties had ventured largely in the interests of the public, also in their own interests, and that they were about to experience great loss and detriment unless we should interfere. I listened to the argument of my friend, the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] in which, while opposing the proposed measure, he admitted that there was an equity—that was his very language—in the claim of these petitioners. Sir, if there is an equity by the admission of those who oppose the measure, that is a reason, it seems to me, for action on our part. But, beyond all that question of private interests, you have the great interest of the public itself, which is concerned, that this great railroad, one of the triumphs of civilization in our day, through which our country is to gain so immensely, shall be completed, not only in its main trunk, but in all its arteries and affluents. I say, therefore, the measure which my friend from Michigan proposes to press upon the Senate to-day is not a local measure.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Will my honorable friend allow me to suggest that there is no proposition to take up that measure pending, and, therefore, that the merits of that question are hardly open to debate.

Mr. SUMNER. But I am not going into the merits. Indeed, I have not been discussing the merits at all; I have only been considering, in answer to the argument of my friend from Vermont, very briefly, in about half the time he occupied, reasons why we should proceed now with the railroad bill rather than with the appropriation bill. I will make one other remark, and there I will stop.

My excellent friend from Maine knows that his appropriation bill, as I have said constantly, will take care of itself. It can be passed after we get through with the railroad bill this evening; to-morrow, it will surely pass. The public interests, about which my friend from Vermont is so anxious, will not suffer by the delay of an hour or two, more or less, with regard to the appropriation bill.

But if the railroad bill is not taken up and acted upon to-day, and then, if other measures are allowed to supervene, I know not when, considering what we have before us, it will be again reached. I think, therefore, considering the gravity of the case, that the Senate has already gone so far in the discussion that it is essentially unfinished business—threefold, fourfold, fivefold unfinished business, because it has been as many as five times at least before the Senate, and we should proceed with it and get it out of the way.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. One word is all I desire to say, and I only say that that I may be free of any responsibility on this question. This is an appropriation bill which must be passed sooner or later; it is one of a series that have come from the House of Representatives; some have been passed, some remain back. The principal appropriation bills are still back with the Senate committee. If we are to be occupied about other matters for a period, more or less—nobody can tell how long—and the appropriation bills are postponed, I can see well enough that I shall be asked about them hereafter and possibly called to some responsibility for not having presented them at an early day to the Senate. I present this bill to the Senate, and I ask its consideration. If the Senate see fit to postpone it to an uncertain future, and throw it upon bills which are behind, I do not propose myself to be responsible; that is all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine, to take up the naval appropriation bill. The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 17, noes 15.

The Senate accordingly, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 601) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending 30th June, 1869.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. When this bill was called up I did not observe that it was the naval appropriation bill. I understand the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs is not present, but is necessarily absent. I do not know that there is any impropriety in considering the bill in his absence, but I wish to suggest the fact to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I advised the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. GRIMES,] chairman of that committee, of my desire to take up this bill to-day, and asked him if he wished to be present; and he, having been upon the Committee on Appropriations, where it was considered, had no particular desire to be here.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Is he on the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendments reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

The Secretary proceeded to read the amendments. The first amendment was in line eight, to strike out the words "millions of" and insert "million," and after the word "be" in line nine to strike out "required by existing law" and insert "necessary," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of commission, warrant, and petty officers, and seamen, $8,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the proviso from lines nine to seventeen, in the following words:

Provided, That all moneys now under control or subject to the order of the Secretary of the Navy, whether arising from appropriations or from sales of public property, or otherwise, which shall be expended on the 1st day of July, 1868, shall be covered into the Treasury, so that no amount hereby appropriated shall be expended or drawn while any other unexpended moneys shall be subject to the order of the Secretary of the Navy.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line twenty-ones after the word "kinds," to insert the words "labor in navy-yards;" so as to make the clause read:

For preservation of wood and iron vessels and ships in ordinary, and for those that are on the stocks; vessels for the Naval Academy; for purchase of material and stores of all kinds; labor in navy-yards; tools, transportation of material, repair of vessels, and maintenance of the Navy afloat, $3,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line thirty-six, to strike out "tools" and insert "tolls," and after the word "ferridges" in the same line to insert "for coal and other fuel" among the items of contingent expenses of the Bureau of Yards and Docks appropriated for.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "necessary" in line sixty-five to insert "repairs of;" so as to make the item read:

Naval station at Key West:
For necessary repairs of wharves and buildings $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the following proviso from line eighty to line ninety-two:

Provided, That the civil engineer and the naval storekeeper at the several navy-yards, and that the persons employed at the several navy-yards to superintend the mechanical departments, and heretofore known as master mechanics, master carpenters, master joiners, master blacksmiths, master boiler-makers, master sailmakers, master plumbers, master painters, master caikers, master masons, master boatbuilders, master sparsmakers, master block-makers, and the superintendent of rope-walks, shall be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall be men skilled in their several duties and appointed from civil life, and shall not be appointed from officers of the Navy.

Mr. WILSON. I hope that amendment will not be concurred in by the Senate, but that the proviso will remain as it came from the House of Representatives.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I only rise to say that the Committee on Appropriations were of opinion that it would not subserve the public interests nor add to the efficiency of the public service to subject these officers, who are strictly petty and subordinate, to appointment by the President and confirmation by the Senate; that in practice it would lead to difficulties; and it was not obvious that the present mode of appointment is liable to any special abuse, particularly under a fair Administration.

Mr. SUMNER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. WILSON. I wish simply to say that I have no objection to these officers being appointed without coming to the Senate for confirmation; but I think they should be selected from people who know something about these various pursuits. The good of the service requires it. The abuses that have crept into the system during the last three or four years ought to be corrected, and the additional expense to which the Government has been put ought to be stopped. There is not a navy-yard in the country where the changes made lately have not increased to the amount of tens of thousands of dollars the expenses of the Government and the inefficiency of the service. These officers ought to be appointed from the class of men who are skilled in the various branches of work, who will know what they are about, and not men who know nothing at all, as they have been in many cases recently. If it is objected that the persons appointed to those small offices should not be sent to the Senate for confirmation, I would not object to amending this proviso so as to provide merely that they shall be selected by the President from persons skilled in their profession, and not from people who know nothing about it, and who have a great capacity to run up expenses on the Government, as has been the case within the last two or three years in this Department.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to hear the last clause of that proviso read again.

The Secretary read as follows:

Shall be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall be men skilled in their several duties and appointed from civil life, and shall not be appointed from the officers of the Navy.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is the clause to which I suppose the honorable Senator from Massachusetts objects.

Mr. WILSON. No; I do not object to part of it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What part?

Mr. WILSON. I said that I understood the reason why it was proposed to strike out this proviso was that we ought not to bring these small officers before the Senate for confirmation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is one reason; but what part does the Senator think it of particular importance to retain?

Mr. WILSON. I think that that part which provides that they shall be skilled in their duties and appointed from civil life, and not from men who have never studied and who know nothing about this class of duties, should be retained. I would be willing that the President should appoint these persons without sending their names to the Senate; but I think they ought to be appointed from the class of men who are skilled in that particular kind of business and are fit for it. I know that great complaint has been made in the last two or three years that such persons have generally been dismissed and a class of men who have little knowledge of these matters have taken their places, and many of them appointed from the Navy, who know as little as any other class.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am aware that those complaints have been made; but the complaints have come, as a general rule, from those who have ceased to be employed at the navy-yards in these capacities, as I understand. While we had use at sea for all our ship-carpenters, calkers, &c., who were connected with the Navy, it became necessary, as was the custom, to appoint men to these places, which are simply subordinate, and the appointments were made by the Secretary of the Navy, ordinarily from civilians outside, not on account of any particular skill that they had, but on account of their having political friends, as a general rule, and being themselves pretty active politicians, either on one side or the other, according to the party that happened to be in power. That has been the general principle that has governed the appointments, as we all know, on both sides. Now, when the naval service at sea is very much cut down and very largely diminished, the carpenters and others who formerly went to sea and who are acquainted with ships and everything in connection with them, from having spent their lives in connection with them and this particular kind of business, instead of going to sea are sent to the navy-yards to superintend the work there. Thus there is a saving. Those men must be paid; they belong to the regular corps of the Navy, and we save the amounts that would be paid to persons outside, civilians, to take those places, while these men substantially have nothing to do; and the complaint that comes here that they are not skilled is because they happen to be men who have been exercising their skill at sea for a considerable portion of time recently, instead of being in the navy-yards as formerly.

The object of this proviso, which was put on the bill in the House of Representatives, as I understand it, is to leave these men to do nothing substantially, and employ political persons outside, either of one stripe or another, who are civilians, changing them regularly with every changing Administration, to take these petty places in the navy-yards. That is the simple secret of the whole of it. As to the words providing that they shall be persons skilled in their professions, that is a matter of accident, and who is going to settle it? The real point of the whole thing is, that they shall be taken from civil life. In reality it is legislation to continue a class of officers who are entirely unnecessary when we have officers connected with the Navy whom we are obliged to pay, who can discharge the same duty, and who are not subject to all the reverses of parties or changes of parties. It is a question of economy. This talk about it being a great deal more expensive to have the work done by naval men is unfounded; it is a great deal less expense. They are just as skilled as the other men.

Mr. WILSON. That is a great mistake.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to have the proof of it. For the Senator to get up here and say it is so, without giving us any proof, does not convince me. I have no doubt he has been told so, because I have been told so; but look at the face of the thing: you shall not take a person to fill one of these positions from the Navy, although you have carpenters and calkers in the Navy who are men of age and experience and skill, just as likely to be fitted as others, from their being connected with ships as long as they have been; but you must go and take somebody, a carpenter or a calker, outside and bring him in there for the reason that you want to give the place to a civilian. Why should not the persons already in the employ of the Government and paid by the Government be the individuals to perform these duties in the navy-yards instead of our having two classes of men to pay when we have service for only one? We have heard no reason why they should not discharge these duties.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. This clause which it is proposed to strike out is rather a trifling matter as it seems to me; and in voting against striking it out I am influenced somewhat by the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations at the moment he brought up this bill, the necessity of having the bill passed so that it may go to the country. If you strike out this provision the bill must go back to the House of Representatives to be acted upon there. They may concur or they may not. Now, as it is so trifling a matter, would it not be better to leave it where it is rather than to strike it out and send the bill back to the House?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The bill must go back to the House anyway, because a great many amendments are made to it.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. The principal difficulty about the matter is, that of late the Navy Department has turned off from our navy-yards men who are skilled in their various professions, and have put into their places men who are skilled as politicians, and we have no remedy against this sort of thing. It seems to me it would be vastly better to leave this matter just where it is in the bill, and then we shall have some remedy against turning out men of skill, men who have had years of experience in their profession, and having put in their places men who know nothing about the duties to be performed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is not the fact.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. It is the fact at the Portsmouth navy-yard, to my knowledge.

Mr. SUMNER. And so is it the fact at Boston.

Mr. CRAGIN. I wish to make a remark or two in relation to the alleged increase of expense. The Senator from Maine thinks that the Senator from Massachusetts is greatly mistaken in that respect. I will endeavor to show that in one particular the expense has been greatly increased. A year ago, or a little more, there was a clause inserted in the naval appropriation bill requiring that the civil engineers and naval storekeepers should be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate; but the Secretary of the Navy took it into his head that he would abolish the office of naval storekeeper. The naval storekeeper was an officer who kept the stores for all the different bureaus in the Navy Department, and issued them on requisition. The Secretary of the Navy, inasmuch as the law said that these officers should be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate when required, taking advantage of that word "required" abolished the office of naval storekeeper. The result has been that every single bureau of the Navy Department has now officers at the navy-yards, a clerk and others, who keep the stores for each bureau, and the officers have been largely increased, and the expenses increased. I am told so at the Navy Department by men who are well posted in this matter.

Mr. WILSON. So far as this matter has any political influence I have no care about it anyway. I am against men appointed to office—mere appointees of the Government—having much influence or much to do with political affairs. I would not permit them to be taxed nor to pay money for political purposes if I had my way about it. I am in favor of cutting down the number of persons employed in the navy-yards to the smallest possible number; and I think we shall find when this bill goes into effect that it will discharge four fifths of the men in the navy-yards who cannot be employed under it. The bill is a great reduction as it came from the House of Representatives, and we have reduced it $700,000 as reported by our committee. But the fact cannot be disguised that under the Navy Department the expenses have been largely increased in the navy-yards of the country. Take the Charlestown navy-yard; they employ four times as many clerks as they did before the act to which reference has been made was passed. In fact, I have a report—I cannot lay my hands on it at present—called for by a resolution of the House, and anybody who will take it and compare it will find that the officers have been increased throughout the country; that they have been divided up into petty departments for the accommodation of men employed there who ought to be sent to sea or sent out of the service. I think the Navy Department during the last two or three years has been one of the most extravagant and corrupt Departments of this Government, and one of the worst managed. For one, I cannot see that naval officers can know anything about the duties of master joiners or master mechanics of any kind.

Mr. CRAGIN. Or master masons.

Mr. WILSON. Sir, what are these officers—"master carpenters, master joiners, master blacksmiths, master boilermakers, master sailmakers, master plumbers, master painters, master calkers, master masons, master boat-builders, master sparmakers, master block-makers, and the superintendents of ropewalks?" I do not believe that officers connected with the Navy know anything about these things, and I do not think they should be sent to the navy-yards to attend to this work. I do not believe that the public business is promoted by it, or that the quality of the work or the amount of it is increased by it. I am opposed to striking out this proviso from the bill and shall vote against the amendment. I do not wish to occupy time on it.

Mr. MORELL, of Maine. It seems to me all that has been said of the necessity of this measure has grown out of a supposed abuse of the administration of the law. Now, if the abuse were corrected, and a faithful administration of the law as it stands could be premised, I submit to my friend from Massachusetts whether he believes this provision would be necessary; because, as the law now stands, I take it, any of these officers may be selected from civil life. This proviso, therefore, is only intended to provide against an abuse in the administration of affairs in this particular. The committee so understood it; but if it were allowable to suppose that we are not necessarily to legislate against every little abuse which possibly might exist, and we might hope for a better state of things, then I think it would not be necessary to pass this provision. At any rate the committee thought there would be more embarrassments growing out of it from the method of appointment than relief to the public service by its adoption.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the Senate will pardon me if I make one remark. I will say that I do not like this proposition as an original proposition and not growing out of public exigencies. I think that the persons named here, in the ordinary course of business, ought to be appointed by the Department or by the heads of bureaus, as they have been for many years. I may say perhaps for several generations; but this measure belongs to a class of measures to which we have been obliged to resort during the last two or three years, growing out of the maladministration of the Government through the defection of the President of the United States. That is the fact; and we, as legislators, now are obliged to confront it. That was the origin of the tenure-of-office bill. It is the origin of many other measures on which we have been obliged to act. And now comes this smaller measure, belonging to the same class, sustained precisely on the same principle, which is this: we cannot trust the head of the Department. In the exercise of his discretionary powers, according to the old system, he turned out of place excellent men and put in others merely on political grounds. All that has come within my own knowledge in the navy-yard at Boston. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PATTERSON] says the same of the navy-yard in his State; and I doubt not that other Senators would be obliged to give more or less the same testimony with regard to any other navy-yard that came within their cognizance.

Now, the question is whether at this time there are any circumstances which should induce us for the moment to depart from or suspend the policy which for two years we have been gradually adopting in order to encounter these abuses in the administration of the Departments. I think that for the present we must proceed as we have done; as we did in the tenure-of-office bill; as we did in other bills; and by legislative provision in advance tie the hands of persons whom we cannot trust.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no reason to believe that there is a greater disposition in the present Administration, either on part of the President or the heads of Departments, to act in relation to appointments upon party grounds than has existed during the last twenty years, and particularly during the period that Mr. Lincoln himself was at the head of the Government. I have some reason to believe that changes such as are now spoken of in this bill were made by him, or rather by the Secretaries who were in the several Departments under him. The system commenced as a dangerous one, a mischievous one, in my opinion, in the days of General Jackson, and has been continued more or less ever since, and will be continued to the end of time, or until healthier sentiment governs the country.

But what will the honorable member from Massachusetts gain if he succeeds in calling upon the Senate to act as a Senate upon these several appointments? Suppose the President nominates a boatswain, a sailmaker, or a blacksmith. Then, I suppose, my friend from Massachusetts will say, "What party does he belong to? Is he of us or of the opposite faction?"

If he is not of us we disapprove." Does that change the matter at all? It makes it, in my opinion, worse, because it involves the character of the Senate; and I would much rather, if anybody is to suffer in reputation, that it should be the members of the Cabinet than the members of a body like the Senate of the United States.

But what a work it will be for us to be engaged in, vested with the high legislative power the Constitution confers upon us and the authority to deal with foreign nations in conjunction with the President in matters that may involve the peace or promote the prosperity of the country, to be called upon to advise whether this man, that man, or the other, whose name has never reached us, or reached anywhere beyond his immediate neighborhood, is fit to be a blacksmith, a sailmaker, or a boilermaker!

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Will my friend from Maryland permit me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. JOHNSON. With great pleasure.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. This proposition provides that these officers—the civil engineer and the naval storekeeper and the persons employed to superintend the mechanical departments at the several navy-yards—shall be taken from civil life. I suppose, consequently, they must be considered as civil officers; and I suggest, if that is so, that they would come under the provisions of the tenure-of-office bill, and they could only be removed by suspension, and we should have to try the merits of suspending one of these officers also.

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly; and what a time we should have of it! The honorable member from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] yesterday, in the debate upon the bill which was passed over the President's veto, said that the Supreme Court of the United States was behind in its docket. I think he is mistaken as to that; but how far should we be behind in our legitimate docket? Our whole time would be taken up in trials of a sailmaker or a joiner or a boilermaker or a carpenter or a gatekeeper. It seems to me to be beneath the dignity of the body, and that of itself would be a sufficient objection to it, in my mind.

But there is still, if possible, a greater objection. It unfits us—I do not mean to say it would have that effect upon the body as it now is; but the tendency of such a power, of such a duty, would, in course of time, be to unfit the Senate—to discharge properly its high constitutional functions; functions which involve the nation in its reputation throughout the world, and functions with the proper discharge of which the safety and prosperity of the nation are so vitally and so indissolubly connected. I hope, therefore, Mr. President, that the amendment proposed by the committee will be adopted.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator from Massachusetts, who spoke last, [Mr. SUMNER] admitted the truth of what I said, that this is merely a political matter and intended as such. Now, sir, I am not so much of a politician perhaps, as the Senator, and, therefore, I do not see the propriety of mixing politics up with everything which is a mere matter of business. But what do we gain by it politically? These changes have already been made in the navy-yards.

The effect, then, of this provision is to keep things just as they are. We cannot put our friends back except by turning out the men now in place. We shall not be very likely to do that until we have a change of Administration, at any rate; and I suppose when we have a change of Administration, it can be done without this legislation; but then, I suppose, we are to repeal our law if we now enact it; the object will have been accomplished. I suppose gentlemen on our own side of the Chamber expect to carry the next presidential election. I hope they will. If they do we probably shall have another Secretary of the Navy; one that we like, and one that will make all the improvements necessary without any legislation. But if we do not, and the other side carry it, they will do what they like about this matter; that will be the amount of it. Now, as the thing is already done, what is the object of this provision?

I have no peculiar affection for the present Secretary of the Navy. I have not seen him for a year or two, and do not suppose I shall for the next year or two; I certainly shall not of my own motion. But, sir, the policy of the Navy has been, since the business of the Navy is so much reduced and we have so many officers who are unemployed, to put them in these places and save money, if we can. For instance, take the naval storekeeper. Instead of having a naval storekeeper that you pay, the Department appoints an officer of the Navy at the yard to administer those duties, and he lives on his pay as an officer of the Navy, which he must receive anyhow. If there has been any abuse in the appointment of clerks, that should be corrected; but it is no matter how many naval storekeepers you have provided they are all naval officers. As naval officers they have hardly anything else to do, and they may as well be employed in this service; but if you have too many clerks you can correct that by the proper legislation. There is no difficulty about that.

So, too, with regard to the heads of the different trades carried on at the navy-yards. Is there any objection to having as the head of a trade in a navy-yard a ropemaker who has been to sea, and who has been engaged in vessels and connected with the cordage of vessels, and everything of that sort, probably for many years? Is he not just as competent to do work of that sort as a ropemaker outside? Precisely so; only you do not get a politician; you do not get a man who is bound to employ everybody under him of a particular stripe. And so of a ship-joiner and a ship-carpenter. With regard to the master mason, you must take him from civil life, for masons do not go to sea; and so, perhaps, of some of the others. But the object of this proviso is to compel the Navy in all cases to take a political man from outside, instead of employing somebody who is just as good, that they have to pay whether he renders any services or not. That is the amount of this last clause of which the Senator speaks.

As to the greater expense of this system, that remains to be proved to my satisfaction. All that anybody has been able to specify was that specified by my friend from New Hampshire, [Mr. CRAGIN], who says the number of clerks in the navy-yards has been increased. How that may be I do not know. Probably it may be so. If so, let us correct that abuse. But with regard to the other clause, that these persons shall be nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate, it strikes me as simply ridiculous.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] seems to entertain the idea that the tenure-of-office bill was intended to reach cases analogous to this, and was a mere political measure—a temporary expedient to check the existing presidential patronage of the incumbent of that office—and speaking from our side of the Chamber, unless his remarks should be disputed by some one, they might lead to the inference that that is the view which gentlemen of our political opinion take. I wish, speaking for myself, to dissent from that proposition. When that bill was under consideration it was distinctly placed by the committee who reported it—my friend from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] and myself and my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCKALEW], who, although he did not agree to the bill itself, assisted with most valuable aid in making the framework of it—on the ground that it was a measure intended to restore that just equipoise of harmony which the Constitution originally intended to exist between the Senate of the United States, representing the States, and the Executive, in respect to the management of the affairs of the Government—that is to say, in the selection of those chief and responsible agents who were to administer the laws—and that it was calculated for all Administrations, for all species of politics; as a measure that would be equally beneficial to Democrats in Democratic times as to Republicans in Republican times; because it was supposed by the committee to be a measure which had in it the inherent merit of restoring what I have said was the true constitutional equipoise of right and power between these Departments of the the Government.

The tenure-of-office bill, therefore, provided merely that that class of officers who by the Constitution or the laws were required to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, should hold their offices by a tenure resting upon the same stable foundation; that they, having been once agreed upon and appointed, should continue to exercise their functions until some new men selected in the same constitutional method should be chosen to supplant them. I submit, then, to my friend from Massachusetts, to his good sense, to his constitutional learning, whether he has not taken a somewhat too narrow view of the scope of that act.

Mr. President, that being the tenure-of-office bill, it would be true, as has been said by my friend from New Jersey, that if we adopt the proposition contained in this bill these mechanics will be brought within the operation of the tenure-of-office law, and not one of them can be removed or suspended or dismissed otherwise than in conformity to its provisions; and therefore, if the Secretary of the Navy finds that he has employed at any one of our naval stations a ropemaker or a boatbuilder, or a boilermaker, or whatever he may be—a painter even, which I suppose does not mean a Raphael, but a man with a somewhat larger brush—he must appeal to us to decide whether it is fit that he should be displaced and a man with a fresh brush and a new pot of paint be brought in.

It appears to me that my friend from Maryland stated the case pretty truly when he said that it would load the Senate with a docket exceeding that which has so troubled the Supreme Court; and I will add that it might lead us to a line of decision somewhat more reprehensible, if it be possible to say so, than that which the Supreme Court at some stages of its existence has fallen into. I hope that we shall not agree to let this provision stand, but shall concur with the committee in striking it out.

Mr. WILSON. Is it in order to move to amend this proviso before the question is taken on striking it out?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in order.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend it so that it will read:

Provided, That the persons employed at the several navy-yards to superintend the mechanical departments, and heretofore known as master mechanics, master carpenters, master joiners, master blacksmiths, master boilermakers, master sailmakers, master plumbers, master painters, master calkers, master masons, master boatbuilders, master spar-makers, and master blockmakers, shall be men skilled in their several duties, and appointed from civil life, and shall not be appointed from the officers of the Navy.

I propose to say nothing in regard to the civil engineer and naval storekeeper and the superintendents of rope-walks. I do not care about the President appointing them or the Senate confirming them; but I do object to putting naval officers over mechanics in these several departments any way. They are not fit for it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Why should not a carpenter in the Navy be put over carpenters?

Mr. WILSON. I am against putting naval officers to superintend mechanics in our navy-yards or anywhere else. I do not want to take men brought up over old salts, with their manners and their habits and their general insolence, and put them over a body of men, many of them quite as intelligent as they are, and in every sense of the word their equals; and therefore I move this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be reported.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the proviso in the eightieth and eighty-first lines by striking out the words "civil engineer and naval storekeeper at the several yards, and that the;" and also in lines eighty-nine and ninety by striking out the words, "and the superintendents of rope-walks shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and."

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no objection to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on striking out the proviso as amended.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am not aware of any law which provides for the appointment of a master carpenter or a master sailmaker or any of those persons who are there enumerated. There is no law whatever providing for it that I am aware of; but it is the custom, of course, in these navy-yards, to have somebody to superintend, that is, to be the head man over these different kinds of work, and he receives more pay and he has got to be called the "master" carpenter or painter or sailmaker. Now, what is the effect of this provision? If the Secretary of the Navy does not choose to have these men all he has to do is not to appoint them, and the Senate accomplishes nothing by the provision. You say if he does appoint anybody as master carpenter he shall not be anybody connected with the Navy; that is to say, if you have an officer who occupies that position in the Navy, and by looking at the Navy Register you will see quite a list of them; I do not know whether they call them ship-carpenters or ship-joiners, but if there is one of them who has nothing to do particularly the Secretary of the Navy shall not put him over the men who are at work in a navy-yard, no matter what may be his capacity, no matter whether he is to be idle or not; but you must go outside of the Navy and find somebody else to bring in there and put over the workmen. Is that economy? We talk a great deal about economy now-a-days. Is it an abuse, is it an outrage upon the workmen employed in a navy-yard that a man who has been employed in the Navy, of their own trade, brought up as they are, with all his experience, should be the head man? But here you provide that you must go outside. That is the effect of it, and nothing else.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I think the condition of the business in our navy-yards is such as ought to excite the most profound anxiety of every citizen. I am sure every year since I have been in the Senate, now five years, it has been reported here, upon personal observation, that the yards are getting into a worse condition than they were the year before. Every year, to the best of my recollection, that has been the report; and I was very much concerned about it each time that the statement was made. But I never entirely surrendered myself to despair until I heard the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] just now say that, upon his own personal observation, the business was not at all well conducted, and was getting worse and worse every day; that the good men of the country had all been turned out, and all the bad men had been put in; and now the machinery was in the worst possible condition in the navy-yards according to his own observation.

I do not know anything that would be much more amusing than to see the Senator from Massachusetts go through a workshop and undertake to criticise the workmen. I should like to see him make a personal observation of a boiler when the hard-fisted and iron-muscled man was making it. I should like to see the Senator from Massachusetts standing beside him, with his benevolent countenance and cultivated intelligence, judging whether the rivets were being put in in proper style, and whether the metal that was being used was such as ought to be used. When his judgment would be brought to bear on a question like that there could be no doubt about the sufficiency of the machinery afterwards. When the superintending blacksmith was seeing to the structure of the cables, and the rope men of the ropes, and the painters were painting the work, and the calkers were calking the vessel, then the Senator from Massachusetts would bring his judgment to bear upon all that; and if he decided that it was being well done, then all patriots might dismiss all concern from their minds for the future. [Laughter.]

I should like to see the Senator from Massachusetts passing his opinion upon the blacksmith. The blacksmith is doing the best he knows how; but the Senator from Massachusetts, taking a view of the proceeding, decides that we are fast going in the backward track in machinery, especially iron machinery and iron structures. I suppose he could tell at a glance whether a chain of particular dimensions, and made out of a particular quality of iron, would be sufficient to hold a vessel to its moorings or not. I suppose he could tell a machinist at once whether the iron that came from Lake Superior or that which came from the Iron Mountain in Missouri was the better calculated to make chains out of. No doubt he is competent to judge of all these things, for he tells us, upon his own personal observation, that the good men, the qualified machinists have been dismissed, and bad men have been brought in.

Now, if the Senator will not take it at all as offensive, I will say that in my humble judgment he has acquired so much knowledge upon everything else in the world except machinery, that his judgment is not worth a groat upon any question of that kind. [Laughter.] It is impossible, in my humble judgment, though, perhaps, I cannot judge of the capacity of other gentlemen, for one man to know everything. We know that the Senator from Massachusetts does know nearly everything; that in all the field of law, national and municipal, in the field of science, of philosophy, and especially of literature, what he does not know is scarcely worth laboring after, [laughter;] and, therefore, he will excuse one standing at so humble a distance from him as myself in expressing some doubt whether, when he goes into a machine shop, he can form the very best opinion upon the questions that may arise there.

What right has the Senator here in the Senate to say that the men who are now managing these navy-yards are not skilled in their business? What right has he to say that they are not honest men? As a Senator he stands very high above them. They are very humble men. They came up, many of them, from the humble walks of life. Their paths have never been cheered by the lights of learning. But still they and their families take a great pride in their good name. Their position as machinists to them is as dear as the position of the Senator as a Senator. What right has he to blacken their names here, humble as they are, unobtrusive as they may be? What right has he to say that as machinists they are not skilled, and that as men they are not honest? When a man in the Senate says that somebody else who occupies a responsible position to the Government is dishonest I think he ought to be ready to prove it, because he then makes a question between himself and that humble individual who is pursuing his avocation as he thinks properly to society.

The Senator said that the machinery was all getting wrong; I cannot give his language—

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator will not attribute to me what I did not say. Of course, I never undertook to say whether they were honest or not. I said nothing on that subject; and I do not know that I said anything as to whether they were skilled or not. I said there had been changes made under malignant political influences which were not for the better, and that good men had been displaced.

Mr. HENDRICKS. And bad men appointed, and, from your own observation, it was not going right. Certainly you did introduce your own observation; and when the Senator did observe what did he observe? He observed that good men were out and bad men in; and yet upon that, with great deference, I think I may venture to doubt his capacity to judge whether a master machinist is a skillful man or not.

Mr. President, this question was discussed a year ago or more, and it was decided by the judgment of the Senate that the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts then was not right. He then insisted that these machinists who depend for their position upon their skill, upon their judgment, upon their science, should cease to rely upon that, and should be made to depend upon political influence and political power; that they should look to the politics of the country for their avocation instead of their skill and position as mechanics. The Senate would not concur with him then, and he insists upon it now.

Sir, upon this whole subject of wrong in the navy-yards I have just this to say: I have tried as diligently as I could to discharge my duties as a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and not a word of complaint, so far as I have heard, has come to that committee against any of these shops, so far as the integrity of the superintendents is concerned. The workmen have not complained. I have not heard anything said against them. The engineers have sought to have their grade and position in the Navy fixed and defined. Officers in the Navy have sought to have their positions in the Navy regulated by law; but so far as the management of the business in the navy-yards by the practical machinists and workmen is concerned, I have not heard any complaint. My opinion is that the proposed change in the law will be very inconvenient.

Mr. NYE. I do not propose to take up the fight between my friend from Massachusetts and the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is no fight.

Mr. NYE. But, sir, there is, at the present time, if my investigations are worth anything, great confusion in the management of the navy-yards. There is a war going on between the engineering department and those who belong to the Navy proper—a strike for the ascendancy; and I suppose I shall not be guilty of a breach of any rule that governs this body if I say that we have before us in the Naval Committee a bill the object of which is to regulate the management of the construction of ships and repairs in the navy-yards generally. I do not know that I myself should have the highest confidence in the opinion of my friend on my right [Mr. SUMNER] in regard to proper mechanics and proper machinery for naval purposes; but I should have quite as much confidence in his opinion as I have in that of the present Secretary of the Navy. I suppose that he knows as much about mechanics as the present Secretary of the Navy. During this great struggle, potent as the Secretary of the Navy is, the old battle-cry has not been raised, "The sword of the Lord and of Gideon." [Laughter.]

The trouble is that there is no particular head that knows what ought to be done in these navy-yards; and the object of the bill to which I have alluded is to make a head who shall be responsible, who knows what machinery is, how much it ought to cost, how it ought to be made, when made, and where. In regard to this one department of civil engineering, while I have nothing but words of the highest commendation for all those engaged in it, I think the country will find that, if they are going to get engineering adapted to the wants of the Navy, the greatest power, the smallest space, and the perfection of workmanship, they will have to adopt the course that the British navy long ago adopted, of going into the markets for their engineering, instead of relying upon any Government engineer. In that one thing would be found a saving, in my judgment, of untold millions in the remaining portion of our lives, if we live to the ordinary age of men. I know how liable these things are to run into clannishness; and hence we see already a strike as broad as the Navy and its whole Department between the sailing portion, the professional portion of the Navy, and the engineers. My friend from Indiana well knows that our table literally groans with documents from each side upon that question.

Mr. HENDRICKS. What question?

Mr. NYE. Upon the question of the position of engineers. We have one or two bills now before us grading these engineers; and there was laid on our tables a few days ago a remonstrance against the promotion of the naval officers to the neglect of the engineers.

Now, sir, in almost every navy-yard of importance we have a large engine factory. There is one at the navy-yard in this city, involving an annual expense of not less than $1,000,000, where in ordinary times there is no more use for it than there is for any other article there as an adornment.

I make these suggestions to show that there is discontent and dissatisfaction in the Navy itself in regard to the management of these yards. I doubt, myself, whether the remedy lies in the course proposed by this amendment. I have serious doubts whether that will reach the difficulty; but I expect there will be a bill reported from the committee of which my friend from Indiana and myself are both members, attempting to regulate the management of the navy-yards so as to reduce them, or introduce into them a system of economy and of wise management that will very greatly decrease the cost of their administration at the present time.

Before the war—and I am not saying that there existed no necessity for a change during the war—we had but one storekeeper in each navy-yard; and now each bureau of the Department has a storekeeper at each navy-yard. I think that could well be done away with to-day. There would be no difficulty in a time of peace in requiring that one storekeeper should be sufficient for the whole service of a yard. I think in that respect there could be a large saving in the expense of our navy-yards. That is the object of the bill that I had the honor to introduce some time ago, and which I propose to submit again to the consideration of the Senate, so systematizing these navy-yards that the highest grade of economy shall be required. It is not questioned whether the opinion of my friend from Massachusetts or of my friend from Indiana is good or not, that there should be some one responsible head to determine whether the work in the navy-yards is well done or not.

I congratulate these laboring men that they have so able an advocate on all occasions as my distinguished friend from Indiana; and I have no doubt the laboring men of that State will read with great pleasure his ready defense of their interests on all occasions.

Mr. SUMNER. I find that the proposition under discussion was in part adopted last year. You will find it in the naval appropriation bill approved March 2, 1867, as follows:

Provided, That the civil engineer and naval storekeeper, when required at any of the navy-yards, shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and the persons employed at the several navy-yards as master machinists, master carpenters, master joiners, master blacksmiths, master boiler-makers, master sail-makers, master plumbers, master painters, and master calkers shall be men skilled in their several duties and appointed from civil life.

Now, this proviso which you find in the bill of last year is substantially the same with that in the present bill as amended on the motion of my colleague. I think, under the circumstances, it would be better, or at any rate it would be more in harmony with the policy that has been pursued, if we took from the present appointing power the control over these different masters; and I say that I am moved to that conclusion by what I know of navy-yards. My friend from Indiana, I know, has no intention to carry anything I have said beyond its natural meaning; but I know that he cannot torture anything from my lips into any disparagement of those who labor. I respect them as much as he can. Always, where I am able, I stand by them; and it is now because I am interested in labor, and because I desire to stand by them, that I propose to shield them, if possible, from that interference to which they have been exposed through malignant political influences. Such influences have shown themselves in the navy-yard at Boston. Whether they came directly from the Secretary or not I do not affirm; but they made themselves manifest at that yard. Honest and true men who have suffered from those influences have come to me with their complaints.

Others in their neighborhood have testified with regard to them. The Representative of that district of Boston has had occasion to make himself acquainted with those complaints, and to feel keenly sometimes the wrongs that have been done. Men have been placed in office there as the substitutes for good Union men whose special recommendation was that they sympathized with the recent policy of the head of the Navy Department, representing the President of the United States. Good men were obliged to give way under that influence. All that is perfectly familiar to gentlemen in Boston and in the neighborhood. It has been the subject of complaint; it has been recognized all around as an existing abuse, and the only question now is whether we shall undertake by legislation to apply a remedy. It has seemed to me, under the circumstances, especially considering the precedent of last year, that we shall not err if we do legislatively apply the remedy. But I do not wish to urge this. I shall accept the vote of the Senate, whatever it may be.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment striking out the proviso as amended, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the proviso be reported as it now stands.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Provided, That the persons employed at the several navy-yards to superintend the mechanical departments, and heretofore known as master mechanics, master carpenters, master joiners, master blacksmiths, master boiler-makers, master plumbers, master painters, master calkers, master masons, master boatbuilders, master sparmakers, and master blockmakers, shall be men skilled in their several duties, appointed from civil life, and shall not be appointed from the officers of the Navy.

Mr. CONKLING. I am in favor of striking out these words, as the committee report. I wish, however, to make one suggestion, in reply to a remark which fell from the honorable Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN.] He said that if the proviso, as amended on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, stood, it would still be in the power of the Secretary of the Navy to disregard or evade the provision by allowing persons who are at the time officers in the Navy to perform these duties, by simply omitting to make any appointments. I wish to call the attention of the Senate and of the Senator from Maine to the fact that the phraseology would not tolerate such a latitude as that. It does not imply that these are to be officers, and it does not require in those terms the Secretary of the Navy to appoint such officers. The requirement of the provision, if it is adopted, is, that "the persons employed at the several navy-yards to superintend the mechanical departments, and heretofore known" by these titles, "shall be men skilled in their several duties, and appointed from civil life, and shall not be appointed from the officers of the Navy." So the Senate will see, I think, and the honorable Senator from Maine, upon looking at the language as it stands now amended, will agree with me, that it would be obligatory, mandatory upon the Secretary, and that the only way he could evade the statute, as suggested, would be squarely to defy it, and to detail, appoint, or permit (whatever the phraseology might be) officers of the Navy to perform a function which, according to the express language of this provision, must be performed by persons from civil life, by whatever official name or title they are to be known. However, sir, with the conclusion of the suggestion of the Senator from Maine I agree; and I shall vote for the recommendation of the committee to strike out the whole clause.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 23, nays 8; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cattell, Conkling, Davis, Dixon, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Johnson, McCreery, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Patterson of Tennessee, Ross, Sherman, Stewart, Tipton, Trumbull, Willey, and Williams—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Cragin, Harlan, Howard, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Sumner, Wade, and Wilson—8.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Cameron, Chandler, Cole, Conness, Corbett, Doolittle, Drake, Fowler, Grimes, Henderson, Howe, Morgan, Morton, Norton, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Sprague, Thayer, Van Winkle, Vickers, and Yates—23.

So the amendment striking out the proviso was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was under the head of "Bureau of Navigation," after line one hundred and twenty-three, to insert:

For books for libraries for vessels of war, and for books and stationery for naval apprentices, $4,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line one hundred and twenty-eight, to strike out "six" and insert "three," so that the clause will read:

For binnacles, pedestals, and other appurtenances of ship's compasses, to be made in the yards, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line one hundred and fifty-eight, after the word "offices" to insert "and contingent expenses;" so that the clause will read:

For freight and transportation of navigation materials, instruments, books, and stores, postage on public letters, telegraphing on public business, advertising for proposals, packing boxes and material, blank-books, forms, and stationery at navigation offices, and contingent expenses, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was under the head of "Expenses of Naval Academy," in lines one hundred and sixty-one and one hundred and sixty-two, to strike out "$73,001" and insert "$76,706," so that the clause will read:

For pay of professors and others, $76,706.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line one hundred and sixty-six, to reduce the appropriation for contingent expenses of the Naval Academy from $65,450 to $63,450.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line one hundred and sixty-eight, to strike out the words "and so forth."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line one hundred and seventy, under the head "Naval Academy," after the word "enginery," to insert the words "and for pay of mechanics and laborers," and in line one hundred and seventy-one, to strike out the word "seven" and insert "five;" so that the clause will read:

For support of department of steam enginery, and for pay of mechanics and laborers, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out from the appropriations for the Naval Academy the following item in lines one hundred and seventy-two and one hundred and seventy-three:

For pay of mechanics and others in same, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was under the head of "Expenses of Naval Observatory," to strike out line one hundred and eighty-two, in the following words:

For salary of three aids, $4,000.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to ask the chairman why the committee propose to strike out that appropriation?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. These persons were not deemed indispensable.

Mr. HENDRICKS. They are the persons to take care of the Observatory.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator will see that this appropriation is under the head of "Expenses of Naval Observatory," and if aids in any sense were necessary it was not deemed necessary to have them as officers attached entirely to this particular bureau; but for all the purposes that could be desired in any case they might be detailed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question on the amendment, and declared it to be agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I believe nobody voted in the affirmative, and I voted in the negative. I am not quite satisfied that those three aids ought to be stricken out. I remember that last year I examined the question very carefully and came to the conclusion that it was the cheapest way of carrying on the operations there. It must be evident to everybody that the head of that Observatory cannot get along without some assistance. It was finally settled, after a good deal of examination, that the amount of assistance that was absolutely necessary was three aids. I noticed that in the discussion of this bill this year in the House of Representatives the same question was brought up, and there was a communication presented from the head of the Naval Observatory, and the House came to the conclusion that three aids were essential. I should like to hear some good reason for striking them out.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have no special information on the subject. By reference to the book of estimates it will be seen that the estimates are as follows:

"For salary of assistant astronomer, $2,500.

"For salary of clerk, $1,500.

"For salary of three aids, per act of May 21, 1864, $4,000."

I think that act of 1864 does not authorize the appointment of any aids at all.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It authorizes the appointment of some assistants. I believe they had another name.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The conclusion to which the committee came was that the law did not absolutely justify the appointment of these persons as aids. That was the first proposition.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is a mere change of name.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. And the next was that, from the information which the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs had, he believed they might be dispensed with.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think he is mistaken. I defer to his opinion on naval matters generally; but on this subject of the Naval Observatory there is nothing in the fact that he is the chairman of the Naval Committee to enable him to understand it any better than other people. I doubt very much whether the operations of the Naval Observatory can be carried on at all without these aids. You may as well abolish it at once unless you give some assistance to the man who is at the head of it. It was formerly given by that statute in the shape of assistants, and under the name of assistants, but Congress finally came to the conclusion that it would appropriate only a certain amount for that purpose; and the way in which it was finally arranged was that the amount before given to two—they wanted another—should be given to three. The amount appropriated was not increased, but the number was increased, that number being said to be quite essential.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to ask the Senator if these are aids to the scientific examination; or what are they?

Mr. FESSENDEN. They are scientific men, employed there with the astronomer.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is what I supposed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But at very low rates; and all of them, as I understand, are very competent persons. It was thought by themselves, as there was a good deal of discussion about it, that the amount appropriated had better be divided among three. What is the amount appropriated?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Only $4,000.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is only $4,000 for the three.

Mr. HENDRICKS. One thousand three hundred and thirty-three dollars apiece.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is all; and they are all scientific men; young men, I believe, mostly. I do not know perfectly about that, but that is my strong impression. I am perfectly confident that their services are absolutely essential to carry on the operations of the Observatory. That was explained to the satisfaction of the Committee on Finance last year, and finally agreed upon; and the question was raised in the House of Representatives this year, and there was a communication from the head of the Observatory on the subject read, which perfectly satisfied the House that the appropriation was necessary. I do not think any good reason can be found, unless you wish to dispense with that institution altogether, for withdrawing this small appropriation for these three men. I hope the amendment will not be concurred in. I am satisfied it is erroneous.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have nothing to justify the action of the committee. We were referred in the estimates for these three aids to the act of 1864, and I have that act before me.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What act is that? Is that the appropriation bill?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well; that is a wrong reference. Go to the appropriation bill of last year, and you will find that the reference should have been to the act of last year. If you can find that it is authorized by law anywhere, a wrong reference in the estimate of appropriations is of no consequence at all. We adopted it last year.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The authority for it is not found in the reference. That is what I mean to say.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well; it is found in the appropriation bill of last year, I think.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will look at the bill for 1865.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Look at the very last appropriation bill, passed at the second session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have not that before me. In the act of 1865 I find the following:

"For wages of instrument maker, watchman, porter, and laborers; keeping grounds in order, and repairs to building and inclosures; fuel, lights, office furniture, and stationery; and for freight, transportation, postage, and incidental expenses, $12,000."

That is the appropriation for 1865 for this particular service, and none of these officers are included. They may have been appropriated for somewhere else; but the committee found no authority for an appropriation for these aids, as aids, in the statute to which we were referred.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think, after the explanation that has been made, this appropriation had better be allowed to remain in the bill. I would rather economize in regard to that institution at some other point than in the aid that is given to the scientific examinations.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If the Senator will allow me a moment, I will read the provision of last year, to which my colleague refers me as authority, and it is in this language:

"For expenses of Naval Observatory, for pay of assistant astronomer, three aids, and clerk."

There you find it as he said. I think that is the first time it appears.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well. I say it was arranged last year, after a great deal of deliberation and discussion, and that is sufficient authority for it this year.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It was appropriated for last year, to which law the committee were not referred. That is the authority, I suppose.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator from Maine will allow me, it may have been done with great deliberation last year; but it was not done in the first instance, then, surely. The act of 1864, to which reference is made in the estimates, contains this item:

"Naval Observatory:
"For pay of assistant astronomer, three aids, and clerk, $3,000, and $4,000 thereof shall be equally divided among the three aids as their salary."

Mr. FESSENDEN. That was in 1864?

Mr. CONKLING. That is the act referred to in the estimates.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I thought it was fixed last year. We had a great deal of discussion about it last year, and finally kept that in. Whether it was original then I did not know, but it seems it was in the act of 1864.

Mr. NYE. Their salary is fixed at what?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Four thousand dollars for the three.

Mr. HENDRICKS. On looking over the entire expenditures provided in this bill for this institution I find that they are not large, and I do not think it is wise to reduce the scientific force of the institution that is really the most important; and I suggest to the Senator from Maine, the chairman of the committee, to consent to let this clause remain in the bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have stated all the knowledge I have on the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question over again on this amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. There is one fact about this which the Senate should have in mind in voting. The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, who is a member of the Committee on Appropriations, understood all about this personally. He discussed it very intelligently in the committee and seemed to comprehend the whole thing, and he gave it as his opinion to the committee that these three aids were not indispensable or necessary; but that, on the contrary, they might be dispensed with. The recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations was made largely upon the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Do you know that he personally examined it?

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator inquires of me whether I know that he personally examined it. Of course I do not know that he personally examined it; nor do I know what would constitute a personal examination of such a subject. I know that, speaking with the knowledge that he had of such things, and speaking of this in particular, he gave the committee his opinion that it was not necessary and concurred with the committee in striking it out. As the honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] occasionally says, it might be well enough to have some proof about this; and as every other Senator does not know that it is necessary it might be very well to have that fact proved before we put in this appropriation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is perfectly obvious to anybody who considers the matter that the chief of that Observatory, the officer of the Navy detailed there, cannot get along and take his observations without assistance. He must have some; and if the chairman of the Naval Committee gave an opinion that he could do without assistance he gave a very strange opinion.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not think he did give that opinion; but the Senator will observe that there is an appropriation here for the salary of a clerk of $1,500, which implies a man of some competency. That, I am aware, does not supply scientific aid; but I think (and the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will correct me if I am wrong in my recollection) that the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs was of opinion that there were persons easy of access in the service already whose aid could be brought into requisition, and would be naturally, for all such purposes as the Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] now refers to, and that it was not necessary to have any persons specially detailed or paid; but that, on the contrary, the service at all times would afford, among men competent to this duty and interested in it, those who would take part with the superintendent in making observations, and in doing the variety of things which it might be supposed would devolve upon the aids; and that, by having a clerk to record and to do everything clerical in reference to it, he would need no other force.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It seems nobody has been detailed for that purpose. Now, the gentleman, if I mistake not, at the head of the Naval Observatory is a Mr. Coffin, who was formerly a professor of mathematics in the Navy; and, unless my recollection fails me very much, a letter was read from him in the House of Representatives at the time this appropriation was under discussion there, in which he explained it and the necessity of retaining these men, which proved satisfactory to the House, and this clause was kept in the bill. His opinion must certainly, I think, be better on the subject—at any rate it was satisfactory to the House—than that derived from the mere supposition of the honorable Senator from Iowa, although chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, with regard to the possibility of getting along without these aids. It is a Naval Observatory, to be sure, but it is not so connected with naval affairs that the peculiar studies to which that committee devote themselves would enable them necessarily to judge better than anybody else who had investigated the subject. I hope the clause will be retained.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the committee, to strike out the clause.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was on page 9, line one hundred and eighty-eight, to strike out the word "one" and insert "two;" so as to make the clause read:

For payment of expenses of visitors to the Naval Academy, $2,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why is not $1,000 enough, as the House left it?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. We found this item estimated for in another part of the bill. The expense for the visitors was provided for in the contingent expenses for the Naval Academy.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On what page?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. On the eighth page: "For contingent expenses, $63,450." It seems to have been appropriated twice.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then my friend ought to strike out the whole of these two lines.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It will be seen that we reduce the appropriation for contingent expenses $2,000, and then increase the sum where it is specifically appropriated for, thinking it was better to let the appropriation be specific. We struck that amount out of the contingent fund for the Academy. That is the explanation of the action of the committee.

Now, the reason for the increase was this: it was suggested, and that was the information of the committee, that $2,000 was about the sum which had been ordinarily appropriated and expended by these visitors. They come from different parts of the country, some of them almost from the extreme West. I believe they are not paid anything except their expenses; but this sum was understood by the committee to be the ordinary sum expended for the visitors who are provided for by law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the number provided for by law?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Ten.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is $200 a piece.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Some of them come from a great distance, from the extreme West. Nothing but their expenses, including travel, is paid; and this is found to be the ordinary sum.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line two hundred and fifteen, after the word "tools," to strike out the words "and so forth, for."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line two hundred and nineteen, to strike out the words "and so forth."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line two hundred and thirty-two, to strike out the word "tools" and insert "tolls."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in lines two hundred and thirty-eight and two hundred and thirty-nine, to strike out the words "and so forth."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was under the head of "Bureau of Medicine and Surgery," to strike out in line two hundred and forty the following clause:

For naval laboratory, $20,000.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think we ought to have some explanation of that amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Where is that establishment?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. All the information I have on this subject is that they wanted $80,000 in the estimates for buildings, and this amount appropriated by the House of Representatives was so small—$20,000—as not to be at all adequate to the estimates, and the committee came to the conclusion that it was hardly worth while to make such a small appropriation, and we had better strike it out altogether.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Has there been any appropriation heretofore for this purpose?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Not that I am aware of.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Where is it founded?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is a laboratory in one of the bureaus of the Navy Department. That is all I know about it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs introduced it some three years ago, and ought to know something about it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line two hundred and forty-nine, to strike out "$877,000" and insert "$170,000;" so as to make the clause read:

Marine corps:

For pay of officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, privates, clerks, messengers, steward, nurse, servants; for rations and clothing for officers' servants, additional rations to officers for five years' service for undrawn clothing, $170,000.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is a very desirable amendment to make; but I do not see how you can reduce the pay of these officers about seven eighths.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is easily explained, though I do not know that the explanation will be satisfactory; but we want to do something that is agreeable. The original estimate sent in, and on which the bill was drawn, was $1,007,477 17. I hold in my hand a supplemental estimate for this precise service which is only $170,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is that a revised estimate?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, a revised estimate at a subsequent day.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose there are unexpended balances?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. We came to the conclusion on careful examination, considering the reduction of fifty per cent. in the service, that $170,000, with the surplus the Department has on hand, is adequate for the purpose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What I should like to inquire of the chairman, if he can tell us, is how it happens that the Navy Department sends us an estimate that is eight or nine hundred thousand dollars out of the way in any direction?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The original estimate was made, I suppose, independent of any reduction in the service and without any regard to the surplus on hand.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There must be some mistake about it, I think.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. One hundred and seventy thousand dollars is the last estimate of the Department.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt the explanation is to be found in the unexpended balances.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line two hundred and fifty-one, to reduce the appropriation for provisions for the Marine corps from $127,000 to $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line two hundred and fifty-three, to reduce the appropriation for clothing for the Marine corps from $102,000 to $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line two hundred and fifty-nine, under the head of "Marine corps," to strike out "twenty" and insert "twelve;" so as to make the clause read:

For transportation of officers, their servants, troops, and for expenses of recruiting, $12,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line two hundred and sixty-one, before the word "rent" to insert "for."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in lines two hundred and seventy-six, two hundred and seventy-nine, and two hundred and eighty, respectively, to strike out the words "and so forth."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines two hundred and eighty-four and two hundred and eighty-five, in these words:

For necessary repairs of marine barracks, headquarters, Washington, District of Columbia, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section two, line four, to strike out the word "including" and insert "excluding;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the number of persons authorized to be enlisted into the Navy of the United States, including seamen, ordinary seamen, landsmen, and mechanics, and excluding apprentices and boys, is hereby fixed and established at eighty-five hundred, and no more.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope before this amendment is adopted it will receive so much attention as will lead to its being understood. I did not agree to it in committee, reserving the right to vote against it in the Senate, and, if I could find any other persuadable member of this body, to endeavor to persuade him also to vote against it.

It will be seen, Mr. President, that the House of Representatives proposed that the future naval establishment upon a peace footing should consist of eighty-five hundred and no more; and this was to include apprentices and boys. Before the war the Navy consisted of precisely the number fixed by the House, eighty-five hundred, and no more, as regards rated men or boys. In addition to that there were, I believe, boys called powder-boys or powder-monkeys sometimes, to what precise number I do not know; but in the Navy now there are of apprentices and boys twelve hundred and twenty-one, so that by this amendment proposed by the committee, with the next one, which is a proviso to be appended to the section, the Navy is to be maintained at eighty-five hundred, as it was before the war, and twelve hundred and fifty apprentices and boys are to be added to that number.

It was suggested in the committee that fixing a maximum number and including apprentices and boys would leave the naval authorities practically to exclude apprentices and boys and make the entire force consist of effective seamen, and thus an argument was deduced in favor of fixing the number of the Navy, then fixing more or less positively the number of apprentices and boys. That argument, very likely, is sound. I do not wish any opposition I make to this amendment to encounter that. My proposition is that there is no reason at this time, looking to the future, why an increase of the Navy should be voted or allowed—an increase, I mean, speaking in reference to the Navy as it was before the war began.

I have no doubt there is a great deal to be said in favor of the apprentice system, the school-ship system, and all that; but I think few will challenge the correctness of the assertion that the commercial marine of the country is likely to be a school and nursery for seamen, which will always furnish the material, when bounties are offered as occasion arises, from which the Navy can be filled up. My belief was and is that the House of Representatives made sufficiently liberal appropriations and sufficiently liberal estimates when it fixed eighty-five hundred as the number of the Navy.

We have heard, Mr. President, various propositions about cutting down the Army and cutting down the Navy. Here is one now before us upon which we must vote, sent here by the House of Representatives, and the subject is free from all those uncertain matters which attend the Army at this time. There is no Indian war in which the Navy is to take part; there are no contingencies of any sort in the immediate future to be provided for. On the contrary, at this time and in this bill, it is in order and it is prudent and safe for the two Houses of Congress to express their judgment as to what the sum-total of the Navy should be. If it be the sense of the Senate that an addition should be made to what the House has proposed, so be it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Did the Senator state what is the number of apprentices and boys now?

Mr. CONKLING. The number now actually in the Navy is twelve hundred and twenty-one; but there is no limit by law, I believe. I am very sure there is no limit in the law as it stands. So the committee understood. They found no limit and they understood there was none.

My purpose, Mr. President, is accomplished when I induce the Senate to look at this matter and not to adopt the amendment by the formal concurrence which was about to take place in the recommendation of the committee.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ought, perhaps, to state to the Senate precisely the effect of this amendment if I can get their attention for a moment. The bill as proposed by the committee, and as it will stand with the amendment, is to reduce the Navy down to the peace establishment immediately preceding the war. I mean the Navy proper, rank and file, which was eighty-five hundred effective men. There were at that time about eight hundred boys, variously denominated, some as powder-boys, some, perhaps, as servants, connected with the Navy; so that it stood eighty-five hundred rank and file proper, and eight hundred boys, connected with the service in various capacities.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will allow me, I should like to inquire from what source he derives his information that there were eight hundred boys in the Navy. That is not my information.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. We took it from the Senator from Iowa, who is chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs. That was his information on the subject. During the war it was thought advisable to add another feature to the Navy, to wit, apprentices, boys who should be induced to go on board naval ships and be educated practically to naval duties, and so their service secured for the Navy. That was deemed advisable; and that is the policy now, and that is the law. Those boys number now about four hundred. The bill, as we have it here, if the amendment of the committee be agreed to, brings the Navy proper back to what it was at the period just anterior to the war, retains the rank and file as then, retains the boys in the service who are useful to it, and provides for retaining the apprentices, not an unlimited number, but boys and apprentices to the number of twelve hundred and fifty. That would embrace the number of boys who belonged to the Navy when the war began, and provide for the retention of the apprentices you have on hand now, and a few over, not exceeding, however, twenty-five. As long as it is the policy of the Government to retain that feature, I submit that this provision is absolutely necessary, unless you are willing to take the alternative presented by the other House, which is to reduce your number and to dispense with the boys and the apprentices, or reduce the effective force of your Navy by so much. The committee believed that the propriety of the thing was not to go below the effective force of the Navy just anterior to the war, and at the same time provide for these other two features which are necessarily ingrafted on your Navy, namely, the boys and the apprentices. That is all this is.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not see why we cannot with propriety leave this first clause as the House left it, using the word "including" instead of "excluding," and then agree to the proviso recommended by the committee, which will limit the proportion of apprentices and boys to a certain number.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If you use the phrase "including apprentices and boys," and fix your whole force at eighty-five hundred, so that the Department cannot go beyond that, then you reduce the effective force of your Navy by so much.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is, you will reduce the effective force of the Navy to eighty-five hundred and no more, including apprentices and boys not exceeding twelve hundred and fifty.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Which would reduce the effective force so much.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is precisely what I want to do, for one.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The answer to that is, that as a committee making appropriations to meet the demands of the service, and having no especial information as to the demands of that service, whether it could suffer that detracting or not, we did not feel authorized to make it. If the Senate have information which enables them to say that this branch of the public service can be reduced properly so much without detriment, then that is a safe proposition to take; but as the Committee on Appropriations had no information which authorized them to form a judgment that the service might be so reduced, they reported in accordance with what was understood to be the demands of the service according to the requirements of law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Committee on Appropriations must have exercised some intellectual function, either with or without information, in proposing the amendment that they did, because the House of Representatives has proposed to us to make the whole effective force of the Navy, including apprentices and boys, eighty-five hundred in number, and no more; and now the Committee on Appropriations propose, either with or without information—and I leave it to my honorable friend from Maine to decide which; he knows, and I do not—to change that and to make the effective force of the Navy eighty-five hundred seamen and ordinary seamen and landsmen and mechanics, and to add to that twelve hundred and fifty apprentices and boys.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I intended to explain the reason which guided the committee; and that was that the exigencies of the war being over, we thought it a safe proposition to say that we could go back to the demands of peace; but it was not quite so obvious that we could go beyond that; and that was the reason which influenced the committee.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. And I suppose the committee acted also on the counsel it had from the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILSON. It was stated by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs that before the war, in addition to the eighty-five hundred men, we had about eight hundred boys in the service, and that during the war he had succeeded in establishing the apprentice system, which added some four hundred more, so that we then had some twelve hundred boys and apprentices. Under these circumstances the committee supposed that this bill as it came from the House of Representatives would reduce the naval force below what it was before the war, and that it was not safe to go any further back; and they therefore proposed to fix the number of the Navy at eighty-five hundred seamen and to retain the twelve hundred and fifty boys and apprentices. I should have preferred myself to make the force about eight thousand men and then keep this number of boys. I think it is a good thing to have the boys in the service.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, so do I; and therefore it is that I wish to disagree to the first amendment proposed by the committee to this section, so as to have the apprentices and boys included in the total force of eighty-five hundred, and then to agree to the proviso of the committee, limiting the total number of these apprentices and boys, within the eighty-five hundred, to a certain maximum. I agree with my friend from Massachusetts, that it is desirable for the interests of the country and of the Navy that this school of apprenticeship should be kept up; and that our young men from Maine—where the ship-building business has so fallen into disrepute as to make it desirable for the boys to navigate ships, rather than build them—and all along the coast should enter into the Navy young and grow up in it. They will be useful to us when we have occasion to settle differences upon the ocean, undoubtedly. But, Mr. President, in a state of peace, as we are now, beyond three leagues from shore, at least—I do not agree exactly that we are in a state of peace on land yet, as my friend from Pennsylvania yesterday thought we were, when he was speaking of one of his fellow-citizens in Mississippi—but on the sea I believe we are at peace, unless the volcano near the island of San Domingo, which has so troubled one of the President's counsel they say that he has left him—shall produce a state of war, [laughter.] we may therefore reduce the force of our Navy to that number of officers and men who are only required for the care and preservation of the property. You keep up the organization; you can then fill it up rapidly whenever you have occasion, and without the least difficulty.

Now, we all know that the Navy, since the necessity of maintaining the blockade and chasing pirates has been over, have only had a holiday season. Our cruisers, it is true, are on every sea, and we fulfill the poetic idea of displaying the stars and stripes from sunrise to sunset over the whole world; but we do it at the expense of the people's money; and I think that we can indulge in a little less gala parade on the ocean and lay up more of our vessels than are now laid up, and thus be enabled to reduce the number of seamen who are to navigate them to such a point as the other House proposes.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Has the Senator any information which authorizes him to believe that we can afford to reduce the effective force of the Navy below the standard at the period immediately before the war?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have just about the same amount of information on this subject that my friend, the chairman of the committee, says they had, and that is next to nothing.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. We went on this presumption, and I submit whether that should not control in the absence of information: that during the period of war it was necessary to increase the Navy, and that now, at the close of the war, it will be proper to go back precisely to the effective force of the Navy prior to the commencement of the war. That would seem to be justified by the fact that at that period it was found necessary to maintain so much force to keep the Navy up; and I suggest to the Senator if this force were necessary at that period, with the ships we then had in commission, whether it is not fair to presume that at least as much as that is necessary with the additional ships which have since been put into the service?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I agree that if you are to navigate all your ships you must keep more men than this bill provides for in any way; but the presumption that I proceed upon—and I do proceed upon a presumption, just as it seems the committee did—is based upon our general knowledge of the course of these affairs. And my general knowledge of the state of the Navy in 1860 was, that in the long period of peace which had followed the Mexican war and under Administrations which for the most part commended themselves to what are called the Democratic instincts of the people the Navy had been gradually swelling itself, and that former Secretaries of the Navy had permitted the thing to go beyond the point of economy and prudence into such a condition that in 1860 it ought to have been reduced and might have been so. Therefore it is, Mr. President, proceeding upon that presumption, that I feel justified, for one, in believing that we ought to leave this section just as the House left it, with a proviso that within the eighty-five hundred men the number of apprentices and boys shall not exceed twelve hundred and fifty.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I desire to say that I think the Senator from Vermont has made one of the most sensible observations that have been submitted on any bill in this Chamber recently. He called our attention to a consideration in connection with these proper bills which we ought to keep constantly in view. It seems to be taken for granted that whenever there has been an appropriation of public money or any action heretofore upon any subject which involves an outlay of money, we are to assume that in any further act and in any change which is to take place we are to increase instead of diminishing. It seems to be taken for granted that where gentlemen can show that a certain force has been heretofore authorized, we are, as a matter of course, to increase that if we change it at all. I do not accept the argument that several years ago a particular number of persons was employed in our Navy, in connection with the other idea that that was of course a necessary and proper arrangement.

I submitted some remarks the other day to the Senate with reference to a reduction of the Army. Here we have another opportunity to pass upon a question of reform. The House of Representatives, acting on the report of a committee, whose action upon this subject it is presumed was taken intelligently, have sent us a bill here with a particular appropriation of money; and now we are asked by the Senate Committee, so far as I can understand without any new information, without any thorough examination of the subject, to increase the amount. Now, sir, as a matter of principle I shall vote against increasing the public outlay either for the Army or for the Navy, and I am indisposed to vote for any increase of appropriation for any object whatever unless there be the most clear and demonstrative arguments submitted to prove its necessity and propriety.

I think, then, sir, that the argument against this amendment is conclusive, if we are to act upon a rule of this sort. It is conclusive because on behalf of this amendment no sufficient cause is shown, and therefore the decision ought to be against it.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I am unable to accept the reasoning of the honorable Senator from Maine, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, upon one point; and I ask the attention of the Senate to it. He informs us that we must either reduce the effective force of the Navy or dispense with the apprenticeship system. I do not understand it so, sir. The system of apprenticeship grew up with the war; it was unknown before. It does not mean an infant school in which boys of such tender years as to be useless are reared and taught. Apprentices in the Navy are effective men. Why not? And I would inquire, do they not constitute a part of the effective force of the Navy? Certainly they are not ineffective because you call them apprentices. They are usually young men of more than average intelligence. That is implied by the act recognizing them, because we allowed ten each year to go to the Naval Academy to compete for admission to that institution, which presupposes and implies a grade of men certainly likely to be quite as efficient on board a ship as the ordinary run of those who enter the Navy.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. They must be boys; they are not men. Those who enter the Naval Academy are boys.

Mr. CONKLING. But they are of what age? Eighteen?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. There is a limit. They must have served some time as apprentices before they can be sent to the Academy.

Mr. CONKLING. How long?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not know.

Mr. CONKLING. The time may be ever so short.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. They must be boys, not men.

Mr. CONKLING. The recollection of the honorable Senator from Maine is like my own. They may be eighteen years of age. Do young men eighteen years of age, and above mediocrity in point of intelligence as a class, constitute no part of the efficient force of the Navy when you are speaking of seamen, of the various grades of men belonging to the Navy? I submit, sir, that it is not so at all. It is a fallacy to suppose that the House of Representatives intended, by as much as they recognized and continued the establishment of apprentices, by so much to impair or diminish the effective force of the Navy.

There is another thing. The honorable Senator says that before the war there were eight hundred boys, and I think the Senator from Massachusetts specified more minutely than that; eight hundred and something, I think he said; I could not catch precisely the number he gave.

Mr. WILSON. I said about eight hundred.

Mr. CONKLING. That is speaking very much in the air, as I understand. I heard the statement made by the Senator from Iowa which the statement here refers to, and he ran through his mind a general computation, from which he thought there might have been somewhere in that neighborhood. It is not my information at all that there was any such number. Boys in the Navy before were powder-boys, powder-monkeys, as they were called, and their services were required only in special cases. When salutes were to be fired and certain things to be done these boys were in requisition; and they added nothing to the effective force of the Navy. They were mouths to be fed, to be sure; but they were never rated. There was the fact that there was this number, whatever it may have been, of small boys.

Now, the result will be, taking the inducements which we have offered to apprentices, taking the pay and the object which we have presented to the apprentices, that if we make the whole number of the Navy eighty-five hundred, and then provide that not more than a certain number shall consist of boys and apprentices, the complement of apprentices will be full; and they are to be counted, as I have already said, as a part of the effective force of the Navy in its strictest sense, and the only diminution which will occur will be in the fact that by as many boys as there are by so much there will not be efficient men.

What is the objection to that? What is the theory upon which we are to look back and see how much money was ever appropriated for a given purpose, and then insist upon it that there must not be any less than that? At other times, when propositions of reduction have been made here, I have heard Senators say in regard to each of them that it was a leap in the dark; it was going without any information. Sir, this is not a proceeding without information. Every Senator, without investigation, can ascertain, I think, beyond a question, whether any interest is to be endangered by displacing four or five hundred seamen by making the Navy four or five hundred less than it was, when we know it was larger than there was any need of. That is a very plain proposition, and can be comprehended without investigation and without argument. That was the view the House of Representatives took of it; and now the proposition is, that without any good reason in the world for doing it we are to add twelve hundred and fifty men, and the appropriation involved in that. This is to be done at a time when, as has been said sometimes in satire and sometimes in earnest on this floor, men of all parties are conspiring with each other and talking about economy.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Allow me to suggest that this bill, as we propose to amend it, reduces the effective force of the Navy from eleven thousand to eighty-five hundred, the Navy proper just now being twelve thousand five hundred, including twelve hundred and fifty boys and apprentices.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not know but that a surgeon would think my friend was talking about comparative anatomy from the answer he gives. What of that? The Army some time ago was understood to be about a million; we have reduced that very much. The Navy was very large during the war; and we have reduced that. Surely I am not denying it; and I am not discussing any such thing. That is not a standard to measure by. I am speaking of the Navy normal; the Navy in the conditions and of the dimensions which it was when no rebellion raged in the country. That is the normal standard and condition to compare by.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Now, does the Senator say that our amendment increases the Navy as it stood then?

Mr. CONKLING. I am saying, if my honorable friend will attend to me, precisely this: that the Navy before the war consisted of eighty-five hundred men, and no more, and it consisted of nobody else excepting an unfixed number of these powder-boys or powder-monkeys, who were never rated as men, and never went on the pay-roll.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is precisely what we are attempting to fix in this bill now, eighty-five hundred men and the boys, and the Senators want to get rid of the boys. It is a big thing to get rid of the powder-monkeys and the apprentices! That is all there is in it.

Mr. CONKLING. If my friend coveted an opportunity to make a little rhetorical flourish, in which his rhetorical figures are a great deal better than his arithmetical figures, it was all right, and I am very glad that he interposed; but if he wants to know what I am seeking to say, if he will pay a little attention to what it is, he will see that I am not desirous to do any such thing as he supposes. Let me restate myself.

I know this is a small matter, Mr. President; I know that everything which involves money is a small matter here; and a member of this body seems to become small by as much as he espouses the idea of lopping off any appropriation which he does not believe in. Now, sir, in view of all that, I venture to reaffirm, and I ask the attention of the Senate to this proposition: before the war began, when the Navy was large enough for all purposes, and when it had within it superfluities, as we all know—no matter of what committee we are members—it consisted of eighty-five hundred men, and nobody else belonged to it except this unascertained number of boys; and now the proposition is to make the effective force of the Navy consist of that and to add to it some four hundred, more or less, of what the honorable Senator from Maine correctly calls apprentices, who are young men eighteen years of age or thereabouts.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The law provides between the ages of thirteen and eighteen years.

Mr. CONKLING. Will not my friend pardon me, and let me once state my proposition, which he seems not inclined to understand and not eager to have anybody else understand? I know precisely what I am talking about, if he will allow me to say so. I am talking about these apprentices, who may be young men eighteen years of age, and who, in point of fact, as he knows and as I know from the applications made to both of us for recommendations, are not boys of tender years, but young men seventeen or eighteen years of age, and intelligent, too, who become, many of them, apprentices, in the hope, on the part of themselves and of their parents, that they may go to the Naval Academy. Now, I say the proposition is to add that to the effective force of the Navy as it was—four hundred to be fed and clothed and paid; at least that, because that is the number now; and then to leave a loose and swinging end in the proviso proposed to be added to the section in these words:

That the number of apprentices and boys shall not exceed twelve hundred and fifty.

Suppose the number of apprentices exceeds twelve hundred and fifty, gradually as I think it would under the inducements offered to them, these boys, useless comparatively as they are, go out by degrees and apprentices come in; then what have we done under this provision? Have we not augmented the effective force of the Navy, as to expense and everything else, by just twelve hundred and fifty without any reason in the world for doing it? That is what I am talking about. It may be right; but it is best to meet it fairly, and not to say that I am denying the propriety of keeping the effective force of the Navy where it was before.

What did the other House do about this matter? The House of Representatives said that a total of eighty-five hundred was enough, and they said that it ought to include the apprentices and the boys. Why do you suppose they said that? Because they knew that apprentices were a part of the effective force of the Navy, and they knew that by counting the boys as a part of the effective force they displaced and dispensed with just that number of seamen, whatever it might be, whether four hundred or five hundred or six hundred or even eight hundred, as the Senator from Massachusetts thinks it had become before the war began. That is what the House thought.

Now, I submit that the logical point of this argument, the particular spot which the argument should touch, is that which will be touched when we are shown some reason why we endanger or neglect the public interest by diminishing the effective force of the Navy to the number of four hundred or five hundred or six hundred men. That is the point. I have not heard that in the Committee on Appropriations; I have not heard it—I say so with great deference—on this floor. No such argument as that has been made. On the contrary, the argument is, "The effective force before the war was eighty-five hundred; we must keep it at that at least; it will not do to appropriate anything less; and then, in order to maintain the apprentice system, we must treat that as an addition and put that on, and then we must add the boys to that, and then, in the third place, we must leave it wholly discretionary as to how many of these twelve hundred and fifty shall be apprentices and how many shall be boys, or whether any of them shall be boys." If I understand the meaning of this, it is simply a provision to increase, as to numbers and as to expense, the amount of the Navy twelve hundred and fifty beyond what it was before the war.

I may be very wrong in all this; but I take leave to restate it in order that my honorable friend from Maine may not suppose that I am lost in the mazes of metaphorical confusion on this subject, or that I do not understand precisely what it will be if you deduct two from four or if you make an addition.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Will my friend from New York answer this question: whether, if the House proposition is adopted, we do not reduce the Navy to a number eight hundred less than it was before the war?

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator from New Jersey assumes in his question: first, that there were eight hundred boys before the war, and second, that hit or miss, eight hundred boys would remain in the service and would displace that number of men, then unquestionably by the House provision the effective force of the Navy would be reduced that much. My belief, however, is—and I think the information of everybody who has any information about it is—that the number of boys before the war was larger than it need to have been, and would have been but for the fact which I have referred to before that boys were not rated; there was no limit about it, and they congregated and were about ships. The Senator will see that when you establish a regulation which does count the boys as part of the force and which does make it of importance to enumerate them, there will be no more boys than are needed; in other words, the thing will be properly adjusted, and then I have no idea that the number would be eight hundred or any such number. That is the answer which I give to that question, and that I submit is the common sense of it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understand that the Committee on Naval Affairs were of opinion that the Navy could not be safely reduced that number; and as the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs is not here, it would be hardly prudent for the Senate to undertake to reverse the judgment of that committee.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not know what information the Senator from New Jersey refers to as that which substantiates in some way an apprehension that we cannot with safety reduce the force of the Navy. If there is no impropriety in it, and I believe there is none, I may say that I heard no such suggestion made in the Committee on Appropriations, nor have I heard any such suggestion made here. The suggestion which the committee acted upon, as I understood it, in brief was this: that the apprentice system was a good one to foster; that if we left the provision as it came from the House of Representatives—and this proposition answers somewhat the argument made by the Senator from Vermont, and I thought of it when he was up—an inducement would be offered to diminish the number of apprentices, to crowd them out in order to get in a greater number of regular seamen; and it was upon that suggestion that the committee acted in substituting the word "excluding" for the word "including" to the end that the number of apprentices might not be put at the discretion or the mercy or the accident of any one.

That was the suggestion in that regard; and then the committee, (certainly I shall be within bounds if I say that I do not think upon the idea that the safety of the country or the safety of the service or any paramount consideration of that kind required them to do so,) having changed the word "including" to "excluding," came to the conclusion to recommend that these apprentices and boys should be in addition.

Now, it is a mere matter of discretion in the economical administration of the Government, not overruled, as I conceive, by any considerations so paramount as one of public safety; and I submit with great deference that it is a most appropriate occasion for the Senate to express its opinion, not upon the general subject of economy and wholesome administration merely, but upon a subject which has attracted the attention of the country and has been discussed here; one of the two subjects around which ideas of retrenchment and reform are most likely to gather. I think myself there will be a great deal more of the Navy as it will be left than is indispensable in any sense, just as I believe there is a great deal more of the Army than is indispensable. We have talked a great deal about cutting down both of them. Here is an opportunity to concur with the House in what, upon advice and investigation, they have done, and in answer to which, I submit, no argument has been adduced sufficient to reverse it, and I propose that we act upon it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not suppose we are to act on the judgment of the House of Representatives. I suppose we are to act on our own judgment.

Mr. CONKLING. So do I.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I understood the Senator to sit down saying that he proposed to act on their judgment.

Mr. CONKLING. Oh, no; but I proposed to act on this occasion which is presented by the House.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. On this occasion! Now, sir, I do not propose to act on their judgment on any occasion. I propose to act on my own judgment, and I propose to draw it from such sources within my own knowledge as are reliable. Now, sir, it is not true, as the honorable Senator supposes, that what is proposed here would add twelve hundred and fifty to the force of the Navy as it existed prior to the war. That is his proposition. I say it is not true, as the honorable Senator undoubtedly supposes it to be. The Navy, as it stood before the war, was eighty-five hundred men, rank and file; and then there were about eight hundred boys connected with it, and an essential part of it, a necessary part of it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Was that limited by law?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not think it was limited by law; but I understand that to have been the number of boys who were connected with the Navy in one capacity and another. Then the Navy would stand ninety-three hundred. That is what it was including the boys. So it will stand if this bill passes as we propose to amend it, with four hundred and fifty added to that. For what? To meet the demands of a law which was passed since the rebellion began. Since the period when the boys were added to the naval service we have passed a law which authorized the enlistment of apprentices; and under that some three or four hundred boys have been enlisted; and the question was whether we should make provision for them; whether we should go back to the old peace establishment, and say there is no further demand for them in the Navy in actual service. Is it not probable, is it not reasonable, to believe that you can go back to that period? The only information we had on the subject was that we knew that we had an establishment anterior to the war, and that it was fixed at certain numbers; and if it were adequate for the service then it was reasonable to suppose that it might be adequate to the service now. But does it follow, as the Senator from New York has argued, that you can go beyond that? Has he any information outside of the action of the House of Representatives which authorizes him to strike down the service one man below that? Nobody pretends that we have. Why do we stop at the peace establishment? Because a just presumption, I submit for legislation, was authorized by the fact that we had that service, and it was not safe to go below that; and we had no information on the subject which authorized us to believe the service could be reduced below that.

So the committee on the part of the Senate undertook to place the numbers in exact conformity with the Navy establishment at the beginning of the war, adding the apprentices which have been added by law since. Now, if the Senate are of opinion that the establishment ought to be maintained as it was, including the boys, and also maintaining the apprentice system, then this amendment is right. If the Senate have the information which justifies them in believing that they can reduce the naval establishment below the demands of the service before the war, then they can afford to them the action of the House; but as the committee had no information to authorize them to make any reduction of that kind, and presumed that the demands of the service now are at least equal to what they were at the beginning of the war, we fixed on that basis, and that is all there is of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the joint resolution (H. R. No. 19) directing that certain moneys now in the hands of the United States Treasurer, as special agent of the Treasury Department, be covered by warrant into the United States Treasury.

TAX ON MANUFACTURES.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 900) to exempt certain manufactures from internal tax.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope we shall act on the conference report upon the manufactures tax bill at once. I send it to the Chair.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 900) to exempt certain manufactures from internal tax, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the second amendment of the Senate and agree to the same.

That the House recede from their amendment to the third amendment of the Senate and agree to the said Senate amendment with an amendment, as follows:

Insert in lieu of the said Senate amendment, after the enacting clause, the words:

That after the 1st day of June next no drawback of internal taxes paid on manufactures shall be allowed on the exportation of any article of domestic manufacture on which there is no internal tax at the time of exportation; nor shall such drawback be allowed in any case unless it shall be proved by sworn evidence, in writing, to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, that the tax had been paid, and that such articles of manufacture were, prior to the 1st day of April, 1868, actually purchased or actually manufactured and contracted for, to be delivered for such exportation; and no claim for such drawback, or for any drawback of internal tax on exportations made prior to the passage of this act, shall be paid unless presented to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue before the 1st day of October, 1868.

And the Senate agree to the same.

They recommend that the House recede from their amendment to the fourth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows:

Insert in lieu of said Senate amendment the following:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That every person, firm, or corporation who shall manufacture, by hand or machinery, any goods, wares, or merchandise not otherwise specifically taxed as such, or who shall be engaged in the manufacture or preparation for sale of any articles or compounds not otherwise specifically taxed, or shall put up for sale in packages with his own name or trade mark thereon any articles or compounds not otherwise specifically taxed, and whose annual sales exceed $5,000, shall pay for every additional $1,000 in excess of $5,000, two dollars, and the amount of sales within the year in excess of $5,000 shall be returned monthly to the assistant assessor, and the tax on sales in excess of $5,000 shall be assessed by the assessor and paid monthly as other monthly taxes are assessed and paid. And the assessment for the month of April, A. D. 1868, shall be made on the excess of sales above the rate of $5,000 per annum, and thereafter the annual period for the assessment of such tax shall commence on the 1st day of May in each year.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That every person who shall engage in or carry on the business of a distiller with intent to defraud the United States of the tax on the spirits distilled by him, or any part thereof, shall forfeit the distillery and distilling apparatus used by him, and all distilled spirits and all raw materials for the production of distilled spirits found in the distillery and on the distillery premises, and shall, on conviction, be fined not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, and be imprisoned not less than six months nor more than three years. If it shall at any time come to the knowledge of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that distilled spirits are selling, directly or indirectly, in any collection district at a market price less than the tax on such spirits, he shall forthwith institute a strict examination into the causes of such reduced sales, and into the business and conduct of all the revenue officers in the district in which such sales are being made, and in the district in which such spirits have been manufactured, and if such sales below the amount of tax shall have been continued or shall hereafter be continued in any collection district for a period of ten days, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall forthwith cause every distillery in which the business of distilling is carried on in the district to be seized and closed; and after such seizure no such distillery shall be permitted to continue or resume business, either under bond or under any other pretext or arrangement, until relieved by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue from such seizure.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That if any officer or agent appointed and acting under the authority of any revenue law of the United States shall be guilty of gross neglect in the discharge of any of the duties of his office, or shall conspire or collude with any other person to defraud the United States, or shall make opportunity for any person to defraud the United States, or shall do or omit to do any act with intent to enable any other person to defraud the United States, or shall make or sign any false certificate or return in any case where he is by law or regulation required to make a certificate or return, or having knowledge or information of the violation of any revenue law by any person, or of fraud committed by any person against the United States, under any revenue law of the United States, shall fail to report in writing such knowledge or information to his next superior officer and to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, he shall, on conviction, be fined not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000, and shall be imprisoned not less than six months nor more than three years.

And the Senate agree to the same.

JOHN SHERMAN,
GEORGE H. WILLIAMS,
E. D. MORGAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
ROBERT C. SCHENCK,
S. HOOPER,
WM. E. NIBLACK,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SHERMAN. If Senators wish any explanation of any particular point I can give it. I can state that all the Senate amendments are agreed to substantially. The first amendment disagreed to by the House was our second amendment, that in regard to contracts executed by the United States. The House have receded from their disagreement to that. The next amendment was in regard to exportations. The only change made by the conference report in the Senate amendment is to postpone the taking effect of that clause to the 1st of June instead of the 1st of April, so as to allow parties to complete contracts already made. It is confined simply to that purpose, to permit the exportation of goods where contracts have been made, so as to allow the parties to execute their contracts. The tax on sales is substantially the same as the Senate provided for, reducing the aggregate from $10,000 to $5,000.

The two criminal sections attached to the fourth amendment of the Senate were put on in the House of Representatives in what we supposed to be an obnoxious form. They have been entirely redrafted, and amount substantially to this: that where a distiller carries on business in fraud of the revenue, intending to defraud, he shall be liable to fine and imprisonment, and where distilling is carried on in a district or city where for more than ten days whisky is sold at a less price than the tax, without counting anything for the cost of production, in such cases the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is authorized to seize the distilleries and to stop them. The House section, as adopted by that body, at first regarded it as evidence of fraud on a criminal trial, and men might be convicted for the result of acts over which they had no control. The section, however, as it now stands, simply authorizes and directs the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to close the distilleries and suspend the distillation. Then the last section punishes for clearly-defined crimes officers of the revenue who with intent to commit a fraud do commit a fraud.

These two sections the conferees on the part of the Senate were indisposed to allow to be attached to this bill, on the ground that they related to whisky, a subject-matter not embraced in the bill; but the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and the Secretary of the Treasury were very anxious, indeed, to check the wholesale fraud now going on in the manufacture of whisky, and we thought these sections would do no harm if they would not do any good. The Senate conferees, however, I may state, were very anxious, under the direction of the Committee on Finance, to put a stop to whisky frauds by imposing at once a special tax on all distilleries after the 1st of April or the 1st of May, at the rate of about four thousand dollars on the lowest, so as substantially to cut off the great mass of distilling in this country and confine it to comparatively few distillers. The House of Representatives were not prepared at present to act on that proposition, and the result is that we only agreed on these two sections.

Mr. NYE. Allow me to ask the Senator a question. Some of these distillers have large stocks on hand, and some of them may be obliged to sell at a loss, even though they pay the Government the full tax. If a man is driven to that extremity, I do not see the propriety of our declaring that, because of his ill-fortune he may be arrested and forfeit his whole distillery, when it may be an actual necessity for him to sell the whisky at that low price.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; the House section originally made that prima facie evidence of fraud, but all that this bill does now is to require him to suspend. No sane man who did not want to cheat the Government would carry on the distillation of whisky in a collection district where the price of whisky was less than the amount of tax he had to pay.

Mr. NYE. Certainly not.

Mr. SHERMAN. All this provides is that if he should go on for ten days in succession to carry on his business of distilling when the price of whisky in the district is less during each of those ten days than the tax, it should be considered evidence of fraud sufficient to authorize the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to seize the distillery and close it.

Mr. NYE. If I understand the amendment, it is that if any distiller, carrying on the distilling business, is caught in the act of selling whisky for less than the tax—

Mr. SHERMAN. No. He can sell his whisky at three cents a gallon if he chooses, but he shall not carry on the distillation of whisky for ten days consecutively if the price of whisky in his district is less than the tax. It shall be considered evidence of fraud. It does not prevent him selling whisky, but he cannot carry on the business of distilling.

Mr. NYE. I think that is more objectionable. A man with a large stock of grain on hand who is not obliged to sell his whisky, but has capital to carry on his establishment, may run it for twenty or thirty days, or just as long as he pleases. There is no right to prevent distilling as long as a man has money to carry it on.

Mr. SHERMAN. A man would not carry on a distillery in that way unless he intended to commit a fraud.

Mr. NYE. I can imagine circumstances where he might.

Mr. SHERMAN. If he carries on distillation after the market price in his neighborhood shows that he cannot even get back the tax he would have to pay he would be a rogue or a fool or a madman to carry on business after that time.

Mr. NYE. There is no law to punish madmen or fools; if there was most of us would be punished. [Laughter.] But there is a right in Congress to prevent frauds and to punish those who commit frauds; but I deny the propriety of that law which assumes prima facie that a man is guilty of fraud when he is carrying on business on his own hook and does not offer his commodity for sale.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to ask the Senator from Nevada if this is a bill that proposes to punish a man merely because he produces liquor when the market price is low.

Mr. NYE. Certainly.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Is that this bill?

Mr. NYE. Yes, sir; at any time anybody is selling whisky in a man's district for less than two dollars a gallon, the tax, he shall be presumed to be guilty of fraud, and shall be stopped in his business. I insist on it that ought not to be done.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Allow me to say a word.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The Senator from Ohio is entitled to the floor. He yielded to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the section read again.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I suggest to the Senator that it is due to us that this section ought to be printed and the bill ought not to be considered now. It is of too much importance.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us hear the section read, and see if we cannot understand it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move that the report be printed and lie over until to-morrow.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us hear the section read first.

Mr. HENDRICKS. This bill affects millions of property of the people I represent, and I cannot consent to have it acted on in this hasty way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana moves that the further consideration of this report be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. HENDRICKS. And that it be printed.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the Senator to withhold his motion for a moment until we can hear this section read again.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Certainly; I have no objection to that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Why not have the report postponed and printed, and then we can read it for ourselves.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is my motion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is impossible, on merely hearing several sections of this kind read, for gentlemen to decide what the legal effect of them is, even if they are read here twice. The better way, it strikes me, as the provisions appear to be rather remarkable, would be to print them and let us look at them.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think, myself, it would be better for the Senate to have these two sections printed. There are only two sections that affect this matter—the last two sections of the report. I am willing to let them be printed, and take them up to-morrow.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let the whole report be printed, so that we may have it before us.

Mr. HENDRICKS. And let the bill be printed as it will stand if amended as proposed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask that the bill and report as they stand be printed, so that we can have them in the morning.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Before that question is taken I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Finance to one clause of the report as I heard it read, because I think an amendment should be made. As I understood the proposition, it was that in case of the exportation of goods for drawback sworn evidence should be submitted to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in writing.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I merely desire to call attention to the great inconvenience which will arise if that shall be put into the law, because a party at New Orleans or in California or in Maine would be compelled to send here to Washington before he could export an article. The evidence should be submitted to the collector of the district.

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir. We discussed that matter, and concluded that the question of drawbacks under the law could not be left to any one but the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. We have allowed six months to furnish proof. That will give time to furnish it from every part of the United States.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I understand this is an amendment by the House of Representatives upon a bill which was passed by the House originally and sent to the Senate, and amended here and returned to the House.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This is a report from a committee of conference.

Mr. BUCKALEW. But the bill originated in the House of Representatives. Now, sir, it seems to me very extraordinary that we should take up a new subject of legislation in this way. This bill passed the Senate after it came from the House without anything in it on the subject of the manufacture or taxation of whisky. It goes back to the House, and then an amendment is put on there, and we have not seen it, but are asked to vote upon it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask the Senator if we cannot tell better about it when we have it printed and read.

Mr. BUCKALEW. But I am objecting to this system; I am objecting to this mode of legislation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We do not adopt it now. We only propose to have it printed, and objection may be made to-morrow when it comes up for consideration as well as to-night.

Mr. BUCKALEW. On a subject so important as this, and calculated to provoke debate, and in which vast millions of money in the country are concerned, in which the public mind is deeply interested, I object to having it sent into the Senate at all from a committee of conference in this way, or from the House of Representatives by an amendment of their own bill after it has gone back to them.

Mr. SHERMAN. I cannot allow my friend to make this remark without informing him that the House of Representatives put on this provision, and it was sent to the Senate and printed and laid on our tables and sent to a committee of conference. This subject is not introduced by the committee of conference. My friend will understand that when the bill was pending in the other House on the Senate amendments the House, after debate, put on a section which, if this is obnoxious, was ten times as obnoxious as this. It was adopted in the House without debate. It was sent to us; and with it printed before us we asked for a committee of conference, and a committee of conference was ordered; and that committee has stricken out nearly all that was objectionable in the section proposed. There may be something objectionable yet; and, as the subject has not been debated in the Senate, I prefer that the report should be printed, and that the Senate should deliberately act upon it, because it is an important subject.

Mr. BUCKALEW. My point was this: that a subject of this kind ought to be introduced on the bill at an earlier stage, either when it was originally considered in the House of Representatives or when it was undergoing consideration in the Senate; that it was improper for one House, when their bill is sent back to them, to introduce new matter, and thus to prevent the deliberate consideration which all measures ought to undergo.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana to postpone the further consideration of this report until to-morrow, and that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I wish to inquire whether the naval appropriation bill is now before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is now before the Senate. It was simply laid aside to receive the conference report, and is now again before the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Very well.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. McCREERY. I move that we adjourn until Monday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri, that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 27, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOXTON.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being Friday, the first business in the morning hour is the call of committees for bills of a private nature, commencing with the District of Columbia. The morning hour has now commenced.

Mr. WELKER. I have been instructed by the Committee for the District of Columbia to report a bill with a substitute.

Mr. BURR. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WELKER. For what purpose?

Mr. BURR. I desire to make a suggestion relative to the business of the day.

Mr. WELKER. I will hear the suggestion.

Mr. BURR. An important measure is now pending, being the bill for the admission of Alabama, and several gentlemen desire to be heard upon it. I wish to say that I, myself, have no desire to speak upon it. I wish to move that the morning hour be dispensed with, and that the House now proceed to the consideration of the Alabama bill.

Mr. WELKER. I cannot yield for that purpose.

RIGHTS OF MARRIED WOMEN.

Mr. WELKER. I now report from the Committee for the District of Columbia House bill No. 91, concerning the property of married women in the District of Columbia, with a substitute.

The first section of the bill provides that the real estate of any married woman within the District of Columbia shall not be liable for the debts of her husband, but such real estate and the profits therefrom shall be her separate property as fully as if she were unmarried, and the separate deed of the husband shall convey no interest in it; provided such wife shall have no power to incur or convey such real estate except by deed in which her husband shall join.

The second section provides that the personal property of any married woman within said District held by her at the time of her marriage, or acquired by her during coverture by purchase, descent, devise, or gift, shall remain her own separate property in the same manner and to the same extent as her real estate so remains, and on the death of the husband before the wife such personal property shall go to the wife, and on the death of the wife before the husband it shall be apportioned and distributed in the same manner as her real estate descends and is apportioned under similar circumstances within the District; provided the assent of her husband shall not be necessary to enable such wife to incur or sell such personal property.

The third section provides that all suits within said District relative to such separate property of the wife, whether real or personal, shall be prosecuted by or against the husband and wife jointly, or if they be separated, then in the name of the wife alone; and in case of such separate suit the husband shall not be liable for costs, unless he be a defendant therein.

The fourth section provides that within said District the husband shall be liable for the debts and liabilities of the wife contracted or incurred before marriage to the extent of the personal property he may have received through her, or which he may have derived from the sale or rent of her real estate, and no further, and the liability of the husband to the extent aforesaid shall not be extinguished by the death of the wife.

The fifth section provides that when any judgment within said District is rendered against a husband and wife for the tort of the wife, or on account of any liability existing against her before her marriage, execution on such judgment shall be first levied on the separate property of such wife, if she have any.

The substitute was read, as follows:

A bill concerning the property, rights, and liabilities of married women in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That any estate or interest, legal or equitable, in real property in the District of Columbia belonging to any woman at her marriage, or which may have come to her during coverture by conveyance, gift, devise, or inheritance, or by purchase with her separate means or money, shall, together with all rents and issues thereof, be and remain her separate property and under her control; and she may, in her own name, during coverture, make contracts for labor and material for improving, repairing, and cultivating the same, and also lease the same for any period not exceeding three years. This act shall not affect the estate by the courtesy of any husband in the real property of his wife after her decease; but during the life of such wife, or any heir of her body, such estate shall not be taken by any process of law for the payment of his debts, or be conveyed or incumbered by him, unless she shall join therein with him in the manner prescribed by law: Provided, Such wife shall have no power to convey or incumber such real estate except by deed in which her husband shall join.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That any personal property, including rights in action, in the District of Columbia belonging to any woman at her marriage, or which may have come to her during coverture by gift, bequest, or inheritance, or by purchase with her separate money or means, or be due as the wages of her separate labor, or have grown out of any violation of her personal rights, shall, together with all income, increase, and profits thereof, be and remain her separate property and under her sole control, and shall not be liable to be taken by any process of law for the debts of her husband. This act shall not affect the title of any husband to any personal property reduced into his possession with the assent of his wife: Provided, All articles of furniture and household goods belonging or which may have come to any married woman, as above set forth, shall not be deemed to have been reduced into the possession of her husband by reason of their joint use of the same, but shall remain her separate property.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That in any action against husband and wife upon any cause existing against her at their marriage, or upon any tort committed by her during coverture, the separate property of the wife shall be also liable to be taken for any judgment rendered therein.

*Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That any married woman in said District whose husband shall desert her, or from intemperance or other cause shall become incapacitated or neglect to provide for his family may, in her own name, make contracts for her own labor and the labor of her minor children, and in her own name sue for and collect her own or their earnings. Any such married woman, in such case of desertion, incapacity, or neglect, may file her petition in the supreme court of said District of Columbia, alleging the same and making her husband thereto, which proceedings shall be subject to all rules applicable to civil actions; and upon proof by testimony of such desertion, incapacity, or neglect, the court may, in its discretion, make an order having the force and effect of a judgment, vesting such woman with the rights and privileges of a feme-sole, as to acquiring, possessing, and disposing of property, real and personal, making contracts and being liable thereon, and suing and being sued in her own name: Provided, After such judgment the husband shall not be liable upon any contract so made by her in her own name, or any tort thereafter committed by her.*

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That this act shall not effect any rights which may have become vested in any person at the taking effect thereof.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That all laws and parts of laws in force in said District of Columbia inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed, and this act to take effect from and after its passage.

Mr. WELKER. I call for the previous question on the adoption of the substitute.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to inquire whether this bill has been printed.

Mr. WELKER. The substitute has not been printed.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, how does this come up as a private bill?

The SPEAKER. It is reported by the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. WELKER. I will state to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] that the Committee for the District of Columbia have had this matter under consideration, and are unanimously of the opinion that this substitute should be adopted. I will state further, that its provisions are in substance the same as the laws of the State of Ohio on this subject. It modifies in a few particulars the bill introduced by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NIBLACK], preserving the main features of that bill. I demand the previous question.

Mr. MAYNARD. My point (and it does not seem to be taken by my friend who represents the committee) is that this is, as I understand, private bill day, and committees are called for private bills. This surely is not a private bill.

Mr. WELKER. I supposed that under a former ruling of the Chair we were entitled to report this bill, which operates simply in the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The ruling of the Chair, made in the last Congress, and incorporated in the Digest, page 151, was that "to be a private bill it must not be general in its enactments." "Bills for the incorporation of companies and whose operations are confined within the District of Columbia have been treated as private." The Chair said at that time, in answer to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD], that a bill in regard to suffrage in this District would be a public bill, because it would not be confined to particular individuals or to a company or a corporation.

Mr. MAYNARD. This bill applies to everybody who happens to be here.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will withdraw his point. The time which may be consumed on this bill will come out of the hour belonging to our committee.

Mr. MAYNARD. Private claims coming before Congress have at best but little opportunity for consideration. I have no hostility to this particular bill, but as this is private bill day I think we ought to devote it to giving private claimants a hearing.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Tennessee insists on his point the Chair must decide, even under the liberal ruling made by him at the last Congress and sustained by the House, that this is a public bill.

Mr. WELKER. I wish to suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that perhaps this bill will not interfere with any private bills which any other committee could report on this occasion. Most likely there will be enough reports from our committee to occupy the whole morning hour.

Mr. INGERSOLL. And more too.

Mr. MAYNARD. My objection is that if the morning hour should be consumed in the consideration of this bill (and it is a bill which ought to be considered with some care) private claimants are thereby postponed. I hope the gentleman will ask to have the bill printed and recommitted.

Mr. WELKER. I will, of course, do so if the gentleman insists on his objection.

Mr. MAYNARD. I must insist on the point.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order raised by the gentleman from Tennessee. If there is no objection the bill will be printed and recommitted.

There was no objection.

Mr. CHANLER. In view of the character of the bill I move that the committee have leave to report it at any time.

The SPEAKER. That will require unanimous consent.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I object. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia, asked and obtained leave of absence for ten days.

Mr. WOOD asked and obtained leave of absence for one week.

METROPOLITAN POLICE.

Mr. INGERSOLL, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with a recommendation that it do not pass, a bill (H. R. No. 428) to repeal section three of the act approved July 23, 1866, establishing a metropolitan board of police for the District of Columbia; which was laid on the table.

RAILROAD ROUTES.

Mr. INGERSOLL, from the same committee, also reported back adversely House joint resolution No. 152, providing for the survey of one or more railroad routes, and the same was laid on the table.

PAY OF JURORS.

Mr. INGERSOLL, from the same committee, reported back House bill No. 480, in relation to the pay of grand and petit jurors in the District of Columbia, with an amendment.

The bill provides that from and after the 1st of December, 1867, the pay of grand and petit jurors of the supreme court of the District of Columbia shall be five dollars per day for each and every day while engaged in attendance before said court.

Mr. MAYNARD. I make the same point of order, that this is not a private bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that it is a private bill, as it relates exclusively to grand and petit jurors.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The amendment of the committee is to strike out "five" and insert "three." I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order to enter a protest against the ruling of the Chair being drawn into a precedent hereafter?

The SPEAKER. It will not, as no appeal was taken from the decision of the Chair.

WEIGHTS IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. INGERSOLL, from the same committee, also reported back House bill No. 654, in relation to weights in the District of Columbia, with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. MAYNARD. I make the point that this is not a private bill.

The SPEAKER. It is a public bill by its title.

EVIDENCE OF MARRIAGE.

Mr. INGERSOLL, from the same committee, also reported back House bill No. 414, to preserve evidence of marriage in the District of Columbia, with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. MAYNARD. I make the point that this also is a public bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides it is a public bill.

Mr. MULLINS. It seems to me if there is any private bill at all this is a private bill.

The SPEAKER. It is general in its operations, and is therefore a public bill. Acts of corporation in the District are private matters.

GRUETI-VEREIN.

Mr. INGERSOLL, from the same committee, also reported back House bill No. 566, to incorporate the Grueti-Verein of Washington, District of Columbia, with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. MAYNARD moved to amend so as to reserve to Congress power to amend or repeal the charter.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence was granted to Mr. THOMAS for ten days, and to Mr. HOTCHKISS for two weeks.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by

Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, communicating Senate bill No. 213, entitled "An act to amend the judiciary act passed 24th September, 1789," with the message of the President returning the same to the Senate with his objections, and the proceedings of the Senate thereon.

NEW HORSE RAILWAY.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York, from the same committee, reported back House bill No. 420, to incorporate the Connecticut Avenue and Park Railway Company, in the District of Columbia, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was read in extenso.

Mr. MAYNARD. If the gentleman from New York will allow me, I would like to suggest that these railroad franchises are always supposed to be, and generally are, very valuable, and the only consideration given for them by the public is the public convenience. The great vice of our railroad system, as I understand it, has been putting these franchises into the hands of a very few persons practically, who invest but a very small amount of their private means, and then by public donations, by issuing bonds, by getting in debt, or other contrivances that are very well known, they get control of property which represents oftentimes many millions. Now, if I understand the reading of the bill, it proposes that the capital stock shall not be less than twenty thousand dollars, nor more than two hundred thousand dollars. Will the Clerk read the eighth section?

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the capital stock of said company shall not be less than twenty nor more than two hundred thousand dollars, and that the stock shall be divided into shares of twenty-five dollars each, and shall be deemed personal property transferable as the by-laws of said company may direct.

Mr. MAYNARD. I suggest a verbal alteration, at all events, by adding after the word "twenty" the words "thousand dollars."

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I will accept that.

Mr. MAYNARD. But it seems to me that $20,000 is too small a sum for such a franchise, and I suggest that it shall be not less than $50,000. That is one point.

Another suggestion is this: the bill provides, as I understand, that the books of subscription are to be kept open for two days unless the stock shall be subscribed earlier. If so it will give an opportunity for two or three persons, a ring, in common parlance, to go in and subscribe the whole amount of stock and close the books at once. I submit that the books ought to be kept open for a definite period, say for one or two days, or whatever time would be proper, so as to let as many subscribe as choose, and then let the stock be distributed pro rata as provided in this bill. The object I have in view is to prevent the franchise, which in time will probably be valuable, from passing into the hands of a few persons who might use it for their own benefit without reference to the public convenience.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I have no objection to the adoption of those suggestions.

Mr. MAYNARD. Then I move as an amendment that the eighth section be amended by striking out "$20,000" and inserting "$50,000;" and that the tenth section be amended by providing that the books of subscription shall be kept open two days. The point is that they should be kept open a stipulated time and not be permitted to be closed after a few persons have subscribed.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I have no objection to those amendments being incorporated in the bill.

Mr. CHANLER. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from New York if it is usual in such grants to make the property real estate? I observe from the reading of the bill that this is to be ranked as real estate. That, as I understand it, is an unusual provision. I would like to hear some explanation on that point.

Again, I would like to ascertain if this is one or two lines of road; that is, whether it is intended that this road shall continue from one given point by two parallel lines of track, or whether it diverges, and is practically more than one road. A practice which is not unusually in grants in railroads in other cities is to call the road one, whereas it is practically two. This is a question I would like to have answered. It does not appear in the bill whether it is one or two lines.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. In answer to the first question, I will state that this bill follows the act of incorporation of the Metropolitan railroad in this District and the Pennsylvania avenue railroad. I believe it is word for word the same as the former bills. In answer to the second question it is but one road or one line.

Mr. ROSS. I would like to make a suggestion, if the gentleman would permit me.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I have no objection to a question.

Mr. ROSS. I do not understand, from the reading of the bill, that there is any provision in it as to the time that the work shall commence or shall be completed.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I think there is.

Mr. ROSS. I did not hear anything of that kind. I think there should be a provision that the work shall be commenced in twelve months and finished in three years. There certainly should be some such provision.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I have no objection to an amendment of that kind.

Mr. ROSS. I move, then, to add to the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That the work shall be commenced within twelve months from the passage of this act and completed within three years.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection that amendment will be incorporated in the bill. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from New York will give us some information as to where this road is to go.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I was about to do so.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Upon my word I do not know where Connecticut avenue is.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Before the gentleman from New York proceeds I desire to make a suggestion to him. There is nothing in this bill which limits the amount which each person may subscribe.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. Will the gentleman suggest an amendment?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I move, then, to add to the bill this provision:

And that no one individual shall be allowed to subscribe for more than one hundred shares of said stock.

I wish to say that I was a member of the Committee for the District of Columbia at the time when the first horse railroad company in this District was chartered, and we endeavored to guard the bill with great care, but a company came here from Philadelphia and subscribed for some two millions of the stock and gobbled up the whole concern, so that no man in this city could have anything to do with it. Now, if this franchise is to be worth anything, it ought to be given to the people residing in this District and not to outsiders.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I have no objection to that proviso.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I now ask the gentleman from New York to agree to an amendment which I will suggest.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. Let me first explain the bill. For the information of the House I desire to state that it is proposed that this road shall commence at the intersection of Seventeenth street and Pennsylvania avenue, which point will be recognized by the House as the corner near the quartermaster general's department. It is to run upon Seventeenth street northerly, till it strikes Connecticut avenue, following that avenue to Boundary street at the limits of the city corporation. It is then proposed that when the contemplated park outside of the city limits is laid out this company shall have a right to extend their road to that park.

I will say further that I was invited to go over the road and did so, and have examined the route personally; and I think every dollar of stock in the proposed road will be taken by parties living on the road. The parties who are moving in this matter are those who live on the line of the proposed road; many of them are clerks in the Departments, and the railroad is proposed for the convenience of themselves and their families.

This matter has been before the Committee for the District of Columbia for two months, and I have not heard, nor has any member of the committee heard, a single objection to the construction of the road or to the passage of this bill, and I know of no objection to it. As I said, I have been over the road myself, and have conversed on the subject with the parties living upon it, and they are entirely unanimous in its favor.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have no objection to the passage of any bill of this kind which properly protects the rights of the people. Horse railroads are the poor men's roads, and I profess to belong to that class, and I would desire to have any reasonable provisions extended to them. I ask the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VAN HORN,] as he has fixed the fare at six cents, and I do not know that that is unreasonable for a single ride, to include in this bill this provision:

And the said company shall sell tickets, each ticket to entitle the holder thereof to one ride over the road, at the rate of twenty tickets for one dollar, and ten tickets for fifty cents.

That is but right and just. And I will state to the gentleman, what he probably knows, that the F street road—which we all know is one of the best conducted horse railroads in the country, with the cleanest cars, and the most genteel class of passengers—is entitled by its charter to charge seven cents for a single ride; yet that road, upon its own motion, has adopted this plan of selling twenty tickets for a dollar, and ten tickets for fifty cents. I think a similar provision should be inserted in this bill.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I do not think I can consent to this proposition, and for this reason: the Pennsylvania Avenue Railroad Company now charges six cents, and, as everybody knows, their cars are continually crowded. The Metropolitan Railroad Company, or, as it is sometimes called, the F street railroad company, charges seven cents fare. I know they sell twenty tickets for one dollar; but it is because their business is such that they can afford to do it. But everybody knows that the stock of this proposed new company will not be worth much for a long time to come. I think the provision suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] would be an unnecessary restriction upon this road. Gentlemen will notice that we reserve in this bill the right to alter, amend, or repeal this charter at any time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I understand that provision of amendment or repeal; it amounts to nothing at all; for if this bill is once passed it will never be repealed or modified so as to take away any privilege it confers. The gentleman says the Pennsylvania avenue road charges six cents fare. But that is not the rate fixed by the original charter; the original rate is five cents. The company, however, is entitled to charge the additional one cent on each fare because of the tax it is obliged to pay. And let me say to the gentleman that if the rate of fare on this proposed road is fixed at six cents it can add the amount of the tax under the existing law; so that the fare will really be more than six cents. If the gentleman is urging the chartering of this road for the benefit of the class of people that he professes to desire to benefit he certainly ought not to object to the insertion of a provision of the kind I have suggested.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I am as much in favor of low fare as the gentleman can be; but I wish to say to the gentleman that five cents on the Pennsylvania avenue road is better than eight or even ten cents on the proposed Connecticut avenue road. The business upon the road will be light; the people along the line of the proposed road will build it with their own money, for their own convenience, and for the convenience of their families.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. There must be a great many more people to ride on that road than those who live in the neighborhood. I think the provision I have suggested is one which we should put in this bill.

Mr. VAN HORN. I think if it is left to the people along the line of the road they would be willing to pay six cents for the privilege of getting the road.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. They have the privilege of paying that now.

Mr. CHANLER. If I understood this bill correctly as it was read, the termination of the road is to be at the boundary line of this city. Now, I want to know if this bill proposes to grant the franchise of travel over any streets of the city, except Connecticut avenue? I ask the Clerk to read that portion of the bill which describes the route of the proposed road.

The Clerk read as follows:

Commencing at the intersection of Seventeenth street west and Pennsylvania avenue, along the west side of Seventeenth street to its intersection with H street north, thence along Seventeenth street west to its intersection with Connecticut avenue, thence along said avenue to Boundary street; also from the intersection of Boundary street and Connecticut avenue along the county road from such intersection, thence on any road opened, or which may hereafter be opened west of the Fourteenth street road to, within, or through the proposed public park, or to the county line of Washington county.

Mr. CHANLER. I beg to draw the attention of the House to the fact that this bill grants a franchise over any county road which is now opened, or which may hereafter be opened. There is a road which connects Connecticut avenue at the foot of Meridian Hill with the Fourteenth street road; and I would ask those who have charge of this bill whether the object is to make a connection at that point? I think it is due to the House that the full extent of this contemplated road should be stated. I would suggest the propriety of limiting this grant to such county roads as already exist.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I am not inclined to yield further to the gentlemen, as I have only a few minutes remaining.

Mr. CHANLER. I would like to offer an amendment providing that the grant shall not extend over any street or road not specified and not marked on any existing map or chart of the city.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I cannot yield for any further amendment. I demand the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman to let the House vote on the amendment I suggested.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I decline to yield for that purpose.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Well, then, I hope that the previous question will not be seconded. My proposition is fair and just.

On seconding the previous question there were—ayes 39, noes 39; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. VAN HORN, of New York, and Mr. CHANLER were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 52, noes 44.

So the previous question was seconded.

The question recurred on ordering the main question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call for the yeas and nays.

On ordering the yeas and nays, there were—ayes 10, noes 51.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered.

On ordering the main question there were—ayes 47, noes 32; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. INGERSOLL and Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 59, noes 39.

So the main question was ordered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the bill be laid on the table.

On the motion there were—ayes 36, noes 60.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call for the yeas and nays.

On ordering the yeas and nays, there were—ayes twenty.

The SPEAKER. More than one fifth of those voting on the last count have voted for ordering the yeas and nays.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken on the motion to lay the bill on the table; and it was decided in the negative—ayes 29, nays 94, not voting 66; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baker, Benton, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Cook, Getz, Glossbrenner, Holman, Hunter, Kelley, Ketcham, William Lawrence, Orth, Scofield, Sitgreaves, Smith, Spaulding, Aaron F. So the House refused to lay the bill on the table.

During the vote,

Mr. GETZ stated that his colleague, Mr. RANDALL, was absent on account of the death of his child.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask that the engrossed bill be read.

The SPEAKER. It is not engrossed, and therefore goes to the Speaker's table.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
March 25, 1868.

Ordered, That the Secretary communicate the bill entitled "An act to amend an act to amend the judiciary act, passed the 24th of September, 1789," with the message of the President returning the same to the Senate with his objections, and the proceedings of the Senate thereon, to the House of Representatives.

Attest:

J. W. FORNEY,
Secretary.

The Clerk then read the bill, as follows:

An act to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the judiciary act, passed the 24th of September, 1789."

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That final judgment in any circuit court of the United States, in any civil action against a collector or other officer of the revenue, for any act done by him in the performance of his official duty, or for the recovery of any money exacted by or paid to him which shall have been paid into the Treasury of the United States, may, at the instance of either party, be reexamined and reversed or affirmed in the Supreme Court of the United States, upon writ of error, without regard to the sum or value in controversy in such action.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act approved February 5, 1867, entitled "An act to amend an act to establish the judicial courts of the United States," approved September 24, 1789, as authorizes an appeal from the judgment of the circuit court to the Supreme Court of the United States, or the exercise of any such jurisdiction by said Supreme Court on appeals which have been or may hereafter be taken, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SCHUYLER COLFAX,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

B. F. WADE,

President of the Senate pro tempore.

The Clerk then read the following certificate attached to the foregoing bill:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
March 23, 1868.

The President of the United States having returned to the Senate, in which it originated, the bill entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to amend the judiciary act, passed the 24th of September, 1789,'" with his objections thereto, the Senate proceeded, in pursuance of the Constitution, to reconsider the same, and—

Resolved, That the said bill do pass, two thirds of the Senate agreeing to pass the same.

Attest:

J. W. FORNEY,
Secretary of the Senate.

The Clerk then read the message of the President of the United States, as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

I have considered, with such care as the pressure of other duties has permitted, a bill entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to amend the judiciary act, passed the 24th of September, 1789.'" Not being able to approve all of its provisions, I herewith return it to the Senate, in which House it originated, with a brief statement of my objections.

The first section of the bill meets my approbation, as, for the purpose of protecting the rights of property from the erroneous decisions of inferior judicial tribunals, it provides means for obtaining uniformity, by appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, in cases which have now become very numerous and of much public interest, and in which such remedy is not now allowed. The second section, however, takes away the right of appeal to that court in cases which involve the life and liberty of the citizen, and leaves them exposed to the judgment of numerous inferior tribunals. It is apparent that the two sections were conceived in a very different spirit, and I regret that my objections to one impose upon me the necessity of withholding my sanction from the other.

I cannot give my assent to a measure which proposes to deprive any person "restrained of his or her liberty in violation of the Constitution, or of any treaty or law of the United States," from the right of appeal to the highest judicial authority known to our Government. To "secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and to our posterity" is one of the declared objects of the Federal Constitution. To assure these guarantees are provided in the same instrument, as well against "unreasonable searches and seizures" as against the suspension of "the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus," "unless when, in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it." It was doubtless to afford the people the means of protecting and enforcing these inestimable privileges that the jurisdiction which this bill proposes to take away was conferred upon the Supreme Court of the nation. The act conferring that jurisdiction was approved on the 5th of February, 1867, with a full knowledge of the motives that prompted its passage, and because it was believed to be necessary and right. Nothing has since occurred to disprove the wisdom and justness of the measures; and to modify it as now proposed would be to lessen the protection of the citizen from the exercise of arbitrary power and to weaken the safeguards of life and liberty, which can never be made too secure against illegal encroachments.

The bill not only prohibits the adjudication by the Supreme Court of cases in which appeals may hereafter be taken, but interdicts its jurisdiction on appeals which have already been made to that high judicial body. If, therefore, it should become a law, it will, by its retroactive operation, wrest from the citizen a remedy which he enjoyed at the time of his appeal. It will thus operate most harshly upon those who believe that justice has been denied them in the inferior courts.

The legislation proposed in the second section, it seems to me, is not in harmony with the spirit and intention of the Constitution. It cannot fail to affect most injuriously the just equipoise of our system of government; for it establishes a precedent which, if followed, may eventually sweep away every check on arbitrary and unconstitutional legislation. Thus far during the existence of the Government the Supreme Court of the United States has been viewed by the people as the true expounder of their Constitution, and in the most violent party conflicts its judgments and decrees have always been sought and deferred to with confidence and respect. In public estimation it combines judicial wisdom and impartiality in a greater degree than any other authority known to the Constitution; and any act which may be construed into or mistaken for an attempt to prevent or evade its decisions, on a question which affects the liberty of the citizens and agitates the country, cannot fail to be attended with unpropitious consequences. It will be justly held by a large portion of the people as an admission of the unconstitutionality of the act on which its judgment may be forbidden or forestalled, and may interfere with that willing acquiescence in its provisions which is necessary for the harmonious and efficient execution of any law.

For these reasons thus briefly and imperfectly stated, and for others, of which want of time forbids the enumeration, I deem it my duty to withhold my assent from this bill, and to return it for the reconsideration of Congress.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 25, 1868.

The SPEAKER. The question before the House, under the Constitution, is, "Will the House, on reconsideration, agree to the passage of this bill?" on which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] desire to be heard on this question?

Mr. WOODWARD. Yes, sir; but I prefer to be heard after the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON.]

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It is not my purpose to enter upon any general discussion of the veto unless it should be rendered necessary by something that may be said in favor of it. If the gentleman desires to be heard I will yield him a part of my time.

Mr. WOODWARD. How much?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. How much does the gentleman desire?

Mr. WOODWARD. I want an hour.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Well, sir, that is all the time I have. My purpose is to move the previous question at furthest at the expiration of the hour.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. What does the gentleman mean by saying he has but one hour? I understand this bill to be in his control. It is not imperative that he should call the previous question at the end of the hour.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I mean simply this: that I am now in possession of the floor, and under the rule of the House I am entitled to hold it for the period of one hour.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. But it is not necessary that the gentleman should then call the previous question.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It is my purpose to demand it at the expiration of the hour.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. It seems to me, as the bill was gotten through the House in a manner which was confessedly a surprise upon the minority of the House, the veto message ought not now to be considered in one hour. More time than that ought to be given. The gentleman said we might have had an opportunity to debate this question when it was before the House if we had sought that opportunity, and he lectured us for not having availed ourselves of the rights which sometimes we have—

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. A good-natured lecture.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Yes, sir; he gave us a very good-natured lecture; one, perhaps, which was just and which we deserved. But I must say that I shall have to change my views of his good nature if he shall insist that this matter is to be considered now in one hour.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Oh, the gentleman does not appear to be in a bad humor.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I shall believe that he was not sincere when he said that he thought we might have had an opportunity to debate this bill if we had sought it.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Why is not the gentleman now addressing himself to the substance of the veto instead of lecturing me?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I did not expect that the gentleman from Iowa would allow me to do that. Much as I appreciate his liberality, I supposed that if I undertook to talk on that he would at once call me to order.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman from Wisconsin will remember that for two Saturdays this matter has been discussed, and I propose to let the debate run through the hour to-day. At the end of that time I will submit to the House a demand for the previous question. If the House sustains me, well; if not, well. I desire to have the bill passed.

Mr. MAYNARD. I suggest to the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary that he let the debate run on till four o'clock, and then call the previous question. I have some curiosity to hear what gentleman can say against this bill.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentlemen appealed to me, and said that I knew that on two Saturdays this matter had been discussed. I must say to the gentleman that I do not know that fact. I only know the fact that the manner in which the bill passed was discussed and not its character, its merits. I do not understand that its merits have ever been discussed before this House. The gentleman from Iowa, therefore, cannot call me to the stand as a witness to that fact.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Oh, no; I am not calling the gentleman to the stand as a witness on that or any other point. I merely stated the fact that this bill had been discussed on two Saturdays. I will now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WOODWARD.]

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Speaker, I cannot do justice to this subject, nor to myself, nor to the gentleman from Iowa in fifteen minutes. If he will give me half an hour I will go on. [Cries of "No!" "No!" and "Give him that time!"]

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Other gentlemen may desire a part of my time; but if it is satisfactory to the other side of the House, I will yield the gentleman that time—thirty minutes.

Mr. BROOKS. I hope my friend from Pennsylvania will not take fifteen minutes.

Mr. WOODWARD. I cannot take fifteen minutes.

Mr. BROOKS. Let them gag the bill through.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Well, if the gentleman from New York meets my proposition in that way, when I am proposing to yield the gentleman from Pennsylvania the amount of time asked by him, I will withdraw it and renew my offer of fifteen minutes.

Mr. BROOKS. What I said was that I would not advise my friend to take fifteen minutes for the discussion of a constitutional question, of which there has not been fifteen minutes' discussion here in this House.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Yes, and the gentleman from New York made that suggestion after I had proposed to give the gentleman from Pennsylvania half an hour.

Mr. BROOKS. I had not heard the offer of half an hour when I made the suggestion.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I have stated that if "it is satisfactory to the minority of the House that the gentleman from Pennsylvania shall consume thirty minutes of my time, that is satisfactory to me, and he can have that time."

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not wish it to be understood that that time is satisfactory to the minority of the House. We do not consider that it is a proper and reasonable time for the discussion of such a measure, and as one of the minority I protest against this bill being rushed through now, after one hour's discussion.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Well, I will demand the previous question at the expiration of an hour, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] may proceed for thirty minutes, if he pleases.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Speaker, I have no expectation of being able to submit anything to this House which will induce the majority to pause for a single hour in passing this bill. I do not rise to speak with any such vain expectation. But I consider it my right and my duty, both to the House and to the country, to call attention to the position in which the House is placing itself in passing the bill.

If that be a position which gentlemen shall be proud to occupy they are entitled to the benefit of it before the country. If it be a position which will involve disagreeable consequences it is but kindness to gentlemen to point them out now. And, therefore, while I do not expect to convince the most fair-minded man in the House who is inclined to favor the passage of this bill that it is not worthy to be passed, I trust I shall not be considered as trespassing upon the House in submitting, in the short time allotted to me, the views which it seems to me are appropriate to the occasion.

Mr. Speaker, the bill consists of two sections, the first of which extends the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States to cases arising under the revenue laws of the United States, mere money cases. The second section takes away the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in cases affecting personal liberty.

Now, the first feature of the position in which the House is placing itself to which I wish to call the attention of gentlemen is this: that while they are conferring upon the Supreme Court jurisdiction in cases of revenue they are taking away jurisdiction in cases of human liberty. The cases that arise under our revenue laws are very numerous; but they are comparatively unimportant; they affect only such questions of taxation and collection of revenue as, under our very complex revenue laws, arise from time to time, and which we are unwilling to leave to the final arbitrament of the inferior courts. The first section of this bill secures to the parties and to the Government the right to take the judgment of the Supreme Court in these cases. I have no complaint whatever to make of that section, of its spirit or its object. I think it is proper; I think it should be passed.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. It gives the largest liberty.

Mr. WOODWARD. It allows the largest liberty to tax-payers and to the Government to have considered before the highest tribunal of the country all such questions as may arise under our revenue laws. And what is the constitution of that human mind that can insist upon and claim such a law for the tax-payer and yet deny to the citizen of the United States the right of habeas corpus, which has come down to us from the remotest antiquity of the common law? What is to be thought of the spirit of legislation which secures to the citizen the right to have the opinion of the highest judicial tribunals of the country upon a mere question of dollars and cents, and yet denies to the citizen the right to have the opinion of that tribunal upon a question of life or liberty? Is it possible that gentlemen mean that questions of taxation, which touch only the pocket, are superior to the questions which touch the lives and the liberties of the citizens? Are gentlemen, descended from that Saxon ancestry who toiled and suffered for centuries to obtain and maintain the great principles of civil liberty, now ready quietly to surrender them, while they will hedge around and guard by all the legislation in their power the interest which a man may have in a question of public taxes?

I cannot enlarge on this point. I do not intend to enlarge upon any of the points which I may make. I wish merely to call the attention of the House to the fact that they are placing themselves before the country as willing to extend to revenue cases the highest protection which, under the Constitution and laws of the country, can be given to them, while they are not willing to extend to the imperiled life and liberty of the citizen the ordinary privilege of the habeas corpus. That is one thing.

Now, here is another point. When this Government entered upon the perilous enterprise which is known as reconstruction, and that even more questionable scheme which is known by the name of the Freedmen's Bureau, both which measures, taken separately or together, were nothing more or less than invasion of sovereign States with the military power of the Government, and to force upon the people of those States a government not of their choice, but such a government as we chose to dictate from these Halls—when we entered upon that, it was apparent to every man that conflicts were liable to arise in those localities; that your agents of the Freedmen's Bureau, your teachers of negro children, the negroes themselves—

Mr. KERR. And organizers of loyal leagues. Mr. WOODWARD. Yes; those organized in loyal leagues and other treasonable combinations were extremely liable to fall under the operation of some local law and to be imprisoned for misdemeanors.

As a part, therefore, of this system of subjugation upon which we had entered, the act of 1867 was passed. It had always, since the organization of the Federal judiciary, been within the competency of any Federal judge to issue writs of habeas corpus; but as this power was limited to the local district and circuit courts, and as it was possible that those judges might sympathize in the local feeling, thereby causing the oppression of some negro or some Freedmen's Bureau agent, an appeal from the decision of the local judge to the Supreme Court of the United States would be necessary to secure to that negro or to that agent of the Freedmen's Bureau his personal liberty, and hence this act of 1867 came into existence. I cannot mistake its character, its history, or its objects, because I take my information from the recent argument of Mr. TRUMBULL before the Supreme Court of the United States and in the Senate. And I say that, looking at the general interests to which I alluded just now, I regard that law as a law in favor of human liberty. It was very possible, in the conflict which the bad legislation that Congress has devised for the southern States was liable to produce, that individuals might suffer false imprisonment. It was very proper, therefore, that the Supreme Court of the United States should have appellate jurisdiction over these local tribunals to protect the liberty of every man. For I hold that every man in the land who lives under the Constitution of the United States is worthy of protection. Though he be black, though he be mean, though he be a criminal, he is entitled to the protection which is secured to every man in virtue of his manhood by the fundamental principles of our Government.

I have therefore no complaint to make of the act of 1867. It never would have been necessary, however, if your reconstruction laws and your Freedmen's Bureau acts had not been passed. It grew out of a necessity of your own creation; and when so violent measures as those were forced upon the people it was wise and salutary to accompany them by such an act as the act of 1867.

Now, it so happened that an individual of Mississippi, of whom I know nothing, but whose name has become familiar to the public ear as McCordle, fell a victim to the military tyranny which has been sent into those States. As I understand, his offense consisted in criticising in a public print some measures of the commanding general. It was the exercise of the right of freedom of speech and of the press for which he was restrained of his liberty, and thrown into jail. He applied for habeas corpus. It was denied him in the local court. He took his appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. The case came into that court under this act of 1867—this very law that you passed for the purpose of securing to people their liberty. Mr. McCordle came into the Supreme Court of the United States pleading that law. After an argument by counsel, who denied that the case came within that law, the Supreme Court decided that they had jurisdiction in the case under the law; and they decided it unanimously. I read the argument of Mr. TRUMBULL upon that question as reported in the papers. I have not read the opinion of the court as delivered by the Chief Justice; but I understand it was a unanimous decision. And what was it in legal effect? It was a decision that that court was entitled to take jurisdiction of McCordle's case, that jurisdiction had attached in the case and that the argument should proceed. In pursuance of that decree the argument did proceed by distinguished counsel on the one side and on the other.

Now, I call the attention of the House to the fact that by all this Mr. McCordle acquired certain rights in that court, rights just as well defined as his right to life. He acquired the right of taking the judgment of that court on his case. It was a right which vested by the circumstances to which I have adverted, and not one of which will be controverted. It was a vested right. It was a vested right in respect to one of the highest interests of the man—his liberty. It was a vested right which the act of 1867 showed you were ready to respect when asserted by a negro. It was a vested right which, I say, is just as worthy of respect when asserted by a white man as when asserted by a negro.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Do you go that far?

Mr. WOODWARD. Yes, sir; I will go that far. I say that the vested rights of this man are just as worthy of the respect of this Congress as if he were a negro.

Now, sir, what happens? This House having allowed the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to take up by unanimous consent a bill relating to the revenues of the country, to which nobody had any objection, the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON,] the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, offered as an amendment this section, which takes away the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court under the act of 1867, and takes away the vested, attached jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in McCordle's case. Such is not only the legal effect of it; but, upon interrogation on this floor, the gentleman from Iowa declared that such was his intention in offering that amendment. I asked the question myself; and the gentleman made that distinct declaration. Nay, more, he not only admitted that that was his intention, but, with infinite bad taste, seemed to be proud of it—seemed to be proud that he had slipped in this amendment to rob a fellow-citizen of his vested rights in the Supreme Court of the United States. It was the first time I ever saw a lawyer, not to say a chairman of a Judiciary Committee, plume himself both upon the thing done and the mode of doing it when both were so questionable. I was shocked last Saturday, in the running debate we had here, at the spirit and manner of my friend from Iowa. When my friends around me here complained of that which I did not feel disposed to complain of—the manner in which this amendment was introduced—it was evident from the tone of the gentleman's remarks, as it had been evident from the tone of the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] a few days before, that they were proud of what gentlemen on this side called a trick.

I did not call it a trick. I would be sorry to call it so. They talked of their superior vigilance, of their being always "wide-awake," and advised us on this side to keep awake and not confide in them to the extent that we had done, advice, this last, which will probably not be lost on this side of the House. I say all this seemed to be in exceedingly bad taste. For what was the gentleman doing? He was trampling upon the rights of a fellow-citizen. I tried last Saturday to make him see the position in which he was placing himself. I cared nothing about this minor question as to the manner of doing it. I tried to fix the gentleman's eyes upon the real nature of the thing he was doing, the essential quality of the enactment. But he was so much occupied with self-admiration of the manner of doing the thing that I succeeded badly. I could not get him to contemplate the essence and quality of the thing itself, so much enamored was he of that which honorable gentlemen did not hesitate to call a trick. [Laughter.]

But, let that matter pass. The thing was done. The bill was passed without a word of debate or explanation. It was afterward justified and even boasted of, and now these desultory thoughts that I am expressing are the first words of debate upon the measure that have been heard in this Hall.

Now, sir, I have said that the act of 1867 was a law in favor of human liberty. This bill proposes the repeal of the law, which has not been asked for by the people of those States in whose behalf the law was passed, not demanded by any great public necessity, but dictated, according to the confession of the gentleman from Iowa himself, merely by a desire to prevent the Supreme Court of the United States from deciding McCordle's case. And the reason of this desire was a fear that the Supreme Court would declare the reconstruction laws unconstitutional and void.

Sir, in former times, candid and wise legislators were most anxious that questionable legislation should be brought to judicial test at the earliest possible moment. If anybody doubts the constitutionality of an enactment for which I vote while I may have the honor of a seat on this floor, I will facilitate the judicial investigation of the question by all the means in my power. I shall consider it a valuable privilege to bring a questionable measure for which I may cast my vote before the judicial tribunals of the country; and such I believe has generally been the prevailing sentiment in legislative bodies in this country until the present time.

But it was rumored that the Supreme Court were likely to declare the reconstruction laws unconstitutional; and this bill was reported and passed, says the gentleman from Iowa, for the purpose of preventing that. Mr. Speaker, when the country understands that the act of 1867 was a law in favor of human liberty, that a citizen restrained of his liberty had availed himself of this law for the purpose of obtaining the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, what will they think of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee of this House, coming in with such a section at such a moment for such an avowed purpose? And what will they think of the action of this House in sustaining such a bill over a veto from the President? Will they not see that it is a deadly blow at the liberties of a citizen? That it is an unworthy device to prevent a review of most questionable legislation? That it amounts in effect to a confession on the part of the House that their legislation cannot stand the ordinary judicial tests to which all laws are subjected?

I desire that the people shall understand this matter. If there is honor in it, gentlemen are entitled to it; if there is responsibility in it, gentlemen must expect to bear it. The people of the country shall have their attention riveted upon the facts of this case, if I can rivet it.

There is another point which I trust will not be overlooked by the public. The Government under which we live happily distributes its powers in three separate coordinate departments. The legislative is one of them, but the judiciary is also one of them. And the judicial power is vested in the Supreme Court of the United States and in such inferior courts as Congress may establish. Now, McCordle's case was a judicial case. It presented a question for judicial inquiry. Jurisdiction had attached. The rights of McCordle had vested. And I deny that the legislative department has any power to meddle with the coordinate department, the judiciary, while the latter is performing its appropriate functions in respect to jurisdiction of a particular case that has attached.

I am not going to discuss the question which was started between the gentleman from Iowa and myself as to the legal effect of this repealing law. I did ask him in that colloquial discussion on Saturday whether, in his judgment as a lawyer, the effect of this repealing law would be to divest that jurisdiction? He very promptly answered it would; that was the object, and he had no doubt that would be the legal effect. I ventured to express a doubt that such would be the legal effect. He said it had been decided, and I asked him where? He said he did not have the authority then, but he would bring it to me. On Monday he brought me three cases, I presume in answer to my inquiry. I will say, for the satisfaction of the gentleman from Iowa, that I have examined those three cases carefully, and I have examined several other cases, and when the question comes up, if it ever does come up in the House, on the legal effect of this repealing law I will be prepared to discuss with my friend from Iowa the cases he has referred to and other cases to which I will take the liberty of referring him. I will not discuss them now. I cannot do it in the half hour allowed me, nor do I think it expedient to do so.

On the contrary, Mr. Speaker, I choose to place myself upon his ground and to admit, for the purpose of the argument, that the passage of this law will divest jurisdiction in the McCordle case. That is his position. I concede it for the present. Then I say that is a posture of the case which I think will interest the people of the country. Here is an American citizen with the vested right to the judgment of that court, about, according to common rumor, to obtain favorable judgment, when the legislative department rushes in and takes the case out of the hands of the judicial department. It decides the case against the citizen. The gentleman says that will be the legal effect of this law.

Now, sir, I say if the gentleman is right in that legal opinion, and for the present I will not question it, this law prostrates all distinction between the coordinate branches into which the political power of this country was divided. It is no longer true that judicial power belongs exclusively to the judicial department. It is henceforth true that the Legislature may invade the courts and stop the exercise of judicial power in proper judicial cases. In other words, sir, the first principles of the Government under which we live are trampled under foot by this law: The Constitution, which we have sworn to support, is utterly disregarded by this law. Every man must judge for himself how that oath is to be performed, but I lay the Constitution across the path the majority are pursuing, and I remind them of their oaths.

"If reason hath not fled from man to brutish beasts," I would like to see these positions either confessed or answered. Powers are distributed; the judicial power (all of it) belongs to the courts; jurisdiction in McCardle's case had attached; the court were advising on the judgment to render; the Legislature claims to take the case out of court, and thus, in effect, to decide it against McCardle.

Mr. Speaker, this is not the only liberty we have taken with the Supreme Court of the United States. At this session we passed a law which requires two thirds of the judges of that court to unite in declaring any act of Congress unconstitutional. The Senate has not passed that bill, and I trust it never will. I took the liberty to express my repugnance to it when it passed the House. I am glad the Senate has refrained from passing it. Why? Because it is a legislative interference with judicial functions. That is my great objection to that law as it is to this one.

I look upon any interference on the part of Congress with the proper judicial tribunals not only as a great indelicacy, but a most dangerous precedent. We have found it so in stripping the Executive of his proper constitutional duties. The tenure-of-office act and several other laws which place the Executive in the power of his subordinates have virtually destroyed the executive power of this Government. The legislation to which I have referred, and this bill are acts directed at the judicial department, and what do they portend and intimate? What are the people of the country to understand from such legislation? Just this: that the legislative department of the country is determined to consolidate all the powers of the Government into its own hands; determined to consolidate this Government into a grand legislative oligarchy, the country to be governed by the Legislature, and the Legislature to be governed by a caucus, and the caucus to be governed by the Lord knows who; for I do not know who will succeed my venerable friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] as ruler of this House when he shall depart. I hope he will be a man as wise and good as he is.

Sir, if this legislation means anything it means just this: that the President shall not exercise the constitutional functions of his office, the judges shall not exercise the constitutional powers vested in them, but the legislative will shall be supreme; which I say is a repeal of the Constitution of the United States and a consolidation of all the political power of this Government into the hands of a legislative oligarchy to be wielded I know not by whom.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. I ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] to allow me five or ten minutes.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I yield five minutes.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. Some of my friends, Mr. Speaker, on this side of the House have been anxious to disclaim any imputation of negligence connected with the passage of this bill. I start by making a confession of default against myself, for I was in the House when the original bill, reported by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK] was introduced. I heard the bill read by the Clerk. I listened to the explanation which the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means was pleased to make, though the bill explained itself. I voted for the bill as it passed, and had not the slightest suspicion that it contained hidden in its stomach the strange and extraordinary amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON], which now appears in the form and garb of a second section in the bill. It came in at what time, or by what art, manner, or process, I do not pretend to say. I do not pretend to know except as since advised by the gentleman from Iowa. I only know it came in by some legislative prestidigitation—not to use any stronger words—which I can neither understand, admire, or respect.

However, I do not desire to make further comment on the mode and means by which the bill was passed, but hasten on to say a word in reference to the character, intent, and purpose of the bill. I do not agree with my learned friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WOODWARD]—though I have not studied the question, and ought not, perhaps, to express dissent—that this amendment will not reach the appeal in the McCardle case. I think it will reach it and sweep it out of existence. I think it will not only reach that but every other case of a like character either now pending or which may hereafter arise, and it is for that reason I am opposed to it. This bill, as it stands, is a kind of centaur, or, to use a coarser metaphor, a Demerara team—a horse and a donkey yoked together. The first section of the bill confers the right to transfer all revenue cases to the Supreme Court. This section is the original bill as reported by the committee, and it is just and right. It opens the door of the Supreme Court to any tax-payer in any part of the country whose property, even to the amount of a farthing, is subjected to taxation in violation of the Constitution or the laws of the United States.

Look, now, at the second section of the bill. This latter section relates to human liberty—to that great writ of habeas corpus which is the defense both of life and of liberty. Does this section enlarge the remedy and strengthen the defense? No, sir; just the contrary. It closes the doors of the Supreme Court—just opened for the tax-payer—upon every citizen who has been despoiled of his liberty in violation of the Constitution and laws of the Republic, and hands him over to his oppressor, to wear the chain or rot in the dungeon.

Why, sir, if a man's horse, his ox, or his ass is illegally distrained by the tax collector, what remedy may he have under this law? The bill provides that for the purpose of recovering even a dumb beast he may travel clear up to the Supreme Court and lay his grievance on the altar of justice and demand redress. Now, I beg the House to notice that if, on the other hand, a man's wife or children are torn from him by violence, imprisoned, given over to captivity in utter and admitted violation of the laws and Constitution of the United States, he cannot stir one step toward the Supreme Court. The remedy in last resort is denied him; the doors of the Supreme Court, which are wide open to property suitors, to a question of an ox or an ass, are shut on their hinges and barred when the suit is for liberty, for wife, or children.

That, sir, in a word, and in plain language, is the purpose and effect of this bill. Is there not something marvelous about it? What is the explanation? Why has property become so dear and human life and liberty so cheap? It needs no sphynx to solve the riddle. The problem is level to the meanest capacity. The law of 1867, intended to be repealed, was passed, as we all know, for the purpose of giving relief to some Maryland negro apprentices; and whenever a black man's liberty was thought to be in danger it was deemed proper and just—and I admit it was so—that the man, black, poor, and ignorant though he might be, should have free access to the supreme judicial tribunal, to the end that if he was wrongfully restrained of his liberty he might find a just deliverance by the law of the land, and therefore this bill was passed.

The law did its work for the black man. Now, what has happened? Why, a white man in Mississippi—not in a State where civil courts are open and civil remedies free, but in a State where the courts exercise their jurisdiction not at all or under the edge of the sword—is seized and imprisoned. For what? For exercising the liberty of speech, the liberty of writing, the liberty of criticising a military despotism that a Government calling itself free imposes on the people of the South. Seized and imprisoned by whom? By an officer of the civil law? Not at all. By an epauletted gentleman with a sword at his side. And turned over to whom? To a jury of his country? Not at all. To a military commission "organized to convict." From this drum-head conviction he has sought relief by the writ of habeas corpus, and has carried his case, under a law of your own passing, to the Supreme Court of the United States, a court officered in the main by members of your own party; and there, before that august tribunal, unstirred by the passions of the hour, he demands judgment upon your act in turning over four million free white men to the despotism of sword and bayonet. And now what do we behold? The doors of the Supreme Court, which, a little more than one year ago, were thrown wide open to the whole negro race, are slammed in the face of a white man upon a question of liberty—liberty today; life, it may be, to-morrow; not his liberty alone, but the liberty of every white citizen in the Republic. Is this just? Is it honest? Is it manly? Is it decent? Do you intend to hire pimps and spies to run round the country and spy out the cases you are likely to lose and then strip the court of jurisdiction? Do you intend "to clip the wings of the court" because the bird does not fly to suit you?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, it seems strange, after listening to the wails of the gentlemen who have just addressed the House, that the party to which they belong, and which they claim has existed from the organization of the Government down to the present time, never discovered until now that it was important for the Supreme Court of the United States to have appellate jurisdiction in such cases as the one to which they have called our attention. This jurisdiction never was conferred on that court until the 5th of February, 1867. By whom conferred? By the Congress of the United States; and, if my memory does not mislead me, conferred after no little opposition made thereto by the members of the Democratic party on this floor. It was one of the measures adopted by the majority in Congress for the purpose of reaching a particular end. And what was that end? It was to enable persons held under the apprentice laws of some of the former slave States to reach a determination of their right to freedom in the Supreme Court in opposition to the judgments of the local State courts upholding or enforcing those laws by which the people of those States were endeavoring to defeat the emancipation of the slaves of this country. That was the purpose and object of the act to which the repealing section of the present bill is applied. It was to reach cases arising under certain State laws, to the end that those laws might be removed out of the way of the grand emancipation policy, then a part of the Constitution of the Government, which they were obstructing. It was enacted in the interests of liberty, and not to give immunity to disturbers of the public peace.

The provision incorporated in the act of 1867 was as follows:

"From the final decision of any judge, justice, or court inferior to the circuit court, an appeal may be taken to the circuit court of the United States for the district in which said cause was heard, and from the judgment of said circuit court to the Supreme Court of the United States," &c.

The very terms of the section show that it was the intention of Congress to deal with a particular class of cases and provide a remedy for them—cases originating in courts inferior to the circuit court, and the McCardle case is not one of them. But, upon what considerations I know not, the Supreme Court, in my judgment, misapprehended the intention of the legislative department of the Government, and attached jurisdiction to a class of cases which it was never intended should be included within the provisions of that act, and that, as a gentleman near me remarks, was not, in fact, included in its provisions. Finding, sir, that such use was being made of the act of 1867, this House passed an amendment to the bill now pending repealing the jurisdictional clause of the act of 1867. Now, sir, have we violated any power vested in the Congress of the United States? Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] say that we have exceeded our power? Does the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HUBBARD] say that we have exceeded our power? No, sir; for they both tell us that the effect of this bill, if it shall become a law, will be to deprive the Supreme Court of jurisdiction in the McCordle case. They admit our power to pass it, and inform us in advance that the constitutionality of the act will be maintained by the Supreme Court; for if it be not constitutional the Supreme Court will so pronounce and retain jurisdiction in the McCordle case; but this is just what those gentlemen tell us will not be done, and they thereby admit away the entire force of the objections urged against this bill. We are exercising an undoubted power under the Constitution of the United States. Who shall judge as to how the power is to be exercised? Am I to submit my judgment to the learned gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WOODWARD?]. Is he to direct my discretion when I am called upon to vote on any given bill in this House? Am I to be directed by the learned gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HUBBARD?]. Will he claim this prerogative, in addition to his assumed right to lecture us for what we have done? If neither of them has the power to direct my discretion, if no one else has that power, who then must direct it? I must do so, and each member of the House must direct his own discretion, follow his own judgment, regardless of the censures of others. Acting upon this rule of conduct, the majority of this House adopted the amendment of which so much complaint has been made and passed the bill. Every step taken and act done in that regard were within our legitimate power and for the purpose of correcting an abuse of an act of Congress arising from what we regard as a misinterpretation of it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. For a moment; yes, sir.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Iowa to a fact in the case which it seems to me he is neglecting in his argument, either designedly or from inadvertence. The gentleman says that the act which the bill now under consideration is intended to repeal was originally passed to give to the Supreme Court jurisdiction in cases where courts inferior to the circuit courts had given wrong decisions with reference to the imprisonment or wrongful detention of apprentices.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman misapprehends my statement.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I think the gentleman and myself will not differ as to the facts when I have fully stated my question. The gentleman says the object of the repealing bill now under consideration is to correct an abuse of the act of 1867 by the Supreme Court. Now, I desire to propound this interrogatory to the gentleman from Iowa:

If it is important that the rights of an apprentice, wrongfully restrained in his liberty, should be considered and determined by the highest judicial tribunal of the land, is it not equally important—and if this bill does not provide for it ought we not to provide for it in justice to ourselves and for the purpose of protecting the rights of our citizens—is it not equally important and our duty to provide that, where the circuit courts of the United States decide incorrectly in reference to the rights of the white citizen, they may be reviewed by the highest tribunal? Ought not that right and jurisdiction to be conferred, if it be not conferred by the act of 1867? And will the gentleman insist that we ought to repeal that act because of fear or a suspicion that the Supreme Court may exercise the jurisdiction with reference to a white citizen which the gentleman concedes it was the purpose of the original act to give the Supreme Court in reference to a black child or apprentice?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If, when the act of February 5, 1867, was pending in this House, the gentleman made any noise about it or urged its passage, it has entirely escaped my memory. My impression is, however, that the gentleman was just as much opposed to the passage of that bill then as he is now to the repeal of that particular clause of it which the second section of this bill will repeal.

But I will answer the question of the gentleman. I did not turn my explanation of the reason for the enactment of the law of February 5, 1867, upon the mere wrongs of black persons or of white persons, but upon the higher ground of reaching, through the remedy provided, certain State laws that were being enforced by the courts of several of the States in opposition to the emancipation policy adopted by the Government of the United States. It was for the purpose of removing from the free-men of the nation, because of their repugnancy to the Constitution and laws of the United States, these engines of wrong and of oppression called "apprentice laws" in the States to which I have referred. Now, sir, that end has been accomplished. After it is over we find—

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. A question; yes.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. If the gentleman from Iowa feels it safe, right, and just to submit those rights to the Supreme Court, why does he hesitate, why does he fear to trust the rights of McCordle to the decision of the Supreme Court; and why would he take away the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in that case, if he feels that his black wards are safe in the hands of this terrible Supreme Court? Why not trust the court in the one case as well as the other?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I am not urging the passage of this bill over the President's veto because I believe the Supreme Court has jurisdiction in that case under the law as it now stands, but because by misconstruction of it, as I believe, they assume jurisdiction, and, therefore, it is necessary to correct that assumption in this particular way.

Now, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HUBBARD] referred to McCordle as languishing in a dungeon. He has not been in a dungeon at all. He has been out on bail all the time, and only $1,000 in amount at that. He was deliberately, purposely, persistently defying the laws of the United States passed for the better government of the rebel States, and stirring up sedition in the State of Mississippi, and exciting the people to revolt. For this he was arrested, yet the Government has treated him so kindly that he has not been placed in prison.

We are remanding him to the same remedy that he and all other persons in like cases had provided for them by the Democratic party from the passage of the judiciary act of 1789 down to the passage of the act of the 5th of February, 1867. Why did not that party, which opposes this bill to-day, provide this remedy in the days of its power if it is so necessary for the protection of the rights and liberties of the people?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I will answer the gentleman if he will permit me.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Go on.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The reason is that in the days of our power there were never such wrongs inflicted upon white citizens as in the days of your power you have inflicted.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, during the time when the gentleman's party held the reins of Government, they were not very careful of the rights of the people. They did everything in their power to direct every element and energy of every department of the Government to hold in slavery four million people and to rivet that accursed system on the descendants of the helpless slaves. More than this did they do. After the Government had been taken from their hands and freedom was conferred upon these four million, the party for whom the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] speaks to-day sought, by resorting to the use of the power of several State governments, in defiance of the will of the nation, to practically continue that system and condition of slavery in some of the States; and yet he comes here to-day and lectures us for being unmindful of the liberties of one man, and he a violator of law and a disturber of the public peace. The gentleman and his party were not mindful of the rights of white men when the South Carolina branch of the party refused protection to a citizen representing one of the great States when, by authority of his State and in the name of all the white people of the Commonwealth, he sought to appear in a South Carolina court, in strict conformity to law, to defend the Constitution and laws of the nation, and to protect from oppression and outrage the citizens of Massachusetts. It was his right to be there as a citizen, and doubly was it his right when, as an agent of the State which sent him, he was there to obey its commands in strict accordance with the laws of the land. He was there for the purpose of resorting to one of the remedies provided by law for the identical wrong of which his State complained. But his rights and those of his State were disregarded, and under threats of personal violence he was compelled to abandon his mission. The party which resists us to-day did the work, nor has it repented of it. Let not lectures on the rights of a citizen come to us from such a source.

Now, when all men are free through the action of the political organization represented on this side of the House, gentlemen come in here and lecture us when we propose, in the interest of good government, to do no more than to permit the same remedies to operate with reference to habeas corpus which operated during all the days of their political power. What remedy do we present? Is it not the same that preceded the passage of the act of 1867? We do not interfere with that remedy? Not in the least. We leave the old remedy in full and complete force, and only aim to avert a great wrong from resulting from a misuse of this McCordle case and other similar cases for political purposes. I hope such use will not be made of it, but we have just grounds upon which to rest fears, and should, therefore, be all the more cautious and guard against the happening of so great a wrong.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I yield for a question.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I ask the gentleman whether the real purpose, if he will allow himself frankly to avow it, is not to prevent the decision of the Supreme Court that the reconstruction bills which you have passed are themselves in violation of the Constitution.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It may have entered into the considerations presented to my mind to endeavor to prevent any court, and especially the Supreme Court of the United States, from usurping a power, if there is any intention in the minds of any of the judges to do it, which has been denied to them by the Constitution of the United States, which denial has been recognized by decisions of that court from the earliest times. This is a protection to the court quite as much as it is an assertion of a rightful power of Congress.

Mr. WOODWARD and Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut, rose.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. Two minutes?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Then I cannot yield.

Now, sir, the House of Representatives has not, in the passage of this bill, moved one step beyond the line of power recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States. In 5 Wallace I find a decision made in the case of Insurance Company vs. Ritchie, the opinion being delivered by the Chief Justice, all the judges concurring, in which this doctrine is held:

"The case before us is a case under the act of 1864. It is a case of which, because of the fact that the appellants and appellees are citizens of the same State, we have no jurisdiction except under the act of 1833; and the act of 1866 declares that the act of 1833 shall not be construed so as to apply to such a case.

"This is equivalent to a repeal of an act giving jurisdiction of a pending suit; it is an express prohibition of the exercise of the jurisdiction conferred by the act of 1833 in cases arising under the internal revenue laws.

"It is clear that when the jurisdiction of a cause depends upon a statute the repeal of the statute takes away the jurisdiction; and it is equally clear that where a jurisdiction conferred by statute is prohibited by a subsequent statute the prohibition is so far a repeal of the statute conferring the jurisdiction."

The principle here recognized of the power of Congress to divest a court of jurisdiction, and thus arrest the progress of cases pending, supports fully our power to pass this bill; and no one has or will seriously question it. The jurisdiction given to the court by the act of February 5, 1867, is the law of the remedy in and for cases coming within its provisions. We established it and may demolish it; we passed the act and may repeal it, or any part thereof. If the McCordle case falls the country may have escaped the danger of another political decision by a majority of the Supreme Court. I do not know how this may be, but I do know that in all this thing we have followed and are following strictly our constitutional power. We have kept within its lines as defined by the Supreme Court. We are exercising no doubtful power whatever, and its exercise in this instance is for a rightful, just, and proper purpose. The passage of this bill will give relief to the court and advance the interests of many waiting suitors, whose causes have been delayed by the persistent efforts which have been made to induce the court to enter upon political questions involved in the reconstruction legislation of Congress. It springs from higher considerations than those of hostility toward the court.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman cannot hope that the majority of this House, possessing the legislative power of the Government with the majority in the Senate, will yield, on any misconception of law or any political subterfuge, the right to settle into a condition of peace and repose this country, reorganize the rebel States upon just, firm, and abiding foundations, and restore them to the Union. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded—ayes 80, noes 30.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I demand the yeas and nays on ordering the main question, as this is the only opportunity we have to vindicate our right to debate.

Mr. WOODWARD. Does not the Constitution require the vote to be taken by yeas and nays?

The SPEAKER. Only on the final passage. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 111, nays 34, not voting 44; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. So the main question was ordered.

During the roll-call,

Mr. O'NEILL said: My colleague, Mr. RANDALL, is paired with Mr. CORNELL; the former would have voted "no" and the latter "ay."

Mr. PRUYN. My colleague, Mr. WOOD, has been called away by illness in his family; if here he would vote in the negative.

Mr. WOODWARD. My colleague, Mr. BOYER, is absent; he would have recorded his vote in the negative.

Mr. SITGREAVES. My colleague, Mr. HAIGHT, is absent on account of illness; he would have voted "no."

Mr. FOX. My colleagues, Mr. ROBINSON and Mr. MORRISSEY, are detained from the House on account of illness; they would have voted against the bill if here.

Mr. MAYNARD. My colleagues, Mr. STOKES and Mr. NUNN, are absent; if here they would vote in favor of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question, under the Constitution, is, "Will the House on reconsideration agree to the passage of the bill?" The question will be taken by yeas and nays.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 114, nays 34, not voting 41; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Cake, Churchill, Reader W. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodward—114.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Axtell, Barnes, Beck, Brooks, Burr, Cary, Chanler, Eldridge, Fox, Getz, Glosbrenner, Golladay, Holman, Hotchkiss, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Johnson, Kerr, Knott, Marshall, McCormick, Mungen, Niblack, Nicholson, Pruyn, Ross, Sitgreaves, Stone, Taber, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Auken, and Woodward—34.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Allison, Barnum, Blair, Boyer, Butler, Cobb, Cornell, Donnelly, Ela, Finney, Garfield, Griswold, Grover, Haight, Harding, Hawkins, Higby, Asahel W. Hubbard, Jones, George V. Washburn, William Williams, and Wood—41.

The SPEAKER. Two thirds having voted in the affirmative, and it having been certified to the House that the Senate, on a similar reconsideration, have, by a two-thirds vote, agreed to the passage of the bill, I do, by the authority of the Constitution of the United States, declare that notwithstanding the objections of the President the bill (S. No. 213) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the judiciary act, passed the 24th of September, 1789," has become a law.

During the roll-call,

Mr. HUNTER said: My colleagues, Messrs.

WILLIAMS and WASHBURN are absent on leave. If they were here they would vote "ay."

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky, said: My colleague, Mr. JONES, is paired with Mr. HARDING; if here he would vote "no."

APPROPRIATIONS FOR INDIAN DEPARTMENT.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 819) making a partial appropriation for the expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations.

Mr. BLAINE. I move that the amendment of the Senate be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WINDOM. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to reserve the point of order on that amendment, that it must have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. That point of order can be raised when the amendment shall be reported back to the House. An appropriation bill can be considered in the House so far as referring it to a committee is concerned.

Mr. HOLMAN. I only desired to make the point of order in time.

Mr. BLAINE. This is a regular appropriation bill. It came from the Committee on Appropriations, and it ought to be referred to that committee.

Mr. WINDOM. Are remarks in order on the motion to refer?

The SPEAKER. The motion is debatable.

Mr. WINDOM. I desire to say that I am aware that this is an appropriation bill, and I am at the same time aware that it is an appropriation bill the design of which is to change the entire Indian system, and that being the case it seems to me that it is very proper that it should be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

I desire to say further, that I believe a very injurious usage has grown up in this House; I do not expect to correct it, but I have an opportunity of calling attention to it and I desire to embrace that opportunity. Now, I believe it is the rule in the Senate that all appropriation bills are, by courtesy, referred to the appropriate committees. For instance—

Mr. BLAINE. Not all.

Mr. WINDOM. I know they do go to those committees.

Mr. BLAINE. Not at all. The gentleman is entirely mistaken in regard to the proceedings of the Senate. No such rule prevails there.

Mr. WINDOM. I do not know what the rule is, but I know that by courtesy all appropriation bills go before the appropriate committees and are examined. The Post Office Committee has an opportunity of examining and proposing amendments in committee to the Post Office appropriation bill; and the same of the military committee, and the naval committee, and throughout the entire list of committees.

Mr. BLAINE. Allow me to correct the gentleman. What he has got into his head is this: when an appropriation bill is pending in the Senate the appropriate committees may move amendments thereto, because the rule of the Senate requires that an amendment to an appropriation bill must be recommended by the committee to which the subject appertains, and it is not in order, as here, for an individual member on his own responsibility to move an amendment.

Mr. WINDOM. I think I am not mistaken in the idea that there is such a usage in the Senate, that by courtesy all these different appropriation bills are examined by their appropriate committees. Now, that opportunity is entirely denied in the House. I say nothing against our Committee on Appropriations; it is a very wise and proper committee. But the Appropriation Committee of this House has absorbed all the business of the House, so far as appropriations are concerned. That, perhaps, would not be so objectionable if the bills thus controlled by that committee were confined to making appropriations. But when it comes to inaugurating new systems for the action of the different Departments of the Government I think it is time that practice should be changed. Now, this bill came from the Committee on Appropriations, I have been informed—if incorrectly, I hope I may be corrected by any member of that committee—that this subject of Indian affairs was referred to a single member of that committee for his consideration and judgment. Now, that member may be well qualified to judge concerning impeachment questions and such things, as well as very many other questions; but I think he has already too many subjects on his hands to be enabled to give the proper consideration to the subject of Indian affairs.

Mr. SPALDING. Allow me a moment.

Mr. WINDOM. Very well.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to say to the gentleman that the general Indian bill has been before the Committee on Appropriations for some days, and they are going over it item by item. It is a very lengthy bill, and requires a great deal of time for its proper consideration. The bill now under consideration makes only a partial appropriation for the Indian service; it is a bill reported in advance of the general Indian bill. Now, how can the Committee on Indian Affairs deal properly with this bill, when they do not know at all what is in our general bill?

Mr. WINDOM. I am very well aware that this is but a partial appropriation bill. It is because of the peculiar nature of this bill that I call the attention of the House to it.

Here is a bill coming from the Committee on Appropriations which proposed to appropriate some two hundred thousand dollars to be expended without one single guarantee or safeguard to the Treasury. It was proposed by the Committee on Appropriations to place in the hands of a commission—to be composed of very honorable and respectable men it is true—over two hundred thousand dollars, to be expended by them, without giving any bonds, without taking any voucher, without the Treasury being protected in any way.

Now, if all the members of that commission were to act together in making the payments under this bill, I would not have the least objection to it, for I think that would afford the strongest guarantee of the honest application of this fund. But gentlemen know very well that will not be done. We all know that General Sherman and Senator HENDERSON, and men of that class, are not going to make any money out of Indian contracts, or would not improperly apply this fund. But I do not know that every member of that commission will be an honest man. And I will say that if there should be a dishonest man on that commission he will be the very man who will have time enough to go out and make these payments. And under this bill of the House he will not be required to give any bonds, or to return a single exhibit or voucher; but he will be left free to pay out the $200,000 as he pleases, or to forget to pay out any portion of it, just as he pleases. That is the House bill. A single member of the Committee on Appropriations having charge of the preparation of it, brings it in here without giving a single member of the Indian Committee the slightest notice of what it contains. It is passed by the House and then goes to the Senate, where very properly they strike out the House bill and give us one with some guarantees, which we do not find in the bill as it passed the House.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman will allow me a single remark. The Committee on Appropriations, if this bill be referred to them, must take it with the Senate amendment, and when they report it back the question must come up on that amendment. In what different condition would it be if the Committee on Indian Affairs should take charge of it? Are all the customs and usages which have prevailed in reference to appropriation bills during the entire history of congressional proceedings to be reversed because the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] does not like what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] did in one particular instance?

Mr. WINDOM. It would be a little more polite if the gentleman would obtain consent before interrupting me. But I suppose he feels justified in imposing on a modest man like me, and I am always glad to hear him.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have made my motion, not particularly because I am dissatisfied with the action of this bill. For the last five years I have heard a general murmur of dissatisfaction all over this House that the Committee on Appropriations absorbs all the business of the House, and does not give to other committees a fair opportunity to consider the measures properly belonging to them.

Mr. BLAINE. The Committee on Appropriations has been in existence only two years.

Mr. WINDOM. I am aware that since the gentleman has become a member of that committee he is disposed to think it the only committee that ever existed. But the committee had an existence before the gentleman was ever on it.

Mr. BLAINE. It has only existed for one Congress.

Mr. WINDOM. Well, it was the Committee of Ways and Means before; and that committee was chargeable with the same practice of absorbing the business of the House.

Now, I do not want to say anything disparaging of the Committee on Appropriations. It is just as careful and judicious a committee as any in this House. But I believe there are other committees just as well qualified to consider the peculiar branches of business which the House has confided to them as this committee is to consider every possible matter of business relating to the affairs of the country. I believe that if the House will to-day vote for my motion, and thus declare in favor of giving the various committees of the House an opportunity to examine measures which properly belong to them, we shall establish a new usage which will have a very beneficial effect. I have only to refer to the form in which this bill was introduced, with its loose and unguarded provisions, for the purpose of showing that the Committee on Appropriations is not infallible, that it may make mistakes as well as other committees. The fact is that it has too much business on its hands; and the other committees, if they would do themselves justice, will demand the right to examine questions appertaining to the peculiar province intrusted to them by the House.

I do not wish to occupy time on this question. I think it is fully understood by members generally. I hope that we may have an opportunity to give a fair examination to this bill, and that in future each committee will have confided to it matters properly coming within its jurisdiction.

Mr. BLAINE obtained the floor.

MONEYS COVERED INTO THE TREASURY.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I rise to a privileged question, and submit a report from the committee of conference on the joint resolution (H. R. No. 19) directing that certain moneys now in the hands of the United States Treasurer, as special agent of the Treasury Department, be covered by warrant into the United States Treasury.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the joint resolution (H. R. No. 19) directing that certain moneys now in the hands of the United States Treasurer, as special agent of the Treasury Department, be covered by warrant into the United States Treasury, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House of Representatives recede from their amendment to the Senate amendments proposing to strike out section three of said Senate amendments, and agree to said section with the following amendments, to wit:

First. Strike out the words "one hundred" in the second and third lines of said section, and insert in lieu thereof the words "seventy-five."

Second. Add at the end of said section the words, "and for prosecuting suits in the United States for the recovery of such property and for providing for the defense of the United States against suits for or in respect to such property in the Court of Claims."

And that the Senate agree thereto.

C. C. WASHBURN,

G. W. SCOTFIELD,

DEMAS BARNES,

Managers on the part of the House.

GEORGE F. EDMUNDS,

W. P. FESSENDEN,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin, moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TAX ON MANUFACTURES.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise to a privileged question, and present a report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 900) exempting certain manufactures from internal tax.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 900) to exempt certain manufactures from internal tax, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the second amendment of the Senate and agree to the same.

That the House recede from their amendment to the third amendment of the Senate and agree to the said Senate amendment with an amendment, as follows:

Insert in lieu of the said Senate amendment, after the enacting clause, the words:

That after the 1st day of June next no drawback of internal taxes paid on manufactures shall be allowed on the exportation of any article of domestic manufacture on which there is no internal tax at the time of exportation; nor shall such drawback be allowed in any case unless it shall be proved by sworn evidence, in writing, to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that the tax had been paid and that such articles of manufacture were, prior to the 1st day of April, 1868, actually purchased or actually manufactured and contracted for, to be delivered for such exportation; and no claim for such drawback, or for any drawback of internal tax on exportations made prior to the passage of this act, shall be paid unless presented to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue before the 1st day of October, 1868.

And the Senate agree to the same.

They recommend that the House recede from their amendment to the fourth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows:

Insert in lieu of said Senate amendment the following:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That every person, firm, or corporation who shall manufacture, by hand or machinery, any goods, wares, or merchandise not otherwise specifically taxed as such, or who shall be engaged in the manufacture or preparation for sale of any articles or compounds not otherwise specifically taxed, or shall put up for sale in packages with his own name or trademark thereon any articles or compounds not otherwise specifically taxed, and whose annual sales exceed $5,000, shall pay for every additional $1,000 in excess of $5,000 two dollars; and the amount of sales within the year in excess of $5,000 shall be returned monthly to the assistant assessor, and the tax on sales in excess of $5,000 shall be assessed by the assessor and paid monthly as other monthly taxes are assessed and paid. And the assessment for the month of April, A. D. 1868, shall be made on the excess of sales above the rate of $5,000 per annum, and thereafter the annual period for the assessment of such tax shall commence on the 1st day of May in each year.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That every person who shall engage in or carry on the business of a distiller with intent to defraud the United States of the tax on the spirits distilled by him, or any part thereof, shall forfeit the distillery and distilling apparatus used by him, and all distilled spirits and all raw materials for the production of distilled spirits found in the distillery and on the distillery premises, and shall, on conviction, be fined not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, and be imprisoned not less than six months nor more than three years. If it shall at any time come to the knowledge of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that distilled spirits are selling, directly or indirectly, in any collection district at a market price less than the tax on such spirits, he shall forthwith institute a strict examination into the causes of such reduced sales, and into the business and conduct of all the revenue officers in the district in which such sales are being made, and in the district in which such spirits have been manufactured, and if such sales below the amount of tax shall have been continued or shall hereafter be continued in any collection district for a period of ten days, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall forthwith cause every distillery, in which the business of distilling is carried on in the district, to be seized and closed; and after such seizure no such distillery shall be permitted to continue or resume business, either under bond or under any other pretext or arrangement, until relieved by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue from such seizure.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That if any officer or agent appointed and acting under the authority of any revenue law of the United States shall be guilty of gross neglect in the discharge of any of the duties of his office, or shall conspire or collude with any other person to defraud the United States, or shall make opportunity for any person to defraud the United States, or shall do or omit to do any act with intent to enable any other person to defraud the United States, or shall make or sign any false certificate or return in any case where he is by law or regulation required to make a certificate or return, or having knowledge or information of the violation of any revenue law by any person, or of fraud committed by any person against the United States, under any revenue law of the United States, shall fail to report in writing such knowledge or information to his next superior officer and to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, he shall, on conviction, be fined not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000, and shall be imprisoned not less than six months nor more than three years.

And the Senate agree to the same.

ROBERT C. SCHENCK,
S. HOOPER,
WM. B. NIBLACK,
Managers on the part of the House.
JOHN SHERMAN,
GEORGE H. WILLIAMS,
E. D. MORGAN,

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I am able to say to the House, after some two or three hours of full and free conference the managers on the part of the House and of the Senate concur unanimously in the report which we have now presented. Without going too much into detail I will explain what it is we have agreed to.

The first amendment of the Senate, it will be remembered, related to the reduction of the tax on oil. The House relieved the committee of conference from anything to do on that subject by agreeing to the amendment of the Senate; so that, not as a part of the report of the committee of conference, but outside of that, I have only to say we are indebted to our friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTFIELD] for that reduction of the revenue which will have to be made up hereafter by a tax on iron or something else. [Laughter.]

The second amendment of the Senate was in relation to giving to the United States the benefit of the relief from taxation so far as it applied to those articles of machinery, &c., which have been or may hereafter be delivered under contract for the benefit of the Government. Such representations were made by the managers on the part of the Senate in relation to the very great advantage this would be to the Government on account of the peculiar character and extent of some contracts that were made, and the circumstances under which they were made, that the managers on the part of the House agreed to let that amendment of the Senate stand, and recede from the non-concurrence on the part of the House.

The next amendment is that which relates to drawbacks. This has been settled between the managers on one side and the other by a compromise, taking the first part of the Senate amendment and the last part of the House amendment; so that, while there is to be after the 1st of June next no drawback allowed on the exportation of any article that was free from tax at the time of the exportation, it is provided, as proposed by the House, that there shall be relieved from this provision those cases where articles prior to the 1st of April, when this law takes effect, have actually been purchased or manufactured and contracted to be sent abroad.

There is another provision contained in this report as agreed to which was virtually agreed to in a different shape by both Houses before, and that is that there shall be a time limited within which any claim for drawback from internal taxes shall be paid or settled at the Treasury. We have fixed it on the 1st of October, so that both as to those things which are relieved from tax by this bill and as to any former claim made for drawbacks it is provided that there shall be what is equivalent to a statute of limitations, whereby every such claim shall be brought forward and proved for settlement on or before the 1st of October next, and no claim shall be paid after that date. It seems strange that there has never been a limitation of this kind. In consequence of the want of it old proofs presented in old cases, extending back several years, are still coming forward to the Treasury.

The fourth amendment of the Senate is that which relates to extending the special tax on sales to manufactures. The House so managed the proposition of the Senate as to limit that tax to all sales above $5,000 in those cases where by this bill manufactures were exempted.

After full consultation upon this subject the managers to the part of the House have agreed with the Senate in putting generally a tax on sales above $5,000, as a part of the special tax in all cases of manufactures where they are not otherwise differently provided for, as in the case of tobacco, spirits, and some few other articles. In other words, we have agreed to put into this bill that general provision which would have been reported and will be reported in the general tax bill as prepared by the Committee of Ways and Means.

This brings me to the whisky question. It will be remembered that by the amendment of the House it was provided that to run a distillery with intent to defraud the Government of the tax was made a penitentiary offense, a crime to be visited with heavy penalties. The managers on the part of the Senate have agreed to that part of the House amendment. The House had inserted a provision that if any distiller should carry on business for a period of twenty days when the market price of distilled spirits was below the aggregate cost of production with the tax added, it should be held prima facie evidence that such distiller was carrying on his distillery in violation of the preceding portion of the section.

It was thought by the Senate that this was too hard a rule of evidence. It was claimed that it was too much to make a prima facie case by this means against a man and subject him to punishment by imprisonment in the penitentiary in consequence of it.

So, also, there was a provision in the House section that in any district where spirits were produced and sold for less than the tax, or where they were put on sale and sold from day to day for less than the tax, the assessor and collector should be suspended from their offices and their pay stopped until they should virtually prove their innocence, clear their skirts of the charge of conniving at it. In lieu of that, which the Senate also objected to, it was finally, by a compromise, agreed that in every case where it shall come to the knowledge of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that distilled spirits are selling directly or indirectly for less than the tax there shall be instituted a strict examination into the cause of the reduced price and into the conduct and business of every revenue officer in the district where spirits are thus sold or produced, leaving, without any new provision of law, the consequences of the guilt of the officers to be provided for as in other cases where officers may be guilty of offenses against the law, but making no provision here in regard to it, no suspension from office. And there is a further provision that if it shall be found in any case that distilled spirits are selling in a collection district for less than the cost for a period of ten days, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall have power immediately to close every distillery in the district, seizing it for that purpose, and that this seizure shall not be remitted under any pretext of putting it under bond or any other arrangement, until relieved regularly from seizure by the Commissioner.

The object of this last clause is this: it is found that where seizures of distilleries have taken place and they have been turned over to the courts, in a great many cases—and we have such proof before the Committee of Ways and Means—the marshal of the district has made a very pretty business by running the distillery under bonds, or, if not the marshal, then the keepers of the distillery whom he puts in charge.

We therefore provide that the closing up shall be absolute. If this be done, I may here explain to the House, it will be perhaps one of the most efficient means of bringing out of bond whisky which is there now, and which ought to pay $40,000,000 of tax.

Mr. Speaker, when I was on the floor yesterday or the day before, this subject being before the House, I gave a little offense, I believe, to the gentleman who represents the Chicago district in Illinois, [Mr. JUMP,] by having read a letter telling of the infernal condition of things, so far as distilled spirits are concerned, and all the officers engaged in watching or pretending to watch the revenue in that particular city. I am sorry if I left any wrong impression, for if I had not been cut off, as the Speaker will recollect I was, by the necessary enforcement of the rule prohibiting me from going further, I should have added that, bad as it is at Chicago, it is, if possible, a little worse in New York and very much worse in Philadelphia. [Laughter.] I hope this is making the amende to Chicago.

Mr. BROOKS. I suppose the object of this bill, then, is to stop distillation in the great cities of the country, and send it back to the rural districts altogether?

Mr. SCHENCK. No, sir; the rule is general. It applies to all—to rural districts as well as city districts.

Mr. BROOKS. Let me remark that, so far as my city is concerned, I think the great majority of frauds are perpetrated by persons from the rural districts.

Mr. SCHENCK. That is very likely. Men born away up in the New England States who wander down to the cities are very apt to get into bad practices when they get there; they are demoralized by becoming citizens of those large cities. [Laughter.]

This provision applies to the districts everywhere. If there is not so much fraud committed in the rural districts as in the cities, I do not myself suppose it is owing so much to the superior morality of the rural districts as to the fact that they are more open to observation. Being compelled to suspend business when they have committed any offenses, that business has gone lurking in the purlieus of the cities, where it is less liable to observation and detection.

Mr. NIBLACK. Mr. Speaker, before the vote is taken on this conference report I desire to make a brief explanation in relation to this last section upon the subject of whisky and distilleries. As a member of the Committee of Ways and Means I was opposed, in the first instance, to bringing this matter of whisky and whisky frauds into this bill in any shape. As to these I preferred to wait until the regular tax bill was reported. On yesterday, however, on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] representing a majority of the Ways and Means Committee, the House, by a very large and decided vote, attached to this bill a very stringent and very remarkable section by way of amendment, changing very materially existing laws in regard to distilleries and internal revenue officers. It became, therefore, imperative on the committee of conference to meet the question and dispose of it in some way. The Treasury Department, too, we were informed, desired some additional and very prompt legislation, placing distilleries more completely under the control of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue than they now are, and to enable the Department to enforce more rigidly the collection of the whisky tax and the laws governing the manufacture and sale of whisky. After a very full and free conference it was ascertained that the substitute reported by the committee of conference for the amendment adopted by the House was the very best that could be obtained or agreed upon under existing circumstances. As this substitute is, in my judgment, a very great improvement on the House amendment, and as I do not want to seem to stand in the way of any reasonable measure looking to a more efficient collection of internal taxes, I agreed to the report of the committee of conference embracing this last section.

I was willing, at all events, to report it with the other amendments recommended by us for the consideration of the House. I regard this section, however, as exceptional and experimental, and as an independent proposition I would not vote for it. As the vote, however, on the amendment on yesterday was so decidedly in favor of something more stringent on this subject of the manufacture and sale of whisky, I felt it my duty as a member of this committee of conference to defer so far as I possibly could to what seemed to be the sentiment of the House. In agreeing to this report, therefore, I have endeavored to execute rather what might be called the order of the House, instead of insisting on my own views regarding the section to which I have referred.

Mr. SCHENCK resumed the floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. SCHENCK. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. My question is this: whether under this provision, if distilled spirits shipped from the rural districts, say from Ohio, are sold in New York for less than the tax imposed by law, the distilleries in New York, as well as in the rural districts where the spirits so sold were manufactured, are all liable to be seized and closed?

Mr. SCHENCK. The provision relates to the collection district where for a period of ten days whisky is sold for less than the amount of the tax. When that is the case it is to be considered a reason for closing all the distilleries in the district.

Mr. HOLMAN. The distilleries in the collection district where those sales are made?

Mr. SCHENCK. Yes, that is all.

Mr. HOLMAN. It does not affect the district where the whisky so sold was made?

Mr. SCHENCK. Only the collection district where the sales are made. I have not intended any attack or reflection upon any particular part of the country, nor have I intended to draw any invidious distinction between the cities and the rural districts. This provision is general in its application; it applies to every district, wherever it may be, in which there are distilleries, and where whisky is thus sold.

I might perhaps adopt the idea of an old friend of mine, that the only true way to keep the country pure, so far as the morality and virtue of cities and rural districts are concerned, was to burn down every city as soon as it had attained a population of one hundred thousand and start afresh. But I am not prepared to go that far yet.

Mr. EGGLESTON. Will my colleague [Mr. SCHENCK] allow me to make a single suggestion?

Mr. SCHENCK. Certainly.

Mr. EGGLESTON. I want to have my colleague, who has had this matter under consideration for so long a time, tell the House how these distilleries are to be opened again, after they have been closed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under this provision. And then I want to ask him what is to prevent an evil-disposed person causing the distilleries in a particular district to be closed at any time. For instance, a gentleman owns a distillery in a certain district; the whisky dealers conclude they will stop that distillery, and thereupon they commence selling a little whisky every day and continue to sell for ten days for a less price than the amount of the tax. Under this provision the Commissioner would be required to pounce down upon that distillery and all the other distilleries in the district and close them. Then the whisky speculators would put up the price and make money on their whisky. Now, I want to know what there is to prevent that.

Mr. SCHENCK. If I understand this catechism of my colleague, it is double-barreled. [Laughter.] The first question is how the distilleries shall be started again. Well, it is provided that they shall be closed until the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall permit them to resume operations, and that, of course, depends upon the removal to his satisfaction of the cause. That is specially provided for in this bill.

In the next place, my colleague desires to know how we shall prevent collusion between the whisky dealers to shut up the distillers. My first reply is that this whisky "ring" generally includes distillers, dealers, and all; but if rogues should fall out—if the dealers should go to work against the distillers and the distillers against the dealers, instead of working, as heretofore, into each other's hands—then I think honest men would be more likely to get their rights. But, sir, I do not think a proceeding of the kind described would be very practicable. It is not very easy for one or two persons in any district to control the selling price, the market value, of an article; and if they could do so the worst consequence that could possibly follow would be that the distilleries there would be closed; and I do not think there need be any very great number of tears shed on that account. [Laughter.]

Mr. EGGLESTON. I would like to ask my colleague one other question. How does he reconcile the provisions of this bill with justice, when an honest man, (if there is such a one in the whisky business,) a man manufacturing spirits without violating any law, may have his establishment closed up because a few rascals, for the purpose of speculation, combine together and put down the price of whisky?

Mr. SCHENCK. I will answer the gentleman in this way: it costs, upon an average, thirty cents to produce a gallon of whisky. The tax upon it is two dollars. Under the most favorable circumstances, then, whisky ought to bring about two dollars and thirty cents or more per gallon. Now, sir, when we find in any part of the country distilleries running while whisky is selling around them at less than two dollars a gallon, I would not be afraid to adopt the rule of evidence which met the approval of the House the other day and take this circumstance as proof in itself of the existence of fraud which ought to be stopped. The Senate, though not willing to go so far as that, have gone so far as to say that, if under those circumstances distilleries are being run, it is sufficient to justify the Government in requiring its officers to close up the distilleries until the thing has been investigated. It may be that some innocent, pious distiller [laughter] might be injured by such a proceeding; but that will be a very exceptional case. And my impression is that where there will be one instance of wrong done to an innocent, God-fearing distiller there will be some measure of justice visited upon a dozen rogues.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I would like to ask the gentleman a question with reference to the practical operation of this bill apart from the consideration of the guilt or innocence of the distillers. If a person for any reason desires to do injustice to the distillers in a particular collection district, to make them the victims of his spite, can he not take one barrel of whisky into that district and sell five gallons per day for ten successive days at $1 75 per gallon? And does it not follow under this bill that every distillery in that district must be closed up? If this be so, is it just?

Mr. SCHENCK. I did not expect to elicit this defense of the distillers, especially from that quarter. [Laughter.] But still the gentleman mistakes very much both the language and the spirit of the bill when he puts that construction upon it. It is not the mere fact of a sale of distilled spirits that is to have the effect referred to. The provision in question is to take effect when in any district spirits shall be "selling" (using the participle to indicate the sale as a continuous thing) at a market price below a certain standard. And I have no apprehension that the sale of a gallon, or even of a barrel, would by any proper construction bring the distiller within this law. Besides, it is to be continuous selling.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I ask the gentleman from Ohio whether this language is not liable to the construction I have put on it? Is not that a construction which could be put upon this bill?

Mr. SCHENCK. I think not.

Mr. VAN WYCK. If that construction can be put upon it then it ought to be corrected right here.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not think there is any doubt about it. I do not think any man could so misunderstand it.

There are two other words: if they shall be found selling "directly or indirectly." The reason for that will be manifest to any one who knows how these frauds are conducted. Whisky is selling to-day in Philadelphia at less than a dollar. It has been openly advertised at from ninety to ninety-five cents; and it is advertised to-day, I believe, at less than a dollar, because of the enormous amount of fraud being committed in that city. Well, sir, notwithstanding that, it is not probable there has been a large amount of whisky at any time which upon its face did not appear to be from $2 25, $2 30, and $2 40 per gallon so as to look fair. Why? Because a part of the mode of committing these frauds is to have a false bill of sale; and while they sell directly or indirectly for less than one dollar, they have by indirection furnished whisky on a false bill of sale in order to deceive any one who may inspect the whisky that it has sold for more than the cost and tax.

So far as the market value is concerned, I will remark again to the gentleman that the market price in a locality is not ever fixed by a single sale. What is called the market price is the aggregate of sales which happen at that place.

Mr. HUNTER. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a question.

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. HUNTER. I desire to ask the gentleman whether there is a provision in the bill as now reported to prevent distillers from combining not to sell liquor in the district where it is manufactured, but to take it abroad for sale? Is there anything to prevent that?

Mr. SCHENCK. There is no such provision in this proposition. It is not a general law in regard to the sale of whisky. If they combine to sell it somewhere else at a less price a combination would have to be necessary to complete it with some officer of the Government, and I will show the gentleman what is provided for in the next section.

Mr. HUNTER. I will ask the gentleman another question with his permission.

Mr. SCHENCK. Certainly, when I get through with my answer to the one you have already asked.

It is suggested to me if there were distillers at the place where the sale was to take place under a combination there would be no one so much interested in preventing the combination as the distillers who were imposed upon by the distillers of another district. If we bring about a condition of things in setting distillers to watch distillers and dealers to watch dealers I apprehend there is a great deal gained for the benefit of the Government by such a provision of law.

Mr. HUNTER. The other question is whether there is any provision in reference to whisky manufactured and upon which the tax has been paid?

Mr. SCHENCK. This is not a general whisky law. It is not a law generally in regard to distilled spirits, as the House well understands. If there be whisky with the tax paid or unpaid on the market it will, of course, affect that condition of things this bill is intended to reach.

Gentlemen are very much afraid these distillers, who by law ought to be paying two dollars a gallon on whisky, will have some great wrong done to them. All that we ask is that they shall be held to a rigid application of the law. Sir, whisky is selling at from one dollar to one dollar and a half per gallon, when the tax is two dollars per gallon. Now, how can a distiller, satisfactorily to his own conscience, carry on business when he knows he must pay two dollars a gallon tax and yet sell it for one dollar? I ask how can he carry it on satisfactorily to his own idea of profit? This is a singular defense gentlemen make for the distiller, and I cannot but sympathize with them. It is suggested that, although they may lose by selling whisky at $1 50 a gallon, they make it up by selling a vast quantity. [Laughter.] But that will require a sort of back-handed arithmetic that I am not myself prepared to say would work out any such result.

Now, sir, I said when this subject was up before, as I continue to say—for the information on that subject is full, clear, and satisfactory—that wherever distillers and dealers in distilled spirits are engaged in committing frauds upon the law they are in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred aided by one or more rascals in the revenue department of the Government in doing it. Therefore it was that we put into the amendment as proposed in the House from the Committee of Ways and Means a provision to catch the collectors, assessors, and other officers. That not having been agreed to by the Senate, we have gone to our general bill upon the subject and taken another section out therefrom, which we ask the House to pass in advance, as it was unanimously agreed to by the managers both of the Senate and House, and which will best explain itself by simply being read to the House without argument. We propose to add this amendment as an additional section:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That if any officer or agent appointed and acting under the authority of any revenue law of the United States shall be guilty of a gross neglect in the discharge of any of the duties of his office, or shall conspire or collude with any other person to defraud the United States, or shall make opportunity for any person to defraud the United States, or shall do or omit to do any act with the intent to enable any other person to defraud the United States, or shall make or sign any false certificate or return in any case where he is by law or regulation required to make a certificate or return, or having knowledge or information of the violation of any revenue law by any person, or of fraud committed by any person against the United States, or any revenue law of the United States, shall fail to report in writing such knowledge or information to his next superior officer and to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, he shall, on conviction, be fined not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000, and be imprisoned not less than six months nor more than three years.

I think by that section, which is part of our general bill, and which the managers of the Senate have agreed with the managers of the House to put upon this bill for immediate operation, we have struck at the root of the whole matter—a provision that there shall be heavy fines and imprisonment measured out to any revenue officer of any grade whatever who shall be concerned in any way in aiding, conniving at, or committing any of these frauds upon the revenue. Now, unless gentlemen desire further explanation, I propose to call the previous question.

Mr. HUNTER. I desire to ask the gentleman whether, when the general tax bill is reported, he expects to have this section placed in it, so that the question can be discussed by the House?

Mr. SCHENCK. Unquestionably.

Mr. HUNTER. Or is this the only discussion to be had on the section?

Mr. SCHENCK. I have said again and again, and I repeat now for the satisfaction of my friend from Indiana, [Mr. HUNTER,] that we do not expect it will be possible nor do we think it would be right to attempt to get a long general law on the subject of internal taxation through this House without having a free discussion of its various provisions; and it will be not only the purpose but the desire of the committee, when they bring in this general bill containing this and other sections relating to frauds and every other matter, that there shall be the fullest opportunity for amendment and for discussion.

Mr. KELLEY. I would like to put a question to the gentleman. I would inquire whether it would be practicable for the House, or whether any good result might be obtained from it, to non-concur in that part of the report by which the provision of the Senate imposing a two mill tax on articles hitherto exempt from tax has been accepted by the committee. I would like, if practicable, to have the House non-concur in that amendment of the Senate and concur in the rest.

Mr. SCHENCK. I suppose the gentleman is aware that by parliamentary law this report of the committee of conference will have to be accepted as a whole, or rejected as a whole, and I will say to the gentleman that I have not the slightest idea that the Senate will agree by any managers that they may appoint to any other provision in regard to the two-mills tax than the one we have in this bill. The matter was fully discussed in the committee of conference.

Mr. PIKE. I would inquire whether this two-mills tax is to be in addition to the tax now paid by commission merchants, or whether it is to be a substitute for it?

Mr. SCHENCK. No, sir; it is not an addition. This does not apply to commission merchants. We have a similar provision with regard to commission merchants. Our system of special taxes is this: that a man shall pay ten, twenty, or twenty-five dollars as a special tax imposed upon him for the business he carries on, and then we provide in the case of manufacturers and dealers that, in addition, there shall be a further special tax of two mills on their sales above $5,000.

Mr. PIKE. By the present law commission merchants pay a tax on sales, and my question is whether, in addition to that, they are to pay this two-mills tax?

Mr. SCHENCK. Oh, no; this does not relate to commission merchants. This relates only to manufacturers; there is nothing said about commission merchants. If the gentleman means what I think he does, I will explain that there has been a construction of the law by which, if a commission merchant sells goods for another party, the commission merchant makes a return and is taxed, and the owner of the goods makes a return and is also taxed. By our general law we have provided that there shall be deducted from any tax paid by the owner of the goods that tax which he shall show that his auctioneer or commission merchant has paid on the goods, because we think that the construction of the law which has prevailed was wrong and has amounted to a double tax on the same goods. That we have provided against in our general law.

Mr. SELYE. A few days since the House passed a bill, as I understood, to relieve manufactures from taxation, and there was a general rejoicing all over the country that labor was not to be taxed in this country except on whisky, tobacco, and other luxuries. Now, then, I would like to know why the gentleman consents to bring in a bill at this time to tax them, notwithstanding what he has promulgated and the Committee of Ways and Means have said here over and over again? The country understood that manufacturers were not to be taxed hereafter, and I would like to know how much better off they will be now than they were before?

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to say, in the first place, that the gentleman has entirely misapprehended the position taken by the Committee of Ways and Means. The committee have uniformly said that while they desired to relieve these industrial pursuits, these manufacturers of the country, from the onerous tax of two, three, and five per cent., imposed upon their manufactures, yet they would have to retain the special tax and the tax on sales. The gentleman asks what good it will do to manufacturers. Why, that is a question of arithmetic. Just the difference between five per cent. on the article and two tenths of one per cent., and with the further difference that that two tenths of one per cent. is not imposed on any part of it until the sales get to be above $5,000.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is no disposition on the part of anybody unnecessarily to impose taxes upon the labor of the country, as the gentleman from New York expresses it. Something has to be taxed; taxes must be raised; and, on looking over the whole field, the committee became satisfied, as, I think, the whole country is satisfied, that as far as it is possible to relieve from taxes, the first relief should be extended to those things which are the product of the industry of the country in the shape of its manufactures. In pursuance of that idea they have lifted this onerous burden of a direct tax of heavy percentage off all those articles when thus produced.

But, inasmuch as there must be a revenue raised, we have limited the tax—not taken it away entirely—to a mere special tax in the nature of a license for carrying on the business; not formidable, not large. And then when the business is considerable, the sales amounting to more than $5,000 a year, we put a small tax on the excess of sales over $5,000. That is the whole story.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SCHENCK. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I desire to inquire if the Committee of Ways and Means have considered whether, under the law of nations, it is possible for them to assess upon the conquered enemy an amount of money which would very considerably reduce the amount of the public debt and of the public taxes, whether that question has been before them at all and considered by them?

Mr. SCHENCK. No, Mr. Speaker, we have left all that to the Committee on Reconstruction, and have confined ourselves to the preparation of general provisions of law, weighing upon all alike. If any special revenue, to be derived from the source to which the gentleman refers, is to be obtained, we suppose the provision for that purpose ought rather to come from the Committee on Reconstruction than from our committee.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman certainly is not in earnest.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman cannot think that is a proper subject for the consideration of the Committee on Reconstruction. The gentleman is at the head of the Committee of Ways and Means, and if he is going to pursue the course which other nations have pursued, he will inquire whether a portion of the revenue of this country can be raised from a conquered enemy. If it cannot, then we must submit to the necessity of raising all our revenue from other sources. I asked, in good faith, whether that question had been considered at all by the Committee of Ways and Means, and I received a sneering answer from the chief of that committee, who seems to think that the true system for this country to adopt is that our own loyal people shall bear all the burdens, and the conquered enemy go entirely free.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman says he asked me the question in good faith. I say I answered in equal good faith, and without any sneer at all, that the Committee of Ways and Means have not felt that it devolved upon them to propose any measure for the seizure of the property, either real or personal, of the people in the rebel States, whom, I suppose, the gentleman refers to when he speaks of a conquered enemy. The committee have confined themselves to general legislation, affecting all citizens everywhere, so far as the laws for the raising of revenue are concerned. And I say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] that I think it would be going beyond the objects for which they were appointed, and beyond the duties conferred upon them by your rules, for the Committee of Ways and Means to attempt anything else than what I have indicated.

And I might give another reason for our action in that regard. As we were not a committee to direct the seizure of real or personal property, but only to provide means for levying a tax for purposes of revenue upon such property, we might have found that while the Government was waiting for revenue from that source, we were trying to sue a beggar and catching only a flea.

Mr. BENTON. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SCHENCK. Very well.

Mr. BENTON. I would like to inquire of the gentleman how this provision in relation to closing distilleries can have any effect in preventing fraud, and if it would not be more likely to lead to the illicit manufacture of whisky in those districts where the distilleries have been thus closed?

Mr. SCHENCK. I have already said that one, perhaps the most important, result of the application of that rule, would be to bring out of your bonded warehouses the immense amount of whisky that is now shut up there, and which will not be removed while the article can be supplied from other quarters. In that way the Government will probably be put in possession of many millions of revenue in a very short time.

So far as regards the suggestion that this provision may tend to foster illicit distillation, let me say that a very earnest and I think thorough, at any rate a very protracted, investigation has convinced me, has convinced others, has convinced, perhaps, all the members of the Committee of Ways and Means, that the amount of whisky produced by illicit distillation—although there is plenty of it, comparatively speaking—is not that which appreciably affects the market price of the article. But it is the whisky produced by known distilleries in different parts of the country which are permitted to run, and whose product, by the connivance of rascals in the revenue department, is allowed to be put on the market.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SCHENCK. Certainly.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I desire to inquire if this is the best thing which can be done at this time? My impression is that it will have the effect to transfer the manufacture of distilled spirits from the districts where it is sold to districts where it is not sold; that the unlawful distillation will go on to precisely the same extent as heretofore; that this provision for closing the distilleries in the district where the distilled spirits are sold for less than a certain price will simply cause whisky manufactured in one district without paying the tax to be sold in another.

Mr. SCHENCK. I understand the objection of the gentleman, and I make this answer to it. In the first place, it is not conceivable that in any district where whisky is or may be produced it will not have a price, a market value; and if it be driven from certain districts to others, distilleries being set up there, the moment it has a price, the moment it has a market value by the sales made there, it will become subject to the provisions of this bill.

Let me further say—and this may have escaped the gentleman's thought—that as things are now regulated by law the whisky must have a price, for the tax has to be paid before it can be removed from the distillery warehouse for the purpose of sale or consumption; and, of course, it is not removed from the distillery warehouse until some provision is made for disposing of it. The gentleman will recollect that by the act of 11th January last no whisky can be removed from any warehouse, including a distillery warehouse, for any purpose of consumption or sale without the tax being first paid on it. Hence there must be something equivalent to a market value or price in any place where there may be a distillery and distillery warehouse containing the whisky as it first comes from the still, and upon which the tax must be paid before it can be removed for sale or consumption.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that I have now answered all the inquiries and objections which gentlemen desire to present, and I call the previous question on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BUSINESS DURING IMPEACHMENT TRIAL.

Mr. BOUTWELL. On behalf of the board of managers of the impeachment of the President, I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That after Monday next this House will postpone action upon all matters except questions relating to the impeachment of the President of the United States until the conclusion of the trial now pending before the Senate.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That is right.

Mr. BOUTWELL. This resolution is not offered upon the original suggestion of the managers, nor have they any particular wish in regard to the matter. They have thought it proper, in accordance with the suggestion of many gentlemen, to submit the proposition to the judgment of the House. I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] that although the managers of the impeachment have the right to report at any time, yet, under the usage of the House, that is construed to mean when no other business is pending. There is now pending a question in regard to the reference of the Senate amendment to a bill making certain appropriations for the Indian department, and on that question the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] is entitled to the floor, his remarks having been suspended by the presentation of a conference report, a matter so highly privileged that it can be received even while other business is pending, and while a member is on the floor. The resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts can be received at the present time only by unanimous consent.

Mr. SPALDING. I object to the introduction of the resolution at this time.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR INDIAN DEPARTMENT.

Mr. BLAINE. I merely want to state what the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] proposes to do. A regular appropriation bill, making appropriations for the Indian department, was reported by the Committee on Appropriations, passed by the House, and sent to the Senate. That body has returned the bill with a certain amendment. Now, the gentleman proposes that the bill, as amended, shall be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs instead of the Committee on Appropriations. If it is to be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs I would like the gentleman from Minnesota to tell me when it will come back. The Committee on Appropriations are, by the rules, authorized to report appropriation bills at any time, but the Committee on Indian Affairs have no such privilege; and if this bill, which the gentleman is anxious to get through, should be sent to the latter committee there is no telling when it can be reported, for a single objection can prevent the report being made till the committee shall be regularly called. I hope that, upon such a matter as this, we are not going to reverse what has been the uniform practice of the House from the foundation of the Government. I call the previous question.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly.

Mr. WINDOM. The gentleman has asked me, if this is referred to the Indian Committee, when it can come back again. I presume it can come when the committee is called. I am not anxious this House bill shall pass.

Mr. BLAINE. Are you anxious the Senate bill shall pass?

Mr. WINDOM. There is ample time for the Senate amendment to pass.

Mr. BLAINE. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. WINDOM's amendment was agreed to; and the motion, as amended, was agreed to.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

BUSINESS DURING IMPEACHMENT TRIAL.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I now submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That after Monday next this House will postpone action upon all matters, except questions relating to the impeachment of the President of the United States, until the conclusion of the trial now pending before the Senate.

Mr. PIKE. I make the point that the board of managers have no right, without unanimous consent, to report any resolution which does not relate to impeachment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. But as this resolution changes the order of business it requires under the rules a two-thirds vote.

Mr. NICHOLSON. I would like to inquire whether this resolution is reported from the board of managers collectively?

The SPEAKER. So the Chair understands.

Mr. ROSS. I move that it be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is upon the floor.

Mr. MILLER. Suppose the trial should be delayed and not go on on Monday next?

Mr. BOUTWELL. This order can be revoked by the House at any time.

Mr. SPALDING. Is it not in order for the managers to move to suspend the rules at any time?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. DAWES. There are four unfinished cases from the Committee of Elections that will take up a great deal of time at one time during the session. It has been the fortune of that committee to have its business crowded into the last portion of the session, when the business of the House is such that no full consideration can be given to questions of contested elections. I suggest to the House, therefore, whether it would not be entirely consistent with the dignity of the House, during the trial of the President, to dispose of two or three of those cases from the Committee of Elections?

Mr. PIKE. I ask leave to make a suggestion. After the trial begins we may still have a morning hour for three mornings during the week, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, for general business. Business of importance has accumulated in the committees, and they ought to have an opportunity to report it. It would be well, therefore, to have a morning hour for that purpose. I am quite sure the House would come here and attend to that business. If this resolution passes it will leave the House without a quorum. Members will either go home or attend to anything else than the business of Congress.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I only want to say that I believe if we hold sessions at all during the time the impeachment trial is going on all matters which ought to be defeated will be passed, and all matters which ought to pass will be defeated. There will be but few members here, and they will have an interest in some particular project. I am opposed to any session unless it is understood all the members shall be present. We know how wrong measures have succeeded in passing this House. They always come in when the House is thin, just as we are adjourning, or something of that kind, and when the attention of but few members is called to them. I am sure there will be more of this thing in these morning sessions than at any other time.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I have no interest in this matter. I believe it expresses the opinion of the managers. I understand the Chair to say it will require a two-thirds vote.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I desire to inquire whether the managers have authorized this?

Mr. BOUTWELL. There was a consultation on the part of the majority of the managers, to whom I submitted the resolution at the request of several members.

Mr. PIKE. I hope the gentleman will withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. If there is any question as to whether this resolution was agreed to by the managers the Chair must put the question of reception to the House.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I am not disposed to insist on this resolution. It was prepared and submitted to the majority of the managers, and they desired I should report it to the House for action; but rather than occupy the equivocal position indicated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] I will withdraw it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I renew it.

Mr. DAWES. I raise the question of order, that none but the managers can present the resolution at this time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR INDIAN DEPARTMENT.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate to the Indian appropriation bill was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

I now move that the House adjourn. I will state that very many gentlemen about me ask in relation to the business of the House to-morrow.

Mr. WINDOM. I object to the gentleman's speaking after making a motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the motion to reconsider will probably not come up till Tuesday or some other day next week.

Mr. BANKS. I desire to know if there will be a session for business to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. There will be.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. What will be the first business to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. The first business will be the consideration of private bills in the morning hour. If that order should be set aside, then the motion to reconsider by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] will come up; afterward the bill for the admission of Alabama.

Mr. SPALDING. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. That is the motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at four o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rules, and referred to the appropriate committees:

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 480) in relation to the pay of grand and petit jurors in the District of Columbia, and the bill (H. R. No. 566) to incorporate the Grunth-Verein of Washington, District of Columbia, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. COLE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Benjamin Tilley, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

CAPTURED AND ABANDONED PROPERTY.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I send to the Chair a report from a conference committee, which I ask to have read.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the joint resolution (H. R. No. 19) directing that certain moneys now in the hands of the United States Treasurer, as special agent of the Treasury Department, be covered by warrant into the United States Treasury, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows, namely:

That the House of Representatives recede from their amendment to the Senate amendments proposing to strike out section three of said Senate amendments, and agree to said section with the following amendments, to wit:

1. Strike out the words "one hundred" in the second and third lines of said section and insert in lieu thereof the words "seventy-five."
2. Add at the end of said section the words: "and for prosecuting suits in the United States for the recovery of such property and for providing for the defense of the United States against suits for or in respect to such property in the Court of Claims."

And that the Senate agree thereto.

GEORGE F. EDMUNDS,

W. P. FESSENDEN,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

C. C. WASHBURN,

G. W. SCOFIELD,

DEMAS BARNES,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. JOHNSON. I inquire of the honorable member what the change is.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The change made reduces the appropriation from $100,000 to $75,000, and provides not merely for defending suits that are pending against the Secretary, but for prosecuting in this country some that the committee, from communication with the Secretary, thought it was necessary to the public interests should be prosecuted.

The report was concurred in.

BUOYS OF NEW YORK HARBOR.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, requested to communicate to the Senate the report of Commodore Case, United States light-house inspector, third district, dated the 13th of February, 1868, on the buoys of the harbor of New York.

MILITARY DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I offer a resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate whether he has established, or ordered the establishment of, any new military department since the 1st day of August, 1867; and, if so, what department or departments, and under what statute or other authority.

Mr. DAVIS. If that resolution leads to no debate I have no objection to its being considered; but if it is to be debated I must object.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir; no debate.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

UNITED STATES BONDS.

Mr. DAVIS. I submit the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury report to the Senate the amount outstanding of each class of the bonds of the United States, with the rate of interest which they bear; and what each class of said bonds were worth in gold at the times they respectively bear date.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that resolution had better lie over. It would be impossible to answer it. The information the Senator wants is contained in printed reports so far as it can be given. How is it possible to furnish all the information he asks for? I object to the resolution. Let it lie over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it goes over under the rule.

TAX ON MANUFACTURES.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now move that the Senate proceed to consider the report of the committee of conference on what is known as the manufactures bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 900) to exempt certain manufactures from internal tax.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to make a statement of the point involved, so that the Senate may understand precisely what the report is. There is no controversy between the two Houses as to any of the amendments made by the Senate to the bill, because they have all been concurred in substantially as the Senate passed them. The modifications only relate to matters to carry into execution and to make more clear and definite the amendments of the Senate.

But the House of Representatives attached an amendment relating to whisky to one of the Senate amendments. There was nothing in the bill in relation to whisky, and consequently thus introduced the subject in the nature of an amendment to an amendment. Ordinarily, I should regard this as a fatal objection to the proposition, and we should have resisted its passage, because it is contrary to the usual course of legislation and an improper example. The House admitted that that was wrong usually, but they insisted that the circumstances justified the addition of the amendment; that they were justified in taking advantage of the pendency of a bill relating to the internal revenue to pass a measure demanded by the Secretary of the Treasury and by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to stop an immediate injury to the public service. They based it on the exceptional condition of affairs.

The amendment, as it was passed by the House of Representatives, was totally inadmissible, according to the opinion of the Senate conferees. It contained three or four propositions that I would not agree to, and none of us, I think, would agree to. One is that the mere selling of whisky below two dollars a gallon in any district should be prima facie evidence upon which a distiller might be convicted of fraud and sent to the penitentiary. Another clause is that upon the selling of whisky in the market for ten days consecutively in any district below the tax the collector and assessor of that district and the district from which it came should be suddenly suspended without any further inquiry—a proposition that we would not at all consent to. We therefore opposed the proposition of the House. Then they submitted to us whether, under the peculiar circumstances by which we were surrounded, it was not important to adopt some measure that would at once stop the distillation of spirits.

It was shown to us that although the price of spirits in the city of Philadelphia was now about one dollar a gallon, tax paid, and in the city of New York a little over a dollar a gallon, and all through the country was far less than the tax, yet distilleries were going on in the large cities in great numbers, going on at a time when the product of their distillation would have to pay a tax to the Government of two dollars, while its market value was a little over one dollar, and it was palpable that this was a case of fraud, and that no distillery could thus be continued unless the expectation was to sell the product of the distillation in fraud of the law. The question was whether we were entirely powerless to check this. Under the bill we passed sometime since prohibiting the exportation or redistillation of spirits from bonded warehouses it is impossible for the whisky "ring" or those persons who are defrauding in whisky to get whisky out of bonded warehouses. Heretofore most of the frauds have been in getting the whisky out of bonded warehouses, and in that way evading the law; but now that door to fraud is at least partially closed. There are something like twenty million gallons of whisky in bonded warehouse, and it is probably as safe there as it can be anywhere. At any rate the frauds in getting it out of the warehouses have in a measure stopped. The result has been that the distilleries are started again with a view to get hold of whisky before it goes into bonded warehouse; and it is now being manufactured in New York, Philadelphia, and most of the great cities to a large extent. Under these circumstances we agreed as an exceptional matter to the two last sections attached to this bill. If Senators will look at them, as they are now printed before them, they will see precisely the extent of them. I will read them. The fifth section provides:

That every person who shall engage in or carry on the business of a distiller with intent to defraud the United States of the tax on the spirits distilled by him, or any part thereof, shall forfeit the distillery and distilling apparatus used by him, and all distilled spirits and all raw materials for the production of distilled spirits, found in the distillery and on the distillery premises, and shall, on conviction, be fined not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, and be imprisoned not less than six months nor more than three years.

There is certainly no objection to that. To convict a man you must prove the intent. The next clause is the one to which objection might be made ordinarily:

If it shall at any time come to the knowledge of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that distilled spirits are selling, directly or indirectly, in any collection district at a market price less than the tax on such spirits, he shall forthwith institute a strict examination into the causes of such reduced sales, and into the business and conduct of all the revenue officers in the district in which such sales are being made, and in the district in which such spirits have been manufactured; and if such sales below the amount of the tax shall have been continued or shall hereafter be continued in any collection district for a period of ten days, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall forthwith cause every distillery in which the business of distilling is carried on in the district to be seized and closed; and after such seizure no such distillery shall be permitted to continue or resume business, either under bond or any other pretext or arrangement, until relieved by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue from such seizure.

The whole legal effect of this provision is that where a distillery is being carried on under circumstances that plainly and palpably involve a case of fraud the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall stop distilling in that district until a different state of facts occurs. I do not see that there is anything very harsh in that. It was suggested here last night that perhaps interested parties might run whisky into a district with a view to keep the market price for ten days below the tax, and thus stop a distillery. It would be very easy to stop a distillery for a few days, but no such action is likely to arise. At any rate, if this results in stopping every distillery in the United States until the new machinery which Congress proposes to provide shall take effect with a view to collect the tax, no great harm will be done. No harm will be done now by stopping any distillery. The season of the year has arrived or nearly arrived when the distilleries should properly stop in the ordinary course of their business. If the effect of this law should be to stop, on the passage of the act, every distillery in the United States, no harm would be done; we should still have in bond an ample stock of whisky to make everybody drunk for one hundred days, and by the time the new machinery takes effect we shall probably be able to collect a portion of the tax. The present state of things is that whisky is being made and no tax is being collected.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HOWE. I think the theory upon which this section is framed is a correct one, but the conclusion to which it comes seems to me very strange. The section is framed on the theory that the selling of whisky below the tax demanded by the Government is evidence of fraudulent dealing. The only consequence which the section imposes on fraudulent dealings, thus conclusively proved, is that everybody in the district, whether engaged in those sales or not, is stopped from manufacturing whisky; so that the penalty falls upon the just and the unjust alike, and the penalty is nothing more than to just stop distilling liquors; and the section does not allow that penalty to be imposed until they have looked on and seen the sales going on for ten days. Now, I ask the Senator if this section is not likely to work a good deal more mischief than good, so constructed?

Mr. SHERMAN. The only effect it can have is to stop distilling, and that, I think, is not a mischief, but a good. The objection of the Senator from Wisconsin is that the section is not strong enough, not harsh enough; but that was not the objection we feared to encounter in the Senate, and therefore we made it what we thought would answer a good purpose, and yet not so as to violate the rules of law and rules of evidence. But, sir, I will go on with my statement of what these sections provide.

The next section is nothing but a criminal provision touching certain defined offenses by officers of the revenue service. I do not think there is anything remarkable in that, but it adds a little to the penalties contained in the present law. The law now does not provide penalties for some of the offenses named there, and this defines them very clearly and punishes them by imprisonment. It extends to all revenue officers. The House bill, as it was originally framed, required at once the suspension of all the officers on a given state of facts over which they might have no control.

So far as the actual disagreeing votes between the two Houses are concerned, I believe they have been reconciled substantially upon a basis satisfactory to the Senate.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, last evening, on a casual reading of this report, I made an inquiry as to what the scope of it was, and I was not satisfied with the answer. The same answer seems to be made this morning by the chairman of the committee. I think that the theory of this legislation rests entirely on an unsatisfactory reason. The penalties attached to a breach of the law with regard to distillation are in the shape of punishments for criminal offenses; and they rest on the idea that the distiller has been guilty of a criminal offense, and hence the penalties attached. Now, sir, I believe the presumption of law always has been, and always will be, that a man is to be considered innocent until he is proved guilty. That has been the theory of our law, and I hope it will continue to be. But here, sir, is a provision that assumes prima facie the guilt of all the men engaged in a certain business in the same district. To that I object entirely. I suppose that men may be engaged legitimately in the business of distilling as well as in other business, and a man who pursues that business legitimately should not be subject to seizure and the results consequent on a seizure of this kind for the guilt of another.

Let me illustrate. Probably there is very little whisky sold, comparatively, in the district where it is manufactured. Suppose, for instance, that I am a distiller in the city of New York; the Government has put its meters upon my distilling apparatus, and it has the eyes of its public officers on my distillery day and night. I am paying honestly two dollars a gallon tax on every gallon I manufacture. From the city of Cleveland one hundred or one thousand gallons of whisky are run into the eighth district of New York, if that is the district in which I am distilling, and sold for $1.80 a gallon. Those sales continue for the term of ten days. I do not know it. I am not offering any of the article that I manufacture for sale. I am carrying on business upon my capital, not forced to sell, not desiring to sell, and with the approbation and the indorsement and the certificate of the Government officers that my business is legitimately conducted; but for the crime and offense of this foreigner who has forced his goods into my district, and is selling them unknown to me for a period of ten days of time, I am to be presumed to be guilty, and to be subject to have my establishment seized and held under that seizure, until the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is entirely satisfied that my business is correct. Who is to prove that?

Sir, I repeat, I am presumed to be in the legitimate pursuit of my business until those whose duty it is to watch shall be able to prove to the contrary, and I should be exempt from seizure and its consequences until that is shown. I submit that it would be a high-handed outrage, and entirely changing every principle by which trade has heretofore been governed, to allow the fraud of one man to rest with its stigma upon me and its financial consequences upon my business. Distilling is just as legitimate a business pursuit, when carried on in accordance with law, as the manufacture of leather. It is a known fact that in the manufacture of leather, a process that used to take months and years to do, producing at the end a very superior article, is supplanted now by chemical processes that make leather the same day the bullock is butchered. That leather, of course, cannot be as good as that produced in the old way, but is that a reason why a man who is pursuing that business legitimately should be seized and stopped?

I think that the whole series of our laws in regard to distilleries have rested upon this hypothesis, which I believe to be wrong, that every man who pursues the business of distilling is a rascal prima facie. There are some people who believe that; I do not. And my friend from Ohio will find as to the consumption of this article that it is not alone used to gratify the appetites of men, but to minister to their necessities in a thousand ways that I shall not take time to describe, which make its manufacture as legitimate a business as any other. To carry it on to any considerable extent requires a large outlay of means. There are distilleries in the cities of Philadelphia and New York in which two or three hundred thousand dollars do not cover the cost necessarily incurred to enable them to commence to manufacture. That property belongs to those who own it, and, on the theory of our law, is exempt from any interference by any authority until the fact affirmatively appears that the owner has broken some law of the country and thus incurred a forfeiture and become subject to a penalty. I insist upon it that it is not fair to change the onus of proof in this respect. Here a man's establishment is seized without any pretense of knowledge that he is guilty. It rests upon the dishonesty of another man with whom he is not connected, while he is as honest in his business as any man can be. Now, if I am engaged in this business, I am presumed by this provision to be guilty of a fraud, and the strong arm of the law and edict of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shut up my place and destroy my business. What is the consequence? Ruin, utter ruin, before the Commissioner of Internal Revenue will be able to reach my case, as they tell me in all these Departments, "in the ordinary course of business." That means interminably; there is no telling the time when this Commissioner, industrious as he is, will be able to reach a conclusion whether I am guilty or not.

In addition to that I am subjected to the scrutiny of these public officials. Make your law upon them as stringent as you please, but I deny the right of Congress to stop me in a legitimate business that I am pursuing, a business recognized by the laws of the country, until they can show that I have worked a forfeiture of my right to pursue it. Such a law would not stand the scrutiny of our legal tribunals for one minute. It is at war with the policy of trade entirely, and the whole theory of our legislation in regard to the whisky trade puts it under a system of espionage that makes every man who pursues it hang his head as he walks the street.

Now, Mr. President, it seems to me that this committee of conference, with due respect to them, have attempted to do a thing here that was entirely foreign from the bill upon which they went out to confer.

Mr. SHERMAN. I beg to inform my friend that this very amendment was referred to the committee of conference.

Mr. NYE. By whom?

Mr. SHERMAN. By the Senate and House of Representatives. It was put on in the House after debate, came to us here as an amendment to our amendments. I never would myself allow any new matter to be reported from a conference committee. I never have, and never will consent to it. But the amendment came to us from the House of Representatives, and was sent by the House and Senate to the committee.

Mr. NYE. The Senate did not concur in the action of the House.

Mr. SHERMAN. The committee have modified it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask my friend from Ohio whether the fact is not that it came here as new matter from the House of Representatives?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It was never discussed in the Senate; but a motion was made, which was agreed to, that we appoint a committee of conference without its being made known to the Senate that such an amendment had been incorporated in the House. So that, instead of its being discussed here in the first place and then referred to a committee of conference, the committee took it up without the knowledge of the Senate that there was any such thing referred to them. Although it has been done before, and I do not wish to impute anything to anybody, for I do not feel that any one ought to be blamed for it, yet the effect of it is that the Senate does not come to the knowledge and discussion of very important amendments. I think it is better in such cases, when new matter entirely is put on a bill in this way, instead of referring it at once to a committee of conference, to have it read to the Senate and discussed, so that we may know what we are referring to the committee of conference before such a reference is made. That was not done in this case.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am aware that the Senate did not know what the amendment was when the matter was referred to the committee of conference, because the amendment was not read to the Senate, and had not been printed; but it was referred. The Senator from Maine well knows, because he and I have always acted together on these matters, that we have never allowed, except for special reasons, clear and definite, the House of Representatives to introduce new matter in the third stage of a bill in the nature of an amendment to an amendment; and I say now I would not have allowed this (nor did we allow the amendment as they passed it) unless for strong and cogent reasons. Therefore, I do not urge any Senator, unless his mind is clear on the subject, to vote for this report of the committee of conference.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee whether it was the intention of this bill to close up every distillery in the country as soon as the bill passes? I understand that it will have that effect. The bill says:

And if such sales below the amount of the tax shall have been continued or shall hereafter be continued in any collection district for a period of ten days the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall forthwith cause every distillery in which the business of distilling is carried on in the district to be seized and closed.

I suppose the fact is that in every collection district in the United States whisky, for ten days, has been selling for less than the tax. If that is the purpose of the bill would it not be better for us directly to pass a law closing the distilleries?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt this measure would enable the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to close every distillery in the great cities of the United States, but not in the country districts, because in the country, and especially at the smaller distilleries, the price of whisky is higher than the tax, especially certain classes of whisky, such as old Bourbon and others, that now command there and everywhere in the market a higher price—two and a half or three dollars. This proposition would enable the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to close every distillery now running in the cities. I avow that. Its purpose and object and design is to enable him to do that in order to stop, if possible, these frauds.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not know that I object to it. I only want to understand it.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, it seems to me that this bill as it now stands has two objects in view: first, to stop the collection of any revenue from whisky; and next, to fill up the penitentiaries with Government officials. I do not know but that, as suggested by my friend in front of me, [Mr. Howe,] the last would be a worthy object; but, sir, the result of it is going to be to stop all revenue whatever derived from this distillation.

Mr. SHERMAN. We only get three quarters of a million a month now.

Mr. NYE. Well, sir, if it is not collected the fault does not lie in this body. If this Congress would stop legislating upon this subject with one single enactment to tax the distilleries of this country upon their capacity, and get rid of this horde of Government officials, it would collect millions where it now collects thousands, and it would have the satisfaction of knowing that it was not corrupting all of its own officials at least.

Now, Mr. President, I say that the powers conferred by this section are dangerous in every aspect in which they are viewed, and at war with the whole theory and policy of trade. If Congress assumes to establish this system of espionage upon this article of distilled spirits it will be a precedent for doing it upon all the pursuits of business in this country; and I desire here to enter my protest against it. The business men of this country should not have it understood, and Congress should not give them the power to have it so understood, that they are pursued by a series of detectives as though they were assumed to be criminals before they started in their business. It is derogatory to us as a nation; and if the theory is adopted here as a principle we shall stand alone in the catalogue of nations pursuing great and varied businesses as having first adopted that system of espial. Sir, the remedy—and I beg to call the attention of the chairman of this conference committee to the fact—lies in another direction; and I submit, whether upon this bill it was necessary to have any such provision. I understand that a bill is now in course of preparation covering this whole subject, a review of the whole system of laws now extant in regard to it; and I suggest that it would be more likely to be harmonious as a whole if we should leave off this section from this bill, and let us discuss thoroughly what law is best to enable the country to collect this revenue.

I do not desire to take up the time of the Senate on this question. I have no friend in the world that I know of that runs a distillery. I never saw one in my life, though I have seen some of the commodities after they were run out. [Laughter.] I do not know whether they were manufactured in the district where I purchased or not; and I do not suppose it is in the power of the Senator from Ohio to determine whether what he drinks was manufactured in the district in which he purchased it or not, or what it costs all the time. If you establish this principle you at once sap the very foundation upon which trade is carried on. It is sufficient for me, as I have said, to be understood as entering my protest against putting it in the power of any man on earth to stop me or my friend or any citizen of this nation pursuing a legitimate business, unless the evidence exists that he himself is involved in some fraud or crime for which he forfeits this right to pursue it. I have the highest regard for the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, but I would as soon authorize him to put a torch to my distillery and burn it as I would authorize him to hold it until in due course of business he reaches an examination of my case, one among a million. Sir, this will not do. It is oppressive in its character, unjust in its operation, however justly administered, and it strikes a blow at the whole system of trade which we have rested upon heretofore.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I am quite in favor of making very stringent laws in relation to these distillers. It must be known to every one that there could not have been an honest distiller of common ordinary whisky in the United States for the last year. The distillers of the superior qualities alluded to by the chairman of the Committee on Finance, commonly called Bourbon or old rye, in some parts of the country, for which they obtain three and four dollars a gallon, unquestionably may be honest men. But the facts are that not one fourth, probably not one eighth of the amount distilled in the country pays the tax. Undoubtedly these distillers pay much more than the amount the Government receives to their accomplices who aid and assist them to defraud the Treasury. It is not, therefore, very wide of the mark to suppose that the men who are now remaining in the business are guilty of fraud almost universally. But I am disposed to believe that this section is altogether too stringent, and I will suggest an amendment that will cure, in part at least, some of its objectionable stringency.

Mr. SUMNER, Mr. SHERMAN, and others. The report of a conference committee cannot be amended.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I merely suggest it for the consideration of any committee that may be appointed if the report should not be agreed to. On page 4, section five, line twenty-two, I suggest that the words "shall forthwith cause" be stricken out, and the words "may, at his discretion, cause any or;" so that it will read:

And if such sales below the amount of the tax shall have been continued, or shall hereafter be continued in any collection district for a period of ten days, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may, at his discretion, cause any or every distillery in which the business of distilling is carried on in the district, to be seized and closed.

Under the provision as it now stands, it is compulsory on the part of the Commissioner to close up all the distilleries, whether there has been any fraud or not. Mr. President, at the western distilleries they buy up large droves of cattle; they are feeding them upon the refuse of the distilleries; and it may be more for the interest of the distiller to lose something on his whisky than to lose on his fatted cattle. There must be a great loss if the distillery is stopped at once. His cattle must be fed, and they must be fed from the grain if they are not fed from the refuse of the distilleries. Therefore I think this provision would work very great hardship, and it might be upon honest men, men who were disposed to keep their distilled spirits until they could sell them at a price about equal to the tax. The amendment I propose would remedy that in some degree. It would leave it optional with the Commissioner to do or not to do it as he saw fit, after investigation.

Mr. SHERMAN. My friend from Vermont will allow me to interrupt him just to say that it is not worth while to have a committee of conference on that point, for we considered it fully. The answer is conclusive in my opinion: this is intended to make a sharp, certain, and effective remedy; the proposition of the Senator from Vermont would raise the case as to every distillery, and as to the fraud and intent of every distiller, to be decided by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and would throw upon him a burden of work which it would be utterly impossible for him to act upon. This assumes the fact that the running of a distillery when the price is below the tax is evidence of fraud.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Then, with the interpretation the chairman of the Committee on Finance gives to it, I think it is even more objectionable, because it will close up every distillery to-morrow, or the moment the law is passed, without any notice whatever. I should consider that rather a hardship, something that we have hardly ever done in any business.

While I am on the floor, I desire to suggest an amendment on page 3, section four, which I should be in favor of. It will be seen that the tax imposed here is two dollars on each $1,000 of sales of all manufacturers where their sales exceed $5,000. It strikes me that by this provision we are to ring in a large number of manufacturers who have not heretofore paid much if any tax. It will include shoemakers, broom-makers, woodenware manufacturers who are all over the country, and a great number of that kind, and will entail a pretty heavy business upon the Department to follow them all up. I think it would be far better to increase the rate of taxation a little and to enlarge the amount of exemption; place it, say, above ten thousand dollars, and, if you please, increase the rate something higher, say five dollars on the $1,000, equal to one half of one per cent. I think that would not be objected to by the manufacturers. If they are to pay any tax at all on sales, which I consider rather an objectionable tax any way, I see no reason why we may not make it one half of one per cent., and thereby obtain a very considerable revenue. A tax merely of two dollars on $1,000 will only reach a very inconsiderable amount of revenue. I would prefer to exempt small and inconsiderable manufacturers and to tax the others more.

Mr. MORTON obtained the floor.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If my friend will allow me, I want to ask an explanation of the second section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) It becomes the duty of the Chair at this hour to call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be laid aside informally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It can be laid aside informally, if there be no objection.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I object, unless my colleague wishes to address the Senate now. I do not think there need be any haste to pass any such bill as this is proposed to be.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let us have a vote on it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] is entitled to the floor, if the Senate are to proceed on the bill that has been before the Senate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then I withdraw the objection until he makes his argument.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The naval appropriation bill will be laid aside by unanimous consent, and the Senator from Indiana is entitled to the floor on the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will not interrupt the Senator.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I object to the fifth section of this conference report for two reasons: first, because the first part of the section, which makes a forfeiture of the distillery and its material, and which provides for punishing the distiller, is unnecessary, there being penalties already prescribed in various forms that cover the whole ground. Then I object to the concluding part of the section because I think it is unreasonable, and would be unjust in its operation, and because it would fail to accomplish anything.

Now, sir, I understand—I have not counted them, though I examined the law some time ago—that there are over one hundred penalties, crimes, and misdemeanors already created by law for frauds upon the revenue in connection with whisky. The trouble is not that there are not penalties enough, but that the law has not been enforced. We multiply penalties, but we fail to enforce any of them. On the 6th of January last I made an inquiry at the internal revenue department, and from all that I could learn at that time there had been less than one dozen persons convicted and imprisoned for frauds upon the revenue in connection with whisky, and I could not find more than half a dozen well authenticated cases. Notwithstanding the many thousand frauds that have been committed, the hundreds and thousands of seizures that have been made up to this time, I believe not one dozen persons have been convicted and sentenced to imprisonment or to infamous punishment for these crimes; and until something is done to remove this miserable failure in the administration of the law it is idle to talk about collecting the whisky tax. You may multiply penalties, you may adopt all the safeguards that you can; but until you make it a matter of personal danger to a man to commit a fraud upon the internal revenue in this respect you will not be able to collect this tax.

As the administration of the law stands there is no personal danger in committing a fraud upon the revenue in regard to the collection of the tax upon whisky. The only penalty of detection is a compromise—a compromise in which the criminal escapes all personal punishment, and in which he escapes, as a general thing, by paying far less than what he ought honestly to pay under the law; so that there is an absolute advantage in being detected and compromising. The men who are guilty of these frauds care nothing about the name of it; the publicity of it has no terrors for them. They are willing to be detected as long as there is no personal danger connected with it, no danger of imprisonment or of the penitentiary. If it is a mere confession of judgment in a civil action in the circuit court of the United States, or if it is a mere compromise to be made here with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, by which they pay a certain sum of money, they care nothing about that. If you want to stop the whisky frauds you must make it a cause of personal danger to the man that commits them; and I undertake to say that the conviction and punishment of fifty of these scoundrels, by incarcerating them in the penitentiary, would do more than all that you have done or can do to enforce the collection of this tax. If these men, who care nothing about the publicity of detection, who care nothing about the name of the thing, were to understand that they are incurring direct and imminent danger of going to the penitentiary, they would hesitate; but so long as they can settle the matter by confessing a judgment under a compromise with the district attorney of the United States, or under a compromise made here, these things will go on.

Why, sir, how many thousand frauds have been committed, how many thousand detections have taken place, and yet less than a dozen men have been imprisoned for any of these things. Compromises are made every day here and all over the country. Indictments have been found by the hundred; but where have they been tried? Why have they not been tried? Because, as a general thing, they are settled in some way. The criminal will not compromise civilly and confess a judgment and pay a portion of that which he ought to pay while the criminal prosecution hangs over him. The compromise of the case criminally is always a part of the compromise of the case civilly; and, therefore, if you would begin at the very root of this evil, begin by taking away from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, the Secretary of the Treasury, all subordinate officers, and especially from district attorneys, the power to compromise these cases. Let there be a trial wherever there is an indictment found, and put it out of the power of the district attorney or of a revenue officer to settle these criminal prosecutions. Sir, need we be astonished that this Government is defrauded out of forty or fifty million dollars of revenue every year when we understand that there is no personal danger attending the commission of these frauds?

The remedy is simple; it lies right on the surface. Take away the power to compromise these cases; require the criminal prosecutions to go forward. If there is no sufficient inducement now to the officers of the law to prosecute the cases criminally give them larger fees. Why, sir, how does the matter stand? If a man is indicted for a punishable offense in a whisky fraud the prosecuting attorney will get fifty dollars if he is convicted; but if he will settle and confess judgment in a civil action on the bond or in any other way for $10,000, $20,000, or $50,000, the prosecuting attorney will get two per cent. on the amount. You thus place temptation in the way of the officers. You tempt them not to do their duty. You place temptation all around them; and what has been the result? Less than a dozen convictions and sentences to imprisonment as yet. You talk about establishing spirit meters, and you make provisions this way and that way; but until you make it a matter of personal danger by imprisonment to the man that commits these frauds you will never stop them.

Now, Mr. President, look at the provisions of this bill. It provides that if liquor shall be sold in any district for more than ten days below the amount of the tax, then the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is required peremptorily—not in his discretion, but peremptorily—to seize every distillery in that district. What is the effect of this? We all know it would be unjust to the honest men, if there are any there. The effect of it is simply to make more compromises. Here is the city of New York, if you please, where it is said there are one hundred and fourteen distilleries. Whisky is sold below the tax there; the one hundred and fourteen distilleries are stopped, the honest alike with the dishonest, and the distillers all rush pell-mell to Washington. They all say they are innocent, and they complain loudly that it is a great hardship that they shall be stopped because somebody is selling whisky at less than two dollars a gallon. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue would feel that it was a great hardship. He would recognize the injustice of the law; and in this way there would be more compromises. The whole thing is a continuous compromise; and the very evil that we complain of would be vastly increased by the proposition we now have before us. While there have been great frauds committed upon the Government, and will continue to be, let the Government itself not be unjust. Some there are who pay taxes. Shall they be suspended alike with the guilty? Why, sir, there would be a universal cry against the justice of the law on that subject. It has been said it would have the effect to suspend, perhaps, every distiller in the United States for a short time; and here they will come rushing for a compromise, each man proclaiming his innocence. A, B, C, and D will get liberty to go on; and in this general rush and this vast multitude the guilty will get permission to go on alike with the innocent.

Sir, I cannot conceive of a provision better calculated to defeat the very purpose we desire to attain than the one that is now under consideration. Let me call the attention of the chairman of the committee to this provision:

If it shall at any time come to the knowledge of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that distilled spirits are selling, directly or indirectly, in any collection district, at a market price less than the tax on such spirits, he shall forthwith institute a strict examination into the causes of such reduced sales and into the business and conduct of all the revenue officers in the district in which such sales are being made and in the district in which such spirits have been manufactured.

Do we not all know that that will be a mere nullity? What will that "strict examination" be made by Commissioner Rollins amount to in New York or in the Peoria district in regard to the conduct of revenue officers or the conduct of distillers as is provided for in that section? It will amount to nothing. That part of your law will be a mere nullity.

But when you come down to the other part of the same section, where you require him positively and peremptorily to suspend the distilleries in case of sales of whisky made for more than ten days under the price of two dollars, what is the result? It falls upon the just as well as it does upon the unjust, and, what is more, it results simply in more compromises, and the compromise business goes on.

Mr. President, I do not wish to be understood in talking about this compromise business as imputing corruption to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue or to the Secretary of the Treasury. I do not. They are far away from the scene of action. They only hear one side. They are called upon from day to day to take action, and they do, and these compromises are made from day to day; and while probably they are acting in the very best faith on their part, yet the guilty are escaping; the criminal punishment is waived; the law is not administered, and the Government is defrauded almost out of its entire revenue.

Sir, let us provide for enforcing the penalties already existing in the law, and not create more of them. If, as I said before, one hundred of these men could be tried and convicted it would virtually stop these frauds, and nothing but that will do it. You cannot disgrace these men by detection. You cannot disgrace them by exposure. They care nothing about that. But they have just as much objection to going to the penitentiary as anybody else; and nothing but the fear of that will prevent the commission of these frauds. Therefore, adopt legislation by which the compromise of these transactions will be taken away and the law will be required to be enforced.

On the 6th of January last I introduced a joint resolution on this subject, which was referred to the Finance Committee, of which I believe the committee did not take any notice. I will read the preamble to that resolution as containing all the argument which I wish to make on this subject:

"Whereas it is believed that not more than a dozen persons have been convicted and punished by imprisonment for the perpetration of the many thousand frauds that have been committed upon the internal revenue in the collection of the tax upon whisky, and that criminal prosecutions have in some way been abandoned, compromised, or suffered to fail; and whereas this policy has relieved the perpetrators of these frauds from criminal responsibility and personal danger, and has offered a premium for swindling the Government, by making a compromise the only penalty for detection in frauds, in which the criminal generally gets off by the payment of far less than the amount of tax he honestly owes the Government, whereby it is made cheaper to be detected and to compromise than honestly to pay the tax"—

And I say, as the matter now stands, that it is cheaper for these distillers all over the land to be detected and to compromise than it is to pay the tax. If they can succeed in their fraud of course it is all clear profit. If they can make a thousand barrels of whisky and sell them without paying the tax it is all clear gain; but if they are detected they get off by a compromise that is much cheaper than to pay the tax on the thousand barrels:

"And whereas the practice of this policy affords a reasonable explanation for the general prevalence of successful fraud and the loss of more than two thirds of the revenue which should be collected from the tax on whisky: Therefore,

Resolved, &c., That from and after the passage of this joint resolution neither the Secretary of the Treasury, Commissioner of Internal Revenue, collectors of internal revenue, district attorneys, or any other judicial or Treasury officer or agent, shall have power to compromise or arrange any criminal proceeding or prosecution against any person for frauds committed upon the revenue: and that it shall be the duty of all such officers and agents to prosecute diligently and bring to punishment all offenders of that class without reference to any compromise that may be made in regard to damages or forfeited property."

If there shall be compromises made in regard to the matter civilly as to damages or to forfeited property, still provide that the criminal prosecution shall go forward; and when you provide that you cut off the civil compromise, because these men will never compromise civilly except on the understanding that they are to escape criminally. I have for some time, with all the attention that I have been able to give to the subject, been satisfied that the root of the great evil, the chief cause, was the utter failure to administer the law criminally, the utter absence of all personal danger in the commission of these immense frauds. If a man swindles this Government by forging a ten-dollar Treasury note he goes to the penitentiary, but he may swindle this Government out of $100,000 in a whisky fraud and it can be compromised, and he goes acquitted, except, perhaps, by confessing a judgment civilly, or by paying a certain amount that may be agreed upon between him and the officers of the law. So far as this provision is concerned in this bill I regard it as unjust, unnecessary, and, so far from stopping the evil, it is to increase and continue the compromise business.

Mr. FESSENDEN obtained the floor.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Will the Senator from Maine allow me to ask the chairman of the Committee on Finance a question, and that is, whether this tax on sales will not include flour—

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is exactly what I was going to suggest.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. And lumber, marble, butter, and cheese. I think it clearly would, and those articles we have exempted.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator has the definition of the word "manufactures" in the revenue law before him, he can answer his own question.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. In the very first revenue law that we passed we thought it proper to make those exemptions.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I agree with what has been said in opposition to this particular section with regard to liquor, very generally; and I particularly agree, because I have thought of it more than once, with the idea suggested by the honorable Senator from Indiana in his resolution that what lies, perhaps, as much at the foundation of all the difficulty we have as anything else, is the facility that we give to persons who commit crimes to escape by compromising for money. Whether it would do to entirely take away that power, I do not know; but, perhaps, nothing short of that will accomplish the purpose.

But with regard to this particular provision I am of opinion that it will be entirely inoperative. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue cannot, with the force he has, or by any means that he has at his command, without taking up his whole time and giving him more officers than he has got, accomplish this purpose of shutting up all the distilleries of the country at once. Consequently, it will not be tried to any very considerable extent; and that consideration is outside of what has been argued with regard to the possible injustice it may work upon innocent persons; for I agree with the Senator from Vermont upon that particular point, that now, when it is perfectly manifest all over the country that whisky is sold everywhere at about one half the tax or very little exceeding half the tax, and especially in our large cities, the man who carries on the business in the cities, with that knowledge of what has been and what is, may fairly be presumed to intend to carry it on in fraud of the law. It is so not only in the cities, but probably elsewhere also; for it certainly cannot be for the interest of the distillers in country places to manufacture their liquor with facts staring them so notoriously in the face with regard to the price at which it sells, without intending to violate the law themselves. Therefore I do not feel any very particular sympathy for any men engaged in this business at the present time, carrying it on largely; for I cannot understand that in doing it they have any view except to avail themselves of some of the loop-holes through which the law may be evaded.

I know, sir, that it is a very difficult thing to frame a law that will accomplish the purpose. The committees of the Senate and House of Representatives have been trying, ever since the first tax law was enacted early in the war, to provide some machinery by which to guard against fraud. They did their best. They failed to a certain extent, and it was supposed that they failed on account of the very high rate of taxation that was placed upon the article. Undoubtedly that had a very considerable effect, because the profits to be made when the tax is so high, if it can be evaded, are so very large that the inducement to violate the law and to run all the hazards which the law provides in such cases is proportionately large. There will be an inducement in all cases; but in proportion as you increase the tax on spirits precisely in that proportion you increase the temptation. It is so in regard to frauds upon the customs revenue, and is so in regard to frauds upon the internal revenue. Therefore, I believe the matter might be mitigated in some degree if the tax should be reduced, although it would not be wholly relieved.

But, leaving that out of the question, I was stating what the committees of the two Houses had done. In the last bill that was passed upon the subject, the project that was then conceived and the changes then made were made at the suggestion of the Special Commissioner of Revenue in connection with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. They did their best to provide some way in which this difficulty might be avoided, if possible, and the men who violated the law brought to justice, and the revenue collected. It seems, however, that it has been worse since than it was before, although the penalties were made more severe. Now, this measure proposes an additional penalty touching everybody, and I really believe in addition to the matter which I have spoken of, but which has very little influence on my mind, namely, that it is possible that in some cases you may injure an innocent person, it will be impracticable to carry this into effect, and it will equally fail with the other.

I know it has been said—I think by the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of the other House—that that committee were preparing a bill on the general subject, and that it was found necessary, on account of the numerous discrepancies and mistakes and errors and blunders in all previous bills, that the new committee should draw a new bill which would avoid all these things. I can do no otherwise than wish them a happy deliverance. I trust they will be able to do it; and I shall unite with them most cordially in accomplishing their purpose of amending the errors of all previous generations, and producing some wise scheme that will effect the beneficial purpose they have in view. I trust they will be able to accomplish it, as they think they may; but I think this first effort is not a very promising specimen of what they will be likely to do from any effect it will have.

Now, sir, with regard to this report, I have an objection more especially to the proposed fourth section, which has been suggested to me by my friend from Vermont; but without reference to the suggestion made by him I do not exactly see how it is to be executed. I wish to call the attention of the chairman to the twelfth line of section four on the third page:

And the amount of sales within the year in excess of $5,000 shall be returned monthly to the assistant assessor.

How is that to be ascertained?

Mr. SHERMAN. The law points out the mode.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What law; the law as it stands now?

Mr. SHERMAN. The previous law.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What particular provision is there?

Mr. SHERMAN. I cannot turn to it at this moment; but taking the amount of sales annually, they divide it into months. The last clause of this section provides for it in April, and afterward the annual assessment is to be on the 1st of May.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I see that the provision as to the assessment for the month of April is specific. I noticed that.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is a provision in an existing law that where a monthly assessment is made to raise a tax fixed by an annual amount, the annual amount shall be divided by twelve, and this section as it now stands precisely in this shape, was prepared by the Special Commissioner of Revenue, with the sanction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, so that there is no doubt of the practical ability to execute it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have very great respect for both of those gentlemen; but I do not think this provides specifically, either by any reference to any former law or from anything you can find in the section itself, how it is to be executed. I know what is meant undoubtedly; but by any designation there, you cannot tell precisely how it is to be done.

"The amount of sales within the year in excess of $5,000 shall be returned monthly to the assistant assessor." If you provided that the amount of sales in every month should be returned, and that the excess should be carried to the amount of sales within the year, you might do it; but the language is very different.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the Senator would have no difficulty, if he was construing this law, to know what it meant. "And the amount of sales within the year in excess of $5,000 shall be returned monthly to the assistant assessor." As a matter of course the manufacturer determines his sales for the month according to the ratio which the month bears to the year, $5,000 being the yearly sales on which he has no tax to pay; and if he sells above the rate of $416 a month he knows he must return the excess for taxation.

Mr. HOWARD. Now, that the Senator from Ohio is up, I wish to ask him a question, by permission of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish an explanation from him whether it is the intention of the committee of conference to impose a tax on the manufacture of flour or lumber?

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is the very question the Senator from Vermont put.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish an explanation on that point. Perhaps I do not understand it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Since that question is put to me, I will say that as a matter of course the proposition is to insert this language in place of section ninety-four.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think I had better be allowed to close my remarks, because I find that what I designed to say is picked out by other gentlemen as I go along and before I get through.

Mr. HOWARD. I beg pardon of the Senator for interposing.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well; I give up altogether.

Mr. HOWARD. Then I should like an explanation of the Senator from Ohio as respects this fourth section. As it stands now, I understand that it imposes a tax upon lumber and upon flour which are not now subject to any internal tax. The very terms of this section, if I understand it, impose a tax upon these manufactures.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It imposes a tax upon everything that was formerly exempted under previous laws, no matter what it is, whether flour or meat or bread or anything else that never has been taxed heretofore, where the sales amount to over $5,000 a year. Here is a tax put on; there is no question about that. The language is broad enough to cover everything.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am inclined to think that it covers all manufactures except butter and cheese; and there is no reason why it should not cover every manufacture. The great complaint now is the discrimination between various classes of manufactures. There is no reason why butter and cheese, when manufactured to the extent of more than $5,000 a year, should not be taxed. It is a very small tax. All exemptions, all exceptions of every nature, it seems to me, are unjust unless there be a clear reason for them; and there is no reason in the world why the manufacturer of lumber or of flour should not be taxed as much as any other manufacturer. It is a very small tax, only amounting to two dollars in a thousand. I am inclined to think the criticism, if it is a criticism, of the Senator from Michigan is correct, that flour would be considered as a manufacture under the definition of the word "manufacture," contained in the internal revenue law. There the meaning of "manufactures" is defined; and, of course, when we use the word "manufactures" in this law, we refer to the definition of the word in the internal revenue law. I think it would include the manufacture of flour, but I am not sure. The existing law reads:

"Any person, firm, or corporation who shall manufacture by hand or machinery any goods, wares, or merchandise not otherwise provided for, exceeding annually the sum of $1,000, or who shall be engaged in the manufacture or preparation for sale of any articles or compounds, or shall put up for sale in packages with his own name or trade mark thereon any articles, the contents thereof shall be regarded as manufactures."

I think that would include flour.

Mr. JOHNSON. And lumber, too.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know certainly; it is a question depending on the internal revenue laws. The language there is defined. This does not change the old language.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I agree, and with some knowledge of the practical operation of the law as it now stands in relation to the tax on whisky, that the best way to prevent the frauds which are certainly being perpetrated is the one suggested by the honorable member from Indiana. The temptation to which the officers of the revenue and the district attorneys are subjected has, I regret to say, been found too great, as I think. These parties are making, if they are successful, enormous profits. That is proved by the fact of the quantity of whisky which is manufactured and the very small amount of revenue that is received from it. I do not think the Government gets one third of the revenue, and one third is some forty million dollars. There is, therefore, $80,000,000 in the hands of these people to use with a view to corrupt the officers of the revenue. Their property is seized, they themselves are arrested, and the first thing they do is to apply to the collector of the district, and he becomes satisfied that they did not intend to do any wrong upon the Government, and he compromises. He very rarely goes to the district attorney for the purpose of having an indictment found; but when an indictment is found, in nine cases out of ten, it is not prosecuted, but the district attorney becomes a convert to the idea that no fraud was contemplated; and yet we all know that fraud is perpetrated to an enormous extent, if not to a larger amount than that which I have stated. We are placing, therefore, practically in the hands of these men—I do not mean all of them, but those engaged in the frauds—a fund of at least eighty million dollars with which they can corrupt officers of the revenue.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does the Senator say the collectors of internal revenue have power to compromise?

Mr. JOHNSON. By the concurrence of the Commissioner here. They recommend it, and their recommendation becomes practically conclusive. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue here requires the recommendation of the collector, and he cannot but act, if he believes in the honesty of the collector, upon the recommendation of the collector; and in nine cases out of ten that recommendation proves to be conclusive. It is not to be wondered at, because the compensation we give to these officers is comparatively trifling. The district attorney gets his thousand or his twelve hundred dollars a year; the collector gets his two or three or four thousand dollars or more, and he has before him the prospect of getting ten, fifteen, or twenty thousand dollars a year, and his virtue falls before the temptation.

It is idle to disguise the fact; the Senate must, I am sure, be cognizant of the fact that in that way frauds are being perpetrated; for it is idle to imagine that the perpetration of the frauds can be successfully concealed. I think, therefore, with the honorable member from Indiana, that the best mode is to take away from the Commissioner, or, if not, to subject it to still stronger limitations than now exist, the power to compromise. But, as far as the proposition recommended by the committee of conference on the subject is concerned, I have but a word to say.

The first provision which they recommend will be found practically useless, because it will not be in the power of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to make the discovery which the section contemplates as within his power. Then as to the second clause, that is objectionable, in my view, upon several grounds: in the first place, it seems to me to be grossly unjust; it visits upon the innocent the crimes of the guilty; it goes upon the assumption that there may be innocent distillers. I have no doubt there are; and, notwithstanding it assumes the innocence of the distiller, it strikes at his trade and may ruin him, because the Government is unable to distinguish between the innocent and the criminal distiller.

But again, Mr. President, I think it objectionable, because it is entirely futile, or will be found so in practice. A continuous sale for ten days of liquor at a price less than the tax, is to cause the Commissioner to close all the distilleries within the district. What will they do? They will sell for eight or for nine days and then stop, and thus avoid the penalty and laugh at your law. It would not be the duty or the right of the Commissioner acting under that provision to close the distillery unless the sales had gone on for ten continuous days; and if he attempted to execute it because the sales had continued for a number of days less than ten, he would be exceeding his authority and would render himself liable to damages.

But it is, as I think, objectionable in part on a constitutional ground. It not only provides that in the future a continuous sale for ten days is to be punished by the closing of all the distilleries, but if there shall have been in the past such sales for ten days, the distilleries are to be stopped. That is ex post facto. It is a penalty which we are about to impose upon an alleged offense. The offense is the selling for less than the tax for a period of ten days. That we may do in the future, if it be advisable to do so at all; but as the law now stands a man might sell for ten days or twenty days without being liable on account of the sales or without the distilleries in his district being responsible to the punishment imposed by this bill; and yet the bill provides that in a case of that description the distilleries are to be closed. Now, what is the effect of closing them all? How does that benefit the revenue? It prevents the manufacture out of which the revenue is to arise. It says in so many words that no whisky shall be distilled in the future until we think proper to open the distilleries. Then every day that the distilleries are closed is the object upon which the tax is to be levied defeated.

Now, I do not know whether I am right in what I am about to say, but I have so heard; my friend from Ohio will set me right if I am wrong; what is done with the whisky that is seized as forfeited to the Government under the law? It is carried, I understand, into the bonded warehouses. It belongs to the Government. It is forfeited property. What is done with it? Is it sold for an amount not less than the tax?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is held in the custody of the Government; but if we can stop the manufacture of whisky so that it will rise above two dollars a gallon, we can then sell it and realize the tax.

Mr. JOHNSON. It may or may not; but I have had some reason to believe that in the past—I do not know how it has been lately—either after or before it gets into the bonded warehouse, it is sold for less than the amount of the tax. I do not know that the law authorizes it, but I have supposed that it did, because I do know professionally that an offer was made to buy some of this whisky which the Government had seized, and the party agreed to give, or proposed to give, some forty or fifty cents for it, he meaning to ship it to Mexico, where he could have sold it, as he thought, for three or four dollars; and he was told if he would give fifty cents he might have it. If the Commissioner was the party with whom the negotiation was held I have so much confidence in his integrity that I have no doubt he supposed that he was authorized to sell it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will refer the Senator to the law if he wishes. Section twenty-seven of the act of March 2, 1867, provides "that no distilled spirits which have been forfeited to the Government in accordance with law shall be sold for a price less than the amount of the tax required thereon by law at the time of such sale."

Mr. JOHNSON. The case to which I referred was before that. That was not the law before 1867. They were willing to sell for less than the tax before that. I was about to conclude by saying that I have no doubt the suggestion of the honorable member from Indiana would go very far to arrest these frauds; and if, in addition to that, the tax were reduced to a dollar a gallon I do not believe there would be any fraud of any consequence, and that the Government would derive twice as much revenue as it is now receiving.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know, Mr. President, that it is at all necessary to undertake to defend this report; but it may be proper to make a few suggestions in reference to the subject that has been so elaborately discussed. Senators on this floor, whenever any discussion has arisen about the whisky tax, have denounced the persons who are engaged in the business as thieves and robbers, men who plunder the public Treasury; but when a law is brought in here that strikes an effective blow at these men, then their hearts suddenly expand with sympathy for these poor, persecuted, honest distillers.

The argument of the distinguished Senator from Indiana, if I understood it, was remarkable, as it appeared to me, for its inconsistency. Commencing with the declaration that this measure was unnecessary because there were already sufficient enactments upon the subject, he then proceeded to say that it was so defective that there was no way of preventing fraud upon our present system of internal revenue, because there was a power under existing laws by which compromises between collectors or prosecuting attorneys and persons arrested might be made. It may be true that it would be of advantage to amend the existing law in that respect; but I conceive that the honorable Senator attaches altogether too much importance to the effect of the compromises which are made between those who prosecute on the part of the Government and those who are charged with the violation of the law of the land. These compromises are either honest or they are corrupt. Assuming that they are honest, then, of course, no objection can be made to them; but if they are corrupt they are corrupt because the men upon whom the enforcement of the law is devolved are dishonest and corrupt men; and if they are so they can prevent the effective prosecution of these criminals as well without power to compromise as with that power. Suppose a prosecuting attorney is corrupt and purchasable, it is possible that he may advise a compromise; but could he not be hired to abandon the prosecution, hired not to call his witnesses, hired to defeat the prosecution in many ways?

But if you take away the power of compromising the case must go to judgment and the United States must pay the costs and recover nothing. Witnesses may be suborned. If there is that wide-spread corruption connected with the revenue from whisky which is alleged, I undertake to say that it is in vain for you to depend upon criminal prosecutions for the enforcement of your law; for if prosecuting attorneys and witnesses and judges and collectors and all concerned are corrupt, what advantage is it to have a law that deprives those persons of any power to compromise?

Now, sir, it appears to me that the only effective mode which can be adopted in order to prevent these frauds is to provide for a proceeding in rem, and not to provide for the prosecution of any particular individual or individuals. When a distillery is engaged in the violation of the law speak and strike, and strike before you speak, and then you may accomplish something in the way of suppressing these frauds. It appears to me that the defects of the system arise, perhaps, not so much from the imperfections of the law, for our most distinguished men in both branches of Congress have been busy for years in devising legislation to meet these cases, but our legislation has been inoperative because the men who have had to execute the law have been unfaithful, dishonest men; and so the law has proved an abortion. Now, this bill proposes to proceed at once, without any circumlocution, without calling upon prosecuting attorneys, collectors, or witnesses to swear to one thing and another, but it proposes to proceed at once against the distillery.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I want to know if whisky is distilled in one district and carried to an adjoining district where there is no distillery and sold, how he will reach the case?

Mr. WILLIAMS. If sales of whisky are made in a district where there is no distillery, of course there is no distillery there to close; but if the distillery which is engaged in manufacturing sells whisky at a less price than the tax that distillery can be closed.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Do you in that case shut up any distillery? Would not all the whisky be sold in districts where there were no distilleries?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think not, Mr. President. Is it possible that there would be no whisky sold in the city of New York, or in New Orleans, or Philadelphia, or any of those large cities? According to the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. DAVIS,] and I think he is quite right on that subject, the great frauds upon the public revenue are not committed in the country among the rural distilleries so much as in the great cities, where there are hundreds of distilleries engaged in the illicit manufacture of whisky. It is to empower the Commissioner to proceed against those distilleries that this measure has been reported.

It is quite singular to notice the different objections that are made to this report. One Senator objects to it because it is entirely inoperative.

If that be so, of course it can produce no harm. But another Senator objects to it because it is too severe and too oppressive in its operation; and its penalties, it is urged, may fall equally, like the rain from heaven, upon the just and the unjust. These objections are entirely inconsistent with each other; but there seems to be a disposition to take a running jump at this report on all hands, and to whistle it down the wind without very much consideration, because it is something that, as has been suggested, has no precedent in our legislation upon the subject of whisky.

Will this proposed law operate upon honest men to their great detriment and harm? I assume what is frequently assumed in this Senate, and is generally conceded here to-day, that men who are now engaged in the distillation of ardent spirits are not honest men; and they cannot in the nature of things be so, with a possible exception, so long as spirits sell in the immediate neighborhood where they manufacture them, for less than the tax. How can an honest man make whisky and pay a tax of two dollars upon it, add it to the cost of production, and then sell that whisky for one dollar a gallon in the market?

Mr. NYE. Will the Senator allow me to answer him on that point?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I prefer to conclude what I have to say, and then the Senator can answer as he deems proper.

It is impossible to make a law that is entirely perfect in all respects and that may not operate with hardship in some individual cases. But here is an evil of immense magnitude staring us in the face; here is a great fraud that is permeating every part of the nation. Hundreds, if not thousands, of men are engaged in palpable violation of law and in defrauding the public revenues of the United States, so that now we receive less than one million dollars per month of revenue from whisky, while we proceed here to legislate upon the assumption that we are to receive $50,000,000 per annum of revenue from whisky. There will be a great deficit in the revenues of the next fiscal year or there must be some rigid and effective provision made for the collection of the revenue from whisky.

It may be that this would operate severely and harshly in some cases, but they are inconsiderable in number. Where the public safety or the public good requires it you must make a law that will be generally beneficial, even though in some particular case it may operate with hardship. No general law upon the subject of taxation can be made that will not in some individual or imaginable case produce hardship; but that is no reason why the law should not be enacted. If you proceed upon that ground every proposition to enforce the collection of taxes may be defeated.

Here I beg to say that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue differs from the gentlemen who have said on this floor that this law would be impracticable and that he could not enforce it; for I conversed with him this morning on the subject of this report, and he gave it as his opinion that it was a good law and that it would enable him to do very much in suppressing the frauds that are now prevailing in the country.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Who was it gave that opinion?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue. And now, Mr. President, suppose these distilleries are stopped; suppose that no more whisky is manufactured within a given time, until the whisky upon the market is exhausted; or, if the manufacture is not stopped until the supply upon the market is exhausted, suppose the manufacture is stopped until the whisky in the market rises to the price of two dollars and forty cents or two dollars and fifty cents a gallon on account of its scarcity. I ask if that would not be of advantage to the honest distiller? For then he could proceed to manufacture his whisky and pay his tax and make a profit upon his business. And it is a fact perfectly demonstrable now that no honest man can conduct the business of distilling with profit. Closing up these distilleries now, and bringing up the price of whisky thereby to more than the amount of the tax and the cost of production, would enable honest men to pay the tax and to make a profit in their business. Do this, and enable the Commissioner, wherever he may find a distillery making whisky contrary to law, to seize it and keep it closed until the business can be conducted according to the requirements of the statute, and what will be the result?

The United States has on hand a very large amount of whisky that has been forfeited to the Government, and under the existing law it cannot be sold for less than the amount of the tax. Stop these distilleries at this time, let the price rise, as it will if the manufacture ceases, and then the Government can realize from this large quantity of whisky that it has on hand the amount of the tax, and thus have a great addition to its revenue.

These are some of the considerations that influenced the report of the committee. Every Senator, I suppose, knows the amendment that was adopted by the House of Representatives, which was altogether more stringent and more severe than this section which the committee of conference has reported, and in this modified shape we consented to report it to the Senate. To say that it is objectionable on account of its injustice seems to me to be taking ground against that legislation which is necessary to secure the collection of the tax upon whisky.

The Senator from Nevada says that this system of espionage and presumption is contrary to our principles of public law. I had supposed that our legislation in relation to the collection of customs contained provisions of law very similar to what are contained in this section. Take our legislation upon the subject of smuggling. When a man is found in possession of goods that have been smuggled into the country the law presumes that he is guilty without a particle of evidence, and devolves upon him the necessity of proving his innocence.

Mr. NYE. Allow me to ask the Senator a question. Is there any law under the customs system that if one merchant be caught smuggling goods all other importing merchants in that city shall be closed up? If you can give me some such law as that I should like to see it. I know of no law by which other importers are to be closed because one man is caught smuggling.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No, sir; there is no such provision of law; but the Senator denounced this measure because it presumed that somebody was guilty without proof from a particular circumstance; and I referred to the case of smuggling as illustrative of legislation of a similar nature and effect. Of course the law makes no such provision as he says as to smuggling, because there is no parallel between that case and the case of selling whisky; but here the law proceeds upon the ground that where a man is manufacturing whisky in a place where it is selling for a dollar a gallon he does not pay two dollars tax per gallon upon that article and then sell it for one dollar. Is there any violence whatever in that presumption? I understand that where prosecutions have been carried on in some States that has been put to the jury as a circumstance of presumptive guilt, and the jury have found upon that evidence alone that the person charged with the illicit manufacture of whisky was guilty, because it is unreasonable to suppose that a man would lose a dollar and a half on every gallon of whisky that he made and still conduct his business and fill his coffers with money.

When was this discovery made that there are so many honest men engaged in the distillation of liquor? Sir, we expected to find in this body, from the discussions that have heretofore taken place, an assumption that nine tenths of these men were necessarily violating law and defrauding the revenue, for the arguments heretofore have proceeded upon that ground; and when we avail ourselves of a supposed opinion of the Senate that has been corroborated from every source of information on this subject we are met on every hand with declamation, or perhaps I should say with argument, in favor of these honest men, to whom the law ought to extend its protection, who ought to be regarded as engaged in the same lawful and praiseworthy business as any man who is engaged in manufacturing any other article.

But, sir, I do not know that it is necessary to say any more on this subject. I have made these suggestions and assigned these reasons for this report. I care nothing about the adoption or rejection of the report any further than I believe that if we are to have any revenue at all from whisky we must adopt some more rigid system than we have heretofore adopted, for every day the revenues are falling off; every day fraud is becoming more unblushing everywhere in the country, more defiant of law; and unless we take some step of this description we may as well make up our minds to give up all revenue from whisky. It is for the Senate to decide the question.

It is true—as allusion has been made to that subject I may speak of it—that the House of Representatives is perfecting a system of legislation upon this subject, an entire system from beginning to end; but the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who is admitted by Senators to be honest, while their arguments, as it seems to me, contain some reflections upon his administration of the office, esteemed it absolutely necessary that now, without delay, something should be done to save to the country some revenue from whisky; and it was under this imperious necessity that the House acted, and it is under this necessity that the Senate committee concluded to make this report. Now, if it pleases the Senate to reject it, very well. If they are satisfied with the present condition of things as to the revenue from whisky of course I ought to be satisfied; but it appears to me, taking everything into consideration, that we should try this experiment, and if it is found to be unprofitable, or inexpedient, or as unjust as Senators say, then the general law which is to be introduced may take its place.

Mr. NYE. We have learned now, Mr. President, the object of this legislation. By the declaration of the honorable Senator from Oregon its object seems to be to stop entirely the manufacturing of whisky, for a sufficient length of time, at least, to allow the Government to realize upon that stock which it has on hand that it has received by forfeiture; and he tells us that it is about twenty million gallons of that article.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I presume the Senator does not wish to misconstrue what I said.

Mr. NYE. Not at all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I mentioned that as one reason for this legislation; but I say that the primary object is to raise the price of whisky in the market so that honest men can distill and sell for a price which will enable them to pay the tax and reimburse them for the cost of production.

Mr. NYE. I hold that such an object as that is unworthy of the consideration of the Senate for a moment. If the Senate is reduced to the business of regulating the sale of whisky, it has reached a point where I think it is engaged in smaller business than it would be in appointing masons and carpenters and blacksmiths in the navy-yards. No, sir; the only legitimate object of your legislation should be to collect the revenue upon the whisky made. That is the point; and I agree with the Senator from Indiana that the remedy lies in a different direction, and that the only possible effect of this measure would be to stop the manufacture of whisky.

Mr. President, I am no apologist for whisky frauds, and I have the same object in view that the Senator from Oregon has, to not only impose this tax but to collect it. The difference between us is in the means prescribed. I have the highest regard and respect for the opinion of the present Commissioner of Internal Revenue; I have the highest confidence in his integrity and honesty; but if he has given his opinion that this is the best means to produce that revenue I beg leave to differ with him, as I do with the honorable Senator from Oregon; and we are not bound by the simple opinion of any officer in regard to such a question.

I know enough of distilling to know that the largest distillers of this country are not at all concerned in the home market; I speak of the largest distillers in our cities; they never sell one gallon at home. Their supremacy lies in the superiority of the article they manufacture, at a large outlay of expense and a large advance of money to prepare for it. They manufacture a superior article to the ordinary distillers, so that they sell in a foreign market and can afford to pay the two-dollar tax and make money and conduct their business legitimately. That is well known. They manufacture the highest proof spirit that is taken to Paris, tax paid, and undoubtedly it comes back afterwards as French brandy through the manipulations of the French, and pays two duties; first a home duty, and then a duty when it comes back afterwards as an import.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am sorry to correct my friend, but the exported whisky never pays any tax at all.

Mr. NYE. I grant that; I was mistaken in that; but those men carry on a legitimate business within the pale of the law.

Mr. SHERMAN. The whole amount exported is only about two million gallons, and nearly all of that is made in Kentucky and Ohio. The whisky made in New York is sold there.

Mr. NYE. The Senator from Ohio may be more familiar with whisky than I am. [Laughter.] I will not contest the palm with him on that point; but I do know of establishments in New York that manufacture more than any other distilleries there, which manufacture solely and alone for foreign markets; and whether it pays a duty or not, their business is legitimate at least; but this law would close them up. But the idea that there should be a policy on the part of this Government to stop a business already legalized by it, until it can dispose of the stock it has on hand, is, I repeat, unworthy of the consideration of the Senate, and should not, for one moment, enter into its contemplation. What, sir, are we to be told that because this Government holds a large stock of whisky which has been forfeited by the distillers to it, it is by solemn enactment to declare that no more whisky shall be manufactured until the commodity it has on hand to this large amount is sold? No, sir; it would be a species of legislation that would not be recognized by civilized communities. The imperial Government of France would not dare attempt it, nor the monarchical Government of England, to stop the legitimate business of individuals to make a market for property that had been forfeited to the Government.

My impression is, Mr. President, that the best way is to recommit this bill to another committee of conference, for I know that the honorable Senator from Ohio did not intend to tax the bread that the poor eat, and I know he did not intend to gather within the scope of taxation the large list of articles that have been exempt throughout the entire war. I know that while starvation is almost everywhere seen in our land he is the last that would understandingly introduce a bill to tax the very bread that the poor eat. I hope that the Government, while it is professing to be liberal in lifting the burden of taxation from the industries of the people, will not put it upon every mouthful of bread that the toiling millions have to earn by the sweat of their brow to eat. I think that every principle of prudence requires that a new committee should be appointed, or that the same committee, if you please, should review their proceedings and present to us, at least, a bill that will be acceptable and efficient and sure to reach the end desired.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I have observed that on some occasions the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. STEWART,] when he fails to meet an argument otherwise, will say that it is an argument in sympathy with the rebellion. A similar suggestion has been made by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] this morning. He says that if there be any opposition to what seems to us most absurd legislation that opposition is in sympathy with whisky dealers, and that no man is justified in holding any opinion in regard to a manufacturer of liquor except that he is a scoundrel and organized intellectually and morally only with a view to evade the laws of the land. If a man entertains any other opinion than that of a whisky dealer he sympathizes with that dealer in his frauds, I suppose!

Mr. WILLIAMS. The honorable Senator is at liberty to draw his own inferences from what I said, of course; but I made no such statements in reference to persons who sympathize with distillers or in reference to distillers. I said that Senators on this floor had denounced them as such in discussions that had heretofore taken place; but I did not say that any Senator who opposed this bill sympathized with those who defrauded the law, or anything of that kind. I think the Senator misconstrues what I said.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I put my construction on the Senator's language, and will leave it just there, alongside of the language he used on that subject. My opinion is that it only requires the adoption of this proposition to make our laws on the subject of collecting revenue from whisky absolutely absurd and ridiculous. I have thought that much of the legislation was most objectionable, but I have not seen any proposition that lacked every merit, as I supposed, until this came.

Senators suppose that there ought to be as much revenue collected from whisky as if the production corresponded with that of the year 1860. I say that is absurd. Do Senators not know that the policy which has been adopted by the Government in the collection of a revenue from whisky has destroyed to a very large extent that interest? Do Senators not know that the production is very much reduced and that it is now impossible, because of the legislation itself, in connection with the conduct of some dishonest persons under that legislation, for an honest man to produce whisky?

I will tell you, Mr. President, what is necessary in order to have a proper system. It is necessary that we should protect honest men in the production of this article. In my opinion that can only be done by imposing a rate of taxation that every man will feel is right. I think everybody engaged in the business of the country knows that a tax of two dollars on the gallon of whisky is an unreasonable and an unjust tax. I feel it. That an article that costs but forty cents to produce should bear a tax of two dollars is unreasonable, and I believe that the failure to collect the tax is because it is an unreasonable tax. I have no doubt that at fifty cents a gallon we should have collected much more revenue, and there would have been much more whisky produced in the country.

I am not going to discuss to-day whether it is well that whisky should be produced. With that question Congress has nothing to do. With any question of morality in connection with the production of whisky, in my judgment, Congress has nothing to do. Congress has only to legislate with a view to realizing revenue from this article, and such legislation contemplates its production; and I think any man makes a mistake in legislating with a view to revenue by starting out with a proposition that whisky is an outlaw, that it is simply to be pursued and destroyed. Congress has no right to pursue it in that way, and only has the right to pursue it with a view of realizing revenue. I admit that it is proper in levying a tax to take into consideration the fact that whisky is not a necessary in most uses to which it is applied. It is a necessary for some purposes; but the larger amount of it produced is used as a matter of luxury; perhaps it would be proper thus to express it. Therefore it may be properly taxed more than articles of absolute necessity. Now, sir, the question for us to consider is what rate of tax ought to be imposed with a view to revenue, and I submit to Senators if we have not had experience enough on this subject.

In 1860 the production of whisky in the country was very nearly ninety million gallons, above eighty million. Indiana produced about nine million; Ohio about fifteen million; Illinois nearly fifteen million. What has become of this production? In Indiana, I suppose, there is not a million gallons produced. There was one large establishment, one very wealthy firm of very eminent and wealthy citizens, very honest and reputable men, that produced, perhaps, more than half the entire production of the State in 1860; and your legislation has driven them from the business; your legislation has left their large property unemployed; and the production now in the State is almost defeated, and you have but to pass this bill and there will be none produced in the State, I presume. If Senators wish that there shall be no revenue let them go on in this course; but if they want revenue let them tax the article at such a rate as the people feel it is right to tax it, and then they will have the support of the judgment of the country.

I have not a very extensive acquaintance with whisky producers. This particular firm that I have spoken of I knew very well. I respected them very much because I knew they were excellent men. They had their agents in almost every neighborhood of the State of Indiana buying up the corn. They bought corn by the millions of bushels in Indiana and Illinois, furnished a market to the people for their corn, and of course we came to know them well. And as they were most excellent men and very skillful business men, and in the legitimate prosecution of their business made very large fortunes, they had a commercial influence, a business influence, in that State. But, sir, they have been driven out of this business and into other pursuits.

Now, Mr. President, let us consider just for a minute this proposition. If whisky, in a particular district, for a period of ten days, shall remain below two dollars a gallon, then it is the duty of the Commissioner in Washington to order an investigation, and all the distilleries in that district shall be closed, upon the presumption, I suppose, that anybody who is then producing, the market being at that low rate, must be producing illegally in some way or other. How is that, sir? Can you not conceive of a manufacturer carrying on business when the market price of the article produced is less than the cost of production? Can you not conceive of the case of a cotton manufacturer having a very large amount of cotton on hand which he must manufacture into fabrics; that, although the price in the market may be below what it will cost him, he will go on and complete the manufacture of the material on hand? Can you not conceive of such a case? Can you not imagine that, rather than dismiss his many operatives, rather than leave his machinery idle, rather than leave his raw material unmanufactured, he would go on, trusting to a better market in the future? And can you not understand this case, that a distiller producing in large quantities shall, at the proper season of the year, send out into all parts of the corn-growing region and buy up millions of bushels of corn, and having it on hand and his machinery in working order, although for a while the price may fall very much, he would go on and manufacture that corn into whisky, although he might have to hold the whisky for a considerable period of time? Is it a presumption that a man is guilty of fraud because he will go on and manufacture that corn which he has already purchased with a view to a future and better market.

Mr. President, in this business there is another consideration that the Senator from Oregon seems to be ignorant of. A very important part of the profit of the manufacture of whisky is in the feeding of stock, mainly of hogs. Hundreds of thousands of hogs used to be fattened in Indiana at the distilleries; and it was regarded as a source of great profit to the distiller that he could use the material, after the alcohol had been extracted from it, in fattening stock. Now, suppose, that which occurs with every distiller, that he has purchased up hundreds of head of hogs and has them on hand; he must feed them; he is going on with his distilling, and some emissary of the Department comes into that district, ascertains that whisky has fallen below two dollars a gallon and that it has continued at that depressed rate for more than ten days: he comes to this distiller who is manufacturing the corn which he has purchased at the proper season of the year and which he has on hand, and he is fattening his hundreds of head of hogs, and this agent of the Department stops his operations, stops not only the manufacture of the whisky, but stops the supply of the food to the hogs which is relied upon, as I said before, as a very important part of the profits of the business. Why, sir, Senators that understand anything about the production of whisky and the other interests that are connected with it know very well that a distiller would not stop in the manufacturing of corn he had already purchased and in the feeding of the hogs he had already purchased merely because whisky had fallen to $1 90: he would not think of stopping; he would go on and complete the business that he had provided his supply for.

Mr. President, I was surprised that the Senator from Ohio should support a proposition of this sort, because he does know very well the practical inconvenience, the absolute destruction to men that a provision like this would be. Suppose that the distiller has two hundred thousand bushels of corn on hand; he buys that in the month of November, when it is cheap; and in the month of January he is manufacturing; and he has two hundred head of hogs that he is feeding from this corn after it is distilled; and the agent of the Department comes along and sees that in some town in that district, perhaps twenty, thirty, or fifty miles distant, they are selling whisky at $1 90, and, therefore, this distiller must stop—upon what principle? Absolute ruin to the man is the result. There is no evidence of dishonesty on his part; but he must stop, and his stock go unfed, or he will be driven to the necessity of feeding and fattening with a much more expensive food.

Mr. President, I notice that a colleague of mine in the other House, Mr. NIBLACK, has signed this report. I desire, while it is being discussed, in justification of him, to say that this report is, to some extent, a modification of the proposition of the House; it is not quite so bad as that was; and my colleague felt himself justified in signing the report, inasmuch as he simply represented the will of the House; and as the bill which comes back to us from the committee of conference is somewhat less objectionable than the House bill he felt authorized to sign it. He had better not have signed it, in my opinion; though I recollect that upon one occasion I was on a committee of conference—

Mr. SHERMAN. I would ask my friend if Mr. NIBLACK told him that; or is it only his own inference?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think I am stating it from a conversation with him.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not feel at liberty to state what occurred in the conference, and therefore I will not go into it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I asked Judge NIBLACK how he came to sign it, and he said he was opposed to the bill of the House, but the report of the committee of conference was less objectionable, in his judgment, than was the House proposition; and I understood the Senator from Ohio to say that the bill is not so extreme in its provisions now as it was as it came from the House. But I was going to say, Mr. President, that upon one occasion I was upon a committee of conference, and the report of the committee was very objectionable to me, but the two Senators associated with me on the committee decided in favor of that report, and I thought it was rather an administrative or a ministerial act for me to sign the report with them, and that it was my duty to do so; and so I signed the report, although I voted against it when it came into the Senate and was very much opposed to it. So much, sir, for my colleague who has signed this report. I know this style of legislation is not agreeable to him, as it is not to myself.

Mr. President, I do not believe the remedy is to be found in meters or in any machinery whereby whisky shall be measured; I do not believe it is to be found specially in condemning the whisky or in sending the manufacturer to the penitentiary. I believe the remedy is in the modification of the law so that everybody will feel that the tax is just. When you bring it down to one dollar or fifty cents on the gallon you will have a more efficient administration of the law and more revenue; and I do not look for it before that time. When the inducements to evade the law are so very great it will be evaded, and the honest men who are engaged in the business ought not to be punished merely because there are dishonest men engaged in it. What a remarkable proposition it is that all the distilleries of a district shall be closed up at one time, whether they are all involved in the evasion of the law or not.

Very well said the Senator from Nevada that if one importing merchant shall bring in his goods without paying the duty all the importers must have their houses closed up, according to the logic of this proposition. That is the principle of it. It is not right, of course. If Senators think they are justified in voting to destroy the business and stop it on moral grounds that is another question; but when you are legislating with a view to revenue you must contemplate the production of the article taxed and deal with it as you would by law with any other article, justly.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, I do not rise to discuss the general character of this bill, but to notice a single observation that has fallen from the Senator from Indiana, who has just taken his seat; and I do it the more because the remark to which I refer has been so often repeated here and has so often arrested my attention that I think now I am justified in making an observation or two in regard to it. I allude to the proposition that this tax is unjust in that it is too high, and that the remedy is not in new provisions of law for more stringency and efficiency, but in an appeal to the moral sense of the manufacturers of whisky and in imposing a tax which shall be recognized by their moral sense as just, and, therefore, addressing itself to their magnanimity, that they will pay it because it is just, when they would not pay a high tax because they think it onerous.

Mr. President, I agree entirely with that Senator that, as a legislative body, we have no control over the question of the manufacture of liquors in the several States. Whether the States shall allow their citizens to manufacture whisky or not is not a question over which we have any control. If it were I should think that it was sound policy to prohibit the manufacture of it altogether. I would hold that it would be the wisest thing for this country to do to say it is a positive immorality, and it is so productive and so fruitful of pauperism and crime that it is not a fit thing for this nation to allow it to exist. I would say that it was an unfit and an improper thing for the Government of a great country to participate in it at all as a question of traffic; that we should be wise if we would gather no revenue whatever from it, and say that we would not countenance the manufacture or the traffic in ardent spirits, or in whisky, if you please, as a matter of profit for the purpose of replenishing the Treasury; and I would rejoice if my country and my countrymen would, if they had the power, look at it as a moral question and say, as a matter of morality and as a matter of sound policy, we do not encourage the manufacture of ardent spirits as an article of traffic. But I agree with the Senator that we have no such control over the subject; that it is a matter which belongs entirely to the States.

But, sir, when you come to levy a tax on the manufacture, when you come to the question of how much tax you will impose on it, I maintain that you have a right to consider the morality of it, to use the language of the honorable Senator from Indiana. I maintain that we have a right to take notice of the fact that this article is manufactured in the States, and we have a right to inquire of ourselves whether we will encourage or discourage it, so far as the tax is concerned. We do that in regard to all our manufactures. We lay our external revenue taxes, our imposts, and also our excises with reference to the encouragement of those articles which are by common consent of mankind, articles of necessity, and on those articles which are articles of luxury, we lay a heavy hand. So here. This distinction runs exactly in this line. This article of whisky is not an article of necessity by the general consent and judgment of mankind. Therefore, we have a right to lay the heaviest duty possible upon it. We have a right to say that if the States will allow the manufacture of whisky, if they will allow an article of prime necessity for the people, the bread, the staff of life, to be converted into an article which poisons the people and which is the frightful source of pauperism and crime, we will lay the heaviest possible tax which the case admits of upon it.

What is the answer to that? "You cannot collect it." Why? The persons who are engaged in this business, the assumption is, will be honest with a tax of fifty cents, and they will be very dishonest if the tax is two dollars! Sir, that is not the theory of the law. You do not base your laws upon such a theory as that. You hold that the citizen is to pay such a duty or such a tax as the Government sees fit to impose upon him.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will ask the Senator this question: whether it has not been for a very long time the policy of the Government to impose no duties on diamonds, for instance, for the reason that it was so easy to evade the law by smuggling, and that the temptation to evade it must be considered?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I suppose that is so; but my honorable friend would hardly think that a parallel case.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator does not state my position exactly right. I did not say that a man was necessarily dishonest with the tax at two dollars and honest if it were at fifty cents. I said that the tax of two dollars held out so great an inducement to an evasion of the law that it ought to be expected.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Certainly the honorable Senator did not say that in words, but he said the remedy, our relief was in placing this tax at fifty cents. Why? He said men would pay the tax at fifty cents and would not pay at two dollars. What is the implication? Of course, that they would not seek to evade the law if you give them the terms they desire.

Mr. HENDRICKS. They would not run the risks.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. They would not run the risks. I think that is the inference, of course. Now, Mr. President, is it true that this tax cannot be collected? Is that the experience? It is the experience, I admit, that it has not been; but why has it not been? I have not examined the subject particularly, but from what I have observed, and what I have heard here, and of the debates in the other branch of Congress, it is because the law has not been faithfully administered. That is the difficulty. I understand it is true that in other countries where similar provisions prevail, there is no difficulty in collecting this tax. If I am correctly informed, in Great Britain, perhaps in France, and some other countries, it is as high, and I think higher than it is here. Why, then, should this be an exceptional case?

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is $2 50 in Great Britain.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Two dollars and fifty cents in Great Britain, and it is collected, and collected unquestionably without difficulty. Why? Simply owing to the administration of the law; that is all. Is it practicable to administer the law here so as to collect it? I can understand, owing to our widely-extended country, and owing, perhaps, to the lax condition of the police force of the country that we encounter greater difficulties here than are encountered in England, France, and the other States of Europe; but it does seem to me that it is very obvious that the remedy is not what the Senator from Indiana supposes.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Certainly.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I said the tax was $2 50 in Great Britain. I did not wish to be understood as admitting that the tax was no more here than there, for the reason that I presume the production of whisky in England costs very much more than it does in the western States of the United States. I think it is mainly manufactured out of much more costly grain, and perhaps it would cost, instead of thirty or forty cents, as with us, a dollar a gallon to the manufacturer. Therefore, the tax is not so great on the article there as it is here.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I only rose to say what I have said, that I do not believe the remedy lies in the reduction of the tax. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORRISON] made an observation that I think contains the solution of the whole question; and that is, make your penalties personal; let them apply to the person; subject the person who violates the law to the pains of imprisonment, and you will reach a remedy that will be conclusive.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senate does not seem to think it is necessary to come to any vote on this question, and so I propose to indulge in the general latitude of debate which has been opened by other gentlemen.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I hope we may reach a vote at once. It is now three o'clock, and if we intend to act upon this bill at all we must dispose of it this afternoon.

Mr. SHERMAN. If I thought there was the slightest prospect of getting a vote within two hours I would not say a word.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think we are ready to take a vote now.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to reply to a few things that have been said in this debate. I will not reply to all the various questions about whisky that have been discussed here; but I will reply to one or two things that relate to this particular amendment. If we can get a vote, I only desire to occupy the time of the Senate for about five minutes; but if not, I want an hour or two, because it seems we have got to discuss the entire question of the whisky tax.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. We cannot pass the bill in time unless we dispose of it to-day.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the honorable Senator from Ohio to permit me to say a word. The Senator from Vermont cannot surely expect me to be so recreant to Bourbon whisky and Bourbon distillers as not to say something in their defense.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will not carry out the purpose that I had when I rose, which was to enter into the general debate. I shall not discuss the question whether the Commissioner of Internal Revenue ought to be invested with the power to settle suits, or the question whether a tax of two dollars is too much or too little; or whether there is some other mode that may be devised by human ingenuity to prevent frauds. All these are very interesting questions, and at the proper time I shall be perfectly willing to discuss them. I rose to give my views at length on the subject; but I shall not do so now. I have studied the question a great deal, and thought of it a great deal, and have been concerned more or less in making these laws; but the subject is too great, I think, to be fully considered this afternoon.

This bill is to take effect on next Wednesday. It relieves taxes from a multitude of industrial occupations. The whole country is anxiously expecting it to pass. It passed the House without a division; it passed the Senate with but three votes against it; so that I think both Houses of Congress desire it, and I know the people desire the passage of this bill. Now, the only question is, whether in this, its last stage, in this, its last vote, the bill is in a shape to command the judgment of the Senate. It is no longer open to amendment; no amendments can be proposed; and the only question is whether there are such defects in the bill now as will justify Senators in voting against it. As a matter of course, however, by refusing to confirm the report of the committee of conference and letting it go over, you can have another conference.

But, now, let me examine the objections that have been made to this report of the committee of conference. We entered into this examination entirely without any feeling in regard to these various questions. Every amendment of the Senate was concurred in without substantial modification except one; and here I must confess my regret, and, for the time being, my pain, that the Senator from Vermont found an objection to that section, although he himself was the most in favor of the section, and my impression is, assented to it, voted for it, and perhaps partly dictated its terms.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire to say in relation to the tax on sales, to which the Senator now refers, that the fact that that would include manufactures of lumber, bread-stuffs, and the various articles which are never taxed, did not occur to me until I read the report this morning; and I am as much in fault as any member of the Committee on Finance in relation to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, I will relieve the Senator from Vermont from all trouble on that account. There is now no tax on the manufacture of lumber, the manufacture of flour, &c., but there is a tax on every wholesale dealer who sells flour; there is a tax on every retail dealer who sells flour; there is a tax on every man who passes it through his hands; and that tax is one half the tax we now propose to put upon the manufacturer. Now, let me see what great bugbear this is. What is the tax imposed by this bill on a barrel of flour? Two cents. That is, if a miller should make more than $5,000 in the course of a year, on a barrel which is worth ten dollars, (which is above the average price, taking the United States at large, and a little less than its present price,) the tax is two cents a barrel, and that is paid by the miller. It is a tax of less than two per cent. on his tolls; yes, less than one per cent. on his legal tolls. The tolls are, I believe, one eighth or one tenth; so that it is a tax of two per cent. on his tolls. And now we are to pause in this last stage of this bill in order to make a discrimination in favor of the miller of two cents on a barrel of flour; and unless we do that we are subjected to the imputation of my friend from Nevada, [Mr. NYE,] that we are taking the poor man's bread. Why, sir, we tax the poor man's bread now. He cannot buy it from any dealer without paying a tax of one half the amount we now impose upon him. Is it wise to continue this effort of making discriminations merely to follow this thing down to a little, narrow tax of this sort? There is not a consumer of a barrel of flour in the United States of America that is worthy of the name who would object to this insignificant tax, and demand that, to save him two cents on his barrel of flour, we should make an exception in his favor. It does not operate against him at all, but only operates against the miller who is employed.

I heard the objection made in conversation that it would affect live cattle, &c.; but I find by reference to the internal revenue act that it does not. It only affects those defined as manufacturers, and it does not affect any of those who deal in various other articles, live cattle, &c. It is perfectly plain and manifest; we amend one single paragraph of a single section by inserting a tax on manufactures, just as we do with the dealers, and insert it in the dealers' tax. We now tax dealers one tenth of one per cent., and this would be a tax on manufacturers of one fifth of one per cent. By this bill we relieve the manufacturers from all other taxes. Should the manufacturers be entirely exempt from all tax, and a wholesale dealer, a retail dealer, a druggist, and everybody else be taxed by a special tax? Not at all. There is no reason in the world why they should not pay their fair share of tax; and as we have it now arranged by the assent of both the Senate and the House, it having been agreed to by both Houses, the tax is perfectly insignificant. As this manufacturers' tax passed the Senate, it was only imposed on all sales above $10,000. The House, however, changed it to $5,000, on the ground that there were a multitude of manufacturers whose productions were between five and ten thousand dollars who might pay this insignificant tax. How much is it? Suppose a lumberman conducts a business to the amount of $25,000, which is a pretty large business for a lumberman; or suppose a miller conducts a business to the amount of $25,000, and that is a pretty large business: you deduct the $5,000; and what is his tax? Forty dollars on a mill the actual production of which is $25,000. Why, sir, it is a perfectly insignificant tax, scarcely worth naming; and yet it will yield us about ten million dollars in the aggregate.

Now, Mr. President, I come down to the whisky tax. I regret, I am frank to say so, that the House put on this bill this provision in relation to whisky. I would have preferred that they had not done so; but let me say, in justice to the House of Representatives, that they did not put it on without the earnest demand and desire of the proper officers of internal revenue; and that was made known to me as well as to the House. My friend from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] criticised some remark which he said was made by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of the House. I have nothing to say in defense of such a remark as that, if he correctly reports it. I think the chairman of that committee will find he has a "hard road to travel" before he gets through with revising the internal revenue laws, if, indeed, such a remark was made. But this section cannot be charged to any particular member of the House nor to the House itself. It is the amendment of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, urged upon both the House and the Senate day by day; and why? The Commissioner says he is now utterly powerless to collect the tax on whisky; that the distilleries are running in open defiance of law in all the large cities of the Union; not in the country, because there he can control and watch them; but in all the large cities of the Union they are conducting this business in open defiance of law. The distillers are carrying on their distilleries and selling the whisky at one half, or a little over, of the tax levied upon it. How it is done we do not know. There is fraud somewhere. We know that no honest man will run a distillery and pay the tax of two dollars a gallon and sell it at a dollar and a half. It is utterly impossible. The man who would do that is either a fool or a lunatic, or he is a cheat. The very fact that he is willing to manufacture and go on day by day to manufacture whisky when he knows he cannot sell it in the market for more than one half the net cost to him is evidence that he expects to make up that difference by fraud. Now, I say, when you take that palpable fact and show that to have existed for ten days consecutively there you have plain and palpable evidence of fraud, of an attempt to defraud the law; and upon that fact you ought to close his distillery.

What harm can result if this amendment is adopted? The distilleries will be suspended for a time in certain districts in the cities. I do not think it will interfere with my friend from Kentucky, who is anxious about his Bourbon whisky, for that sells now in the market at three, four, and five dollars in some cases—from two to five dollars a gallon. It will not affect the small distilleries scattered through portions of Pennsylvania and Ohio. Most of them have been wound up on account of the competition of fraudulent whisky. There are scarcely any of them going. It will operate mainly in the cities, and enable the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to seize and close the distilleries there. Suppose he does it; what harm is done? The result is that it stops the manufacture of whisky for a time; it suspends the operation of the law for a time, at a season of the year when it may be done, when there are no hogs to fatten, no corn to feed them; when the ordinary operations of the distilleries are suspended as a matter of course; at a time when they are usually cleaned out. My friend from Indiana, I suppose, knows something about distilleries.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Not much; but that would not stop them.

Mr. SHERMAN. They design to stop them about now.

Mr. HENDRICKS. But this would stop them when they were going ahead.

Mr. SHERMAN. The ordinary course of the distillery is to stop about this time, and wait until the next corn crop to go into full play again.

Mr. DAVIS. About the 1st of June the big distilleries stop.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I thought you referred to the action of the Government itself.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, no. I say the distillers, as a matter of course, stop about this time; my friend from Kentucky says about the 1st of June; but I think generally in the spring of the year they stop and suspend operations until the next year's corn crop comes in, and they commence feeding hogs again and distilling whisky. That was the old-fashioned way of doing the business. But now whisky is manufactured out of molasses in little stills that could be put in the desk of my friend from Missouri, distilled from molasses in a cellar, under a livery stable; in every nook and corner of a great city; and there are now hundreds and hundreds of these stills working daily in the city of New York. They pay a license and they go on. Their stills are there. They are legalized. There is no power under the present law to stop the distillation of spirits. Now, all that this measure does is to authorize the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to suspend their operations. In the first place, they are required to suspend when the market value of the whisky is such as to indicate a fraud in its manufacture. Then power is given to the Commissioner to relieve them from these liabilities. It seems to me, therefore, that Senators will find nothing in this bill which should alarm them. If they will take it up and read these sections and apply them to the facts stated in these sections, they cannot find anything there that could be very injurious for two months. In the meantime, as we are informed, the House of Representatives are engaged in revising this whole internal revenue system, codifying the laws, presenting a new system. I do not know that we shall be able to agree upon the basis of that system. I do not know that we shall be able to agree about the mode and manner of collecting the whisky tax. I have my own ideas on that subject, which I could give to the Senate for an hour or two. I could make an answer to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORRIS] about his joint resolution that I think would silence him in about two minutes; but I do not want to go into that discussion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If you can do it in that time let us have it.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; I do not want to go into the discussion at all. I will state now that the power to settle suits is confined solely to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. The collector has no power over it. It is all on page 27 of the compilation of internal revenue laws. The district attorney is bound to report to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and obey his orders. If there is anything wrong it is in the Commissioner of Internal Revenue or the Secretary of the Treasury. There is no subordinate or divided authority. It may be done by the district attorneys under the general authority to enter a nolle prosequi; it may be done by the directions of the court, who may order the entering of a nolle prosequi. It may be done in that way by your judicial officers, but not by any collector; and it is necessary to have this power somewhere.

There was one thing in the argument of my friend from Indiana that struck me as very surprising. He was very anxious that you should not conclude against the distiller merely because he ran his distillery when it would not pay; that it was not fair to draw a conclusion against him and seize him on that account without giving him an opportunity to explain; and yet he would take away from all officers of the Government the power to settle a suit, even if the explanation showed that there was no guilty intent, no purpose to defraud, and no actual fraud committed. It is utterly impossible to consider the proposition of the Senator from Indiana without soon raising objections to it; and that is the difficulty. If you take up these various propositions you will find that the argument will go to an indefinite extent, and we shall arrive at no conclusion.

This bill is in a stage where we must either take it as it is or send it back to another committee of conference. If Senators have made up their minds that it is best to divest this bill of questions about whisky all they have got to do is to say so, and it can be very easily done; but if not, then, as a matter of course, they had better take the bill as it is. The House conferees may, at the next conference, abandon this section; the House may be compelled to abandon it; but my own opinion is that the bill as it stands will work no substantial injury to any interest whatever; that it will have an immediate effect of preventing the fraud in the distillation of spirits, and will yield us a large revenue by securing at least our hold upon that which is now in bonded warehouses. But if Senators think differently let them so vote.

I close my remarks by an appeal to the Senate to let us have a vote on this question and decide it one way or the other, so that we may get through with this bill to-night if possible. If not, I do not know when it will take effect, when we can pass it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, there is one feature of this bill that commends itself to my judgment; and that is, that it puts it in the power of the Government officials to close all the distilleries as soon as this bill is passed. The other feature of this bill, that they shall be permitted to go on for eight or ten days, does not commend itself to me; but what possible injury is done by having all the distilleries closed as soon as this bill is passed? No person who is honestly engaged in the manufacture of liquor has his distillery running now. It is, as has been said, absurd to suppose that a man will pay two dollars tax on whisky and then sell it for a much less sum. There may be persons who are honestly engaged in manufacturing for the purpose of selling hereafter, not removing it from their distilleries; but their number must be very small, if there are any. This legislation is in aid of such a person; because, by stopping the distilleries, it tends to raise the price of what he has in store; and there certainly is no impropriety in stopping all distilleries that are engaged in dishonestly manufacturing whisky. Therefore that feature of the bill I am in favor of.

The suggestion of the Senator from Maryland, that this is an ex post facto provision, I do not think is well taken. Where persons are engaged in violating the law it is not ex post facto to pass a law that they shall stop the manufacture altogether. Besides, I look upon this as a temporary measure. The attention of Congress is about to be engaged in other matters than legislation, and if we do not pass this bill now perhaps for weeks and months these distilleries will be engaged in flooding the country with this illicit manufacture. And besides that, in all probability, if we do not adopt this amendment, we shall lose the relief bill to the manufacturers of the country. For these reasons I am in favor of adopting the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I am very much impressed with the belief that the subject of whisky, from its extent and difficulty and the amount of revenue which it produces to the Government, ought to be made the matter of a special law. I believe it would be for the interest of the Government and of the manufacturers of whisky, and of the country generally where grain is sold to the manufacturers of whisky, that the whole subject should be matured in a single bill; and I would be very much gratified, myself, if gentlemen would come to that decision.

But, in relation to the matter now under consideration, I will inquire of the honorable

Senator, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, if the subject of whisky was attached to the bill under consideration before there was any difference between the two Houses.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, yes; there was nothing about whisky in the bill until it went back to the House with the Senate amendments; but they attached to our manufacturers' amendment, as it is called, several other amendments, and then this provision about whisky, for the first time.

Mr. DAVIS. There was a disagreement between the two Houses in relation to manufacturers?

Mr. SHERMAN. And several other matters.

Mr. DAVIS. And whisky was added after that disagreement had arisen?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; there was no disagreement at that time. The Senate made its amendments, but that was no disagreement. The bill went back to the House with the Senate amendments, and then the House amended our amendments and added this proposition in the third stage.

Mr. DAVIS. There was, of course, a disagreement between the Senate and the House to the extent that the Senate made amendments to the House bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. The House of Representatives agreed to our amendments in relation to the tax on manufacturers' sales, with an amendment embracing two new sections on an entirely different subject from any contained in the bill.

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir. The matter as it is presented after this explanation shows that the committee of conference had no jurisdiction to take cognizance of the subject of whisky. As I understand the rules of parliamentary proceeding, it was improperly ingrafted upon the bill at a time when there was a disagreement between the two Houses in relation to some propositions, and when, according to parliamentary law, the committee of conference had cognizance only of the matters that were then in disagreement between the two Houses.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. The section was introduced and passed in the House of Representatives before the bill went to the conference committee.

Mr. DAVIS. That I understand; but the parliamentary law in relation to committees of conference is that it is only upon points in regard to which the two Houses have disagreed that a committee of conference has any jurisdiction; because, otherwise, the provision of the Constitution that a bill shall be read three several days in either House, if it be required, and the further provision of the two Houses that there shall be entire freedom of debate upon all propositions, and not only of debate, but of vote, a vote of acceptance or rejection, would be violated by this illegitimate mode in which committees of conference for the last few years between the two Houses have acted in relation to all subjects. It is a provision of the Constitution that bills shall be read three several times on as many days, unless that provision be obviated by the consent of the two Houses; and, in relation to all amendments that are legitimately offered to bills in the House and in the Senate, there is not only the freedom of debate, but a perfectly free vote. Now, sir, from this clandestine manner—and I use the word in no offensive sense—in which subjects are ingrafted upon measures by committees of conference, both the freedom of debate and the right to take separate and distinct votes upon each proposition are defeated; and that, of itself, in my judgment, is a sufficient ground for the rejection of this report of the committee of conference. There has been no opportunity to take a separate and distinct vote in the Senate in relation to this whisky proposition. According to the rule in relation to all reports of committees of conference you cannot divide the report; you cannot take a vote upon one feature or provision of a report of a committee of conference disconnected from the whole report; but you have to vote upon it as an entirety; and in this way the benefit of discussion, and especially the privilege of a separate and distinct vote, is denied to the Senate; and that, I maintain, is a sufficient ground for the rejection of this report.

But, Mr. President, it seems to me that there is a plain, practical principle upon which all the legislation of Congress in relation to the tax upon whisky might have proceeded, and which has been violated by the system as long as it has been in operation. It seems to me further that the experiences of the present mode of levying and collecting taxes ought to have induced the abandonment of the principle upon which this legislation has proceeded long since. That principle is to impose the tax upon the amount of whisky that is distilled of a particular proof, and to have a very complicated and difficult system of assessing and collecting the revenue, and numerous officers to discharge those duties. I suggest to the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance, in my judgment, a simple principle by which this complexity and difficulty of the system and its liability to fraud and evasions may be obviated. The capacity of every distillery can be computed with almost mathematical certainty. Men who are experienced distillers require but a few days of experiment to compute, with almost perfect exactness, the capacity of every distillery, be it a steam distillery or a copper distillery. If that position be true it furnishes a simple rule by which the whole system of taxation might be imposed. Impose a tax upon the distillery according to its capacity to produce liquor, and require the distiller to pay it.

If that system was resorted to it would be almost impossible to perpetrate frauds by the distillers; and it would greatly simplify the system, lessen the number of officers to carry it into execution, and, of course, decrease their salaries in the aggregate and greatly diminish the opportunities for fraud and evasion. It would require, in truth, but two officers—an assessor and a collector. One officer would go to a distillery; he would compute its capacity, and the tax would be assessed, if you please, payable weekly, or daily, or at any short period that should comport most with the certainty of collecting the revenue. I do not see any objection whatever to the adoption of that principle.

Mr. President, in my section of the country there are a great many distilleries. With the exception of three or four large establishments, they are generally engaged in what is called the copper distillation of whisky. They make the very best article that can be made. They fear no fair competition; but they are undersold in the market; and by whom are they undersold? By the distillers, or the purchasers of whisky that is distilled without the payment of tax. The distillers in Kentucky desire, if this system is to be continued, that the rate of taxation shall be inexorably collected from every distiller. They are willing to cooperate; they are willing to give their consent to any system of taxation that will certainly and infallibly collect the tax from the manufacturer of the article. It is the fact that other manufacturers of whisky evade the payment of the tax, and by that means carry their article into market and undersell those who honestly and fairly pay the tax upon the whisky, to which the distillers of Kentucky take the most exception, and which is, in truth, the great danger that they have to encounter in the manufacture of whisky.

But the honorable Senator from Ohio stated distinctly a few days ago that the object of the present system was to suppress small distilleries wholly; that in a very short time the distillation of whisky would be in a few hands. I think he stated that the number of big distilleries now was only about fourteen, and that this system of having meters to test the proof of the whisky, some of which cost $2,000, would soon drive the small distillers entirely from the business, and would monopolize it in the hands of a few large manufacturers. That system ought not to be encouraged; it ought not to receive any favor. I agree with the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] that the revenue system of the United States ought not to be founded upon any such principle as that. Instead of seeking to suppress all over the country, not only in small but in moderate establishments, the manufacture of the article wholly, and causing it to be manufactured by a few wholesale manufacturers, in whose distilleries frauds take place so extensively as to defraud the revenue of about three fourths of the amount that should be collected from the tax; if Senators would adopt a system that would distribute the manufacture of this article over the whole country and confine it to men whose distilleries had a capacity of one or two or three or four or five barrels a day, instead of producing a monopoly for the big distilleries that make from fifty to one hundred barrels a day, there would be an infinitely less amount of fraud; you would receive more revenue, and you would have a greatly superior article of manufacture. Men will drink whisky; there is no way of trying to prevent it; and Congress ought not to legislate so as to impose upon them a poison instead of the pure article. If those who use whisky were poisoned, in a few days or in a few months this great and fruitful product of revenue would entirely cease to be manufactured. If you want to increase the manufacture of whisky or to keep it up at its present amount, you must keep up the number of consumers. The number of consumers would be perpetuated by the wholesomeness and salubrity of the article, not by its being merely red-head, rot-gut, or anything of that kind. The honorable Senator from Oregon, I presume, even to sell the stock which the Government has in bond, would hardly be willing that that stock should be of the qualities to which I have made reference, because it would kill the consumers, or at least a large portion of them, and would reduce the capacity to use the article. There is no manner of doubt about that.

But the honorable Senator from Indiana struck the true principle. This tax is so enormous, so unjust, and so oppressive that no man feels that it is turpitude to evade its payment if he can. When legislation becomes unjust and oppressive, and when it assumes the principle of putting down all fair competition and of securing monopolies to large manufacturers, and in that way does injustice to a vast number of the community, the people lose their sympathy and respect for such a system; and, instead of feeling that they are subjecting themselves to any dishonor or to any turpitude by evading the payment of such taxes, they feel that they have a right to defeat the imposition of such taxes upon them by any mode that they can make successful. It is, then, only by the punishment of frauds upon the revenue and by making them degraded and infamous that you can create a personal motive with men to abstain from an evasion of the payment of the tax. There is no greater truth than this; and it is proved by all experience that where taxation is enormous and excessive you multiply the propensity and the inventions for the evasion of that taxation.

If you want your revenue collected fairly, with facility, and without fraud, you must reduce the tax to a reasonable amount. You must make it just, according to the sentiment of the country. You must not legislate with a view to suppress a particular business by one class of manufacturers, and throw it as a monopoly into the hands of a few others. You must have an equal, fair, and just system of taxation, and to have such a system as that you must do away with your costly meters, which a distillery of the capacity of two or three barrels a day cannot afford to pay for. You must have a simple system; and that simplicity can be secured, according to my belief and what little knowledge I have of the subject, by imposing a tax upon the capacity of each distillery without regard to the quantity or proof of the liquor that is made. Ascertain how much each distillery has the capacity to produce, send an assessor there to assess it according to its capacity, and then send your collector and collect the tax according to its capacity.

My friend from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] has furnished me with the gross amount of whisky tax collected in five years. In 1863 it amounted to $3,229,997. The tax then was but twenty cents a gallon, and only for a short period of the year. In 1864 it was raised to fifty cents, and I believe for a part of the year it was a dollar. I do not recollect certainly whether the dollar tax went into operation during any part of the year 1864 or not; but in that year, when the average tax was fifty cents or less, the aggregate amount collected was $28,231,997.

Mr. HENDRICKS. At what rate of tax was that?

Mr. DAVIS. Twenty cents, fifty cents, and perhaps a dollar for a part of the year 1864; but if so, only for a small fraction of that year. I have no doubt, without having made an estimate, that the average rate of tax levied upon whisky in 1864 was under seventy-five cents, at any rate; and yet the gross product of the tax was upward of twenty-eight million dollars. In 1867 it was something over twenty-eight million dollars; about two hundred and fifty thousand dollars more than it was in the year 1864. In 1867 we were under the two dollar tax system. It was estimated upon the best information that in 1867 there were about ninety million gallons made. The amount of tax was only a little over twenty-eight million dollars; a tax upon only fourteen million gallons and a fraction of whisky. There were five times as much whisky made in that year as paid any tax. This is the grievance, and the point of the grievance of my constituency who are interested in the manufacture of whisky.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Let me ask the Senator who makes that estimate that ninety million gallons were produced in 1867?

Mr. DAVIS. It was made by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, was it not?

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. By the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and the Special Commissioner of Revenue, both.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not believe myself the production was more than half of that.

Mr. DAVIS. I was struck by a remark of the honorable Senator from Indiana. He spoke of the decrease in the manufacture of whisky in Indiana. Now, it occurred to me, and I believe it to be true, that the decrease was not in the aggregate product of the article; there was only a change in the section of country that produced it. The number of distilleries has greatly increased in some of the cities, especially in New York and Brooklyn. The whisky that was formerly manufactured in Indiana, and a portion of it in Kentucky, that was the pure and genuine article, was diminished in its manufacture there, to be transferred to the greater production of the distilleries of the cities where the inferior and adulterated article is produced. I believe, from everything I have heard, that there was as much whisky distilled in 1867 in the United States as there was in 1860; but it was made in different localities; it was a different, inferior, and pernicious article; and instead of paying a tax upon all that was made, there was not a tax levied upon more than about one fourth or one fifth of the quantity that was made. I believe that if the rate of taxation had been fifty cents, and it had been collectable from the distiller at his place of manufacture, there would have been something like double the amount of revenue produced from whisky last year that was collected and paid into the Treasury.

I cannot doubt, myself, I do not doubt, that it is a perfectly easy and accurate mode of levying a tax upon whisky to tax the capacity of every distillery; and when you have done that you have so simplified the system and reduced the number of officers necessary to assess and collect the tax that there will be little or no evasion or fraud in the collection. If you choose to make it at the rate of two dollars a gallon, be it so; but have a system that will collect the revenue equally from the dishonest, or those who are disposed to be dishonest, as from those who are honest.

The honorable Senator from Oregon takes it for granted that every distiller is a knave. I dissent entirely from that proposition. I know the distillers in my region of the country, and they are men of as much truth and rectitude as the rest of society. They are not tempted there to go into frauds as they are in large establishments. Why? As I said once before, in the congressional district in which I live, with the exception of four or five distilleries, the whole of them are of moderate capacity, and are what are called copper distilleries. There was, in the month of December, if I recollect aright, about one hundred and forty-seven thousand dollars of revenue collected from the distilleries of that district. Much the largest portion of that revenue was collected from the numerous small copper distilleries that exist and operate in that part of the country. These men are willing, if you will, to encounter the system of revenue at two dollars the gallon, but they want Congress to impose it so that each gallon of whisky, whether made by a small or a large distiller, whether by a steam or copper distillery, shall be required to pay the tax that is levied upon it.

I do not believe it practicable, I do not believe it possible to collect that rate of tax off whisky. If you have any success whatever in taxing the whole amount that is manufactured, and in realizing what would be a proper amount of revenue from the distillation of spirits, you must bring down that tax to at least one dollar per gallon; and, I think, if you were to bring it down to half a dollar, and make the distiller pay it, you would realize the largest amount of revenue that you can realize from the distillation of the article.

As to this proposition, that if one man be dishonest and commits fraud in his distillery, and sells his product at less than the rate of tax upon it, his delinquency, his offense against the law, his moral turpitude, shall work the same consequences upon honest and innocent men that it works upon him, it is monstrous. The principle is utterly revolting. There may be now in the district represented by Mr. BECK a fraudulent and dishonest distiller. I have heard of one or two. He may be selling his article at less than the rate of tax imposed upon him; but I know that the most of the men who are engaged in that business in that district are men of integrity; that they are meditating no frauds upon the public revenue, that they are perpetrating none; and, because there is one dishonest scoundrel living in a community where there are one hundred other good men engaged in the same business, that his delinquency and his crime should put it into the hands of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to punish the whole of them by stopping their business and ruining them in their fortunes, is the most monstrous principle of legislation that I have ever yet known to be presented to Congress.

I trust, Mr. President, that the report of the committee of conference will be voted down for the benefit of the revenue. I would not care if all the revenue which the people of America had to pay was collected off whisky, if it was practicable; but, for the benefit of the revenue, it seems to me that the present erroneous and most unsuccessful system of taxing whisky should be abandoned, and one more correct and more simple ought to be adopted; and I believe it would be to the interest of the Government and the people that the system should be regulated by a special law.

Mr. HOWE. In one respect at least, Mr. President, I think this Government can properly be said to resemble the Deity: it is long suffering and slow to anger. We have been told from year to year that the annual product of distilled spirits was from eighty to one hundred million gallons. It used to be that in the old halcyon days of the Republic, before the war came upon us, when we had but about twenty-six million free white drinkers, and the rest was made up of slaves who did not drink. Now we are all free, all emancipated, and all at liberty to take something, [laughter;] and under these circumstances it would be natural to suppose that the demand had somewhat increased; and so of the supply. There is no reason therefore for claiming that the product of distilled spirits is less at the present time than it was before the war commenced; that it is less than eighty million gallons per year.

When the nation came to look about itself, straining to find those sources from which it might derive revenue most easily, most readily, and most abundantly, its eye naturally fell upon this subject, this object—distilled spirits. Here was a product amounting to eighty million gallons. If it would pay two dollars per gallon, there would be $160,000,000 in the Treasury; and Congress said, after several experiments, they would try the experiment of reaping two dollars per gallon from it. Everybody knows that if a man must pay taxes, there is no object, there is no subject, there is no occasion, there are no circumstances upon which, or under which, he will pay taxes so readily, so abundantly, so liberally, as upon this article of whisky. A man, I suppose, can hardly take a glass of first quality Kentucky whisky without feeling a strong desire to contribute a quarter of a dollar, at least, to somebody. [Laughter.] And to offer him this opportunity to contribute a few cents—a fraction of that quarter of a dollar—to the Government, do you not see, is making the habit patriotic, making it respectable, allaying it to the uses of the Government, making it subserve for once in the history of the world, a good purpose? It adds to the respectability of the thing. And so I was always fondly in favor, enthusiastically in favor of this effort to collect two dollars a gallon, and not a dime less, from this article.

The moment the experiment was set on foot it began to be said that there were difficulties in the way; that the two dollars were not paid promptly; that they were not received regularly into the Treasury. From that time to this I have looked on to see whether the Government would surrender to what is called, I believe in common parlance, the "whisky ring," or whether they would capture the "whisky ring." Whenever any complaint has been made about the difficulty of collecting this revenue, we have found those who urge in explanation of it right off, "The tax is too high; put it down to a dollar, and you can collect it; put it down to fifty cents, and it will come of itself." Mr. President, if your Government cannot collect two dollars, it cannot collect two cents; and if it cannot collect two dollars, it is not fit to be trusted with the expenditure of two cents. If it cannot collect two dollars, I would not give two dollars for it; and I will sell out my interest in it any day, on any opportunity, for that money.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will you sell now?

Mr. HOWE. Let us have the money. When it be confessed that the tax cannot be collected let me see your two dollars. I am not prepared to sell just now to my friend from Vermont, because I am not prepared to subscribe to the doctrine that the tax cannot be collected. We had great difficulty in whipping the rebellion; but we did it. We have, I admit, great difficulty in whipping whisky; but I think we shall do it; we will master it in the end.

I have, therefore, not been prepared to acquiesce in the suggestions of those gentlemen who tell us the tax is too high. I have been hoping that in the course of events and after the lapse of time, when our financial ministers became ripened by experience, their judgments matured by observation, they would produce some plan by which the Government would be enabled to collect this tax. It has been threatened from year to year, and there have been various new measures proposed from time to time; some have been adopted; some have been rejected; and I believe the more perfect they got the machinery the less money they got, as a rule. [Laughter.] And we are told to-day that with the latest modifications patented, instead of getting what we got the year before, about thirty million dollars, or two million five hundred thousand dollars a month, now we only get about one million dollars a month; and, driven to desperation, they have finally framed this bill and brought it before us. I am not prepared to say what would be the revenue derived from whisky under this bill, and I am not so curious to know, I think, as to be willing to try it.

Mr. President, I lack faith in the efficacy of this measure. I lack faith in any part of it. This very first amendment I do not quite understand, or, if I do understand, I think I object to it. This first amendment tells us—

That after the 1st day of June next no drawback of internal taxes paid on manufactures shall be allowed on the exportation of any article of domestic manufacture on which there is no internal tax at the time of exportation.

Then it proceeds to say—and I am glad I have the attention of the chairman of the committee, because he can doubtless explain this passage to me:

Nor shall such drawback be allowed in any case unless it shall be proved by sworn evidence in writing to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that the tax had been paid, and that such articles of manufacture were, prior to the 1st day of April, 1868, actually purchased or actually manufactured and contracted for, to be delivered for such exportation.

Mr. SHERMAN. Do you want an explanation of that?

Mr. HOWE. I want an explanation of that; at least I want to know if it be the purpose of that to relieve against the operation of the act passed in January last?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all. It has no connection with that. Under the present law all manufactures in this country, when exported, have a drawback of the amount of internal tax paid.

Mr. HOWE. But I understand the act of January last took that away.

Mr. SHERMAN. This has nothing to do with that; no connection with it. This is the drawback that the manufacturers receive.

Mr. HOWE. And is there not a drawback on distilled spirits?

Mr. SHERMAN. The tax is not paid on exported spirits now. There is no drawback on spirits, because they are put in bond and exported in bond.

Mr. HENDERSON. From a bonded warehouse.

Mr. SHERMAN. From a bonded warehouse. That section was carefully considered by such merchants as my friend from New York [Mr. MORGAN] and Mr. HOOPER, of Boston, who understand it. It is simply regulating the mode of collecting drawback when goods of domestic manufacture are exported abroad, and giving some two months time to export in compliance with contracts made before the 1st of April.

Mr. HOWE. And why was the date "before the 1st of April" fixed upon?

Mr. SHERMAN. Because the internal tax on manufactures is repealed by this bill, to take effect on the 1st of April, and consequently the cases could not arise of drawback after the 1st of April or after the 1st of June now, as we have made it.

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir. I was not at all confident that there did not somebody understand it; I was only confident that I did not understand it myself. It may not be at all objectionable in that point of view. The fourth section, I think, is objectionable, because I do not think, as others have said, and I shall not dwell upon the point, that this is the time or the occasion to venture to put a new tax upon the manufacture of new articles—just while you have conceded the propriety of remitting all taxes—to put even a small tax on the manufacture of these most necessary articles of existence.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to correct my friend, and also other Senators. There is no new tax imposed by this bill. The present tax is on wholesale dealers in the same articles precisely.

Mr. HOWE. Manufacturers?

Mr. SHERMAN. No. There is a tax on all wholesale dealers now, and this extends it to manufacturers as well as dealers. The special tax on manufacturers is repealed, and the general tax applicable to wholesale dealers is extended to manufacturers, only it is put at twice the rate.

Mr. HOWE. The tax is moderate in amount, to be sure, and I should not spend much time in debating that. I think it is unadvisable to resort to that source of revenue at the present time. But the fifth section has been commented upon by various gentlemen, and I should not spend any time upon it myself if my objection to it harmonized altogether with the objections that have been urged by others. I do not object to this section because I think it hard, because I think it severe, because I think it onerous; quite the contrary. I have thought, as others have intimated, that you never would have a wholesome administration of your revenue laws until you had taken out from the circle of those who have been most active in the production of this article and some others that I could mention, and from the circle of those who have been most prominent in collecting the revenue from it, a pretty large percentage, and transferred them to your penitentiaries. Your best school for educating the public up to the method of collecting revenue, I think, is found there.

So I am not at all startled by this proposition to impose the penalty of imprisonment added to fine upon those who deliberately practice frauds upon the revenue of the Government; and I certainly am not very much alarmed at the severity of this second clause which, recognizing the palpable and unmistakable fact that in a community where distilled spirits from which the Government demands two dollars a gallon to its revenue are openly and habitually sold at $1 50 and $1 25 such a transaction is not only prima facie but conclusive evidence of fraud on the part of those who manufacture it and those who deal in it, requires them to stop doing so. I do not think that very severe; and I do not think it is reprehensible in the law to say to them "you shall not do so any longer;" especially when it acts so deliberately as this statute proposes to do; when it does not allow the Government to speak until they have looked on upon the operation ten days. It deliberately requires of the Government to stand and look on and see this thing done ten days and only then to say peremptorily "you must stop doing it." In other words—this is the interpretation of the clause—the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with his agents planted about in different districts, when he finds that this fraud is being committed one day, is to tell them to look on and see if it is done another day, and if he finds it done another day he is to say "still watch and see if it is done another," and if he finds it has been done eight days right along, this thing which is regarded by the law as conclusive evidence of fraud, then the law says through the Commissioner "if you dare to do it two days more," what then? "We will make you stop doing it!"

That is the law that is proposed here as a measure to correct these frauds. What is the practical effect of that? What is the practical use of it? Here is a district in which the Commissioner finds that whisky is manufactured and whisky is sold at a dollar and a half or a dollar a gallon. Of course the Government has not got its two dollars. The Commissioner watches that state of things for ten days, and then he tells the distiller—there is but one in the district, you may suppose—"stop." "Oh, certainly," says he; "I will stop;" and he continues to stop. He is in no hurry to go on with that business. He has a supply on hand. He stops how long? He stops until the Commissioner tells him he may start again. When will the Commissioner tell him he may start? If he is honest he will tell him he may start as soon as whisky may be sold there at a price which will pay the Government its tax. If he is dishonest I do not know when he will let him start; but, no matter when, by and by he tells him he may start again. Well, he starts. He may not offer any for sale until he gets just as large a quantity manufactured as he has capital to manufacture. He can clean out his stock in whisky if he does not pay any tax to the Government at any time within ten days. So, of course, you do not get the slightest protection from this provision against dishonest men.

There is something in the objection urged here that it includes innocent men, innocent manufacturers, within the same penalties with the guilty. I do not put much stress on that, because I do not believe much in the innocence of distillers in a community where their products are sold for from fifty cents to a dollar less than the Government demands in revenue.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] undertook to make us believe that that was entirely consistent on the theory of perfectly honest distillation, because, he says, considerable of an item in the profits of distillation consists in feeding the refuse to stock, and a distiller may have a large quantity of grain on hand intending to fatten, and with contracts out for fattening stock; and it may be a great injury to him to stop him at once with this stock on his hand, not permitted to fatten it. I do not suppose the Senator from Indiana will really insist that it is an advantage to the grain to run it through the mash-tub; that it is worth more to be fed to the stock after it has been through the process of distillation than it is before. I suppose the stock would not starve if he stopped right where it was and fed the grain to the oxen and to the hogs without running it through the mash-tub at all. They would live if they would not fatten. They would live not only a prosperous life, but a sober life, and get ready to be killed just as quick, and die a sober death. [Laughter.] No, Mr. President; the Senator from Indiana does not mean that these gentlemen who are engaged in the distillation of whisky can afford to pay anything for the privilege of running their grain through the process of distillation in order to feed it out to cattle.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator argues as if the whisky was of no value.

Mr. HOWE. I beg my friend not to misrepresent me to that extent. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENDRICKS. I did not believe that that was the Senator's real sentiment, [laughter,] still I thought perhaps he had expressed himself carelessly. I was going to suggest to him that if a bushel of corn will produce four gallons of whisky, and then the mashed grain after the alcohol has been extracted is worth fifty per cent. as food, does not that fifty per cent. enter, in an important degree, into the business of the distiller?

Mr. HOWE. Most unquestionably, Mr. President. Now let us see how the account stands. A bushel of corn will produce four gallons of whisky and he has got his corn in the distillery, and he wants to make it up. The Commissioner finds that whisky is sold at a price under the amount of the tax required by the Government, and therefore orders him not to manufacture. What is the hardship? The Senator from Indiana says that if it was not for that order he could make four gallons of whisky out of that bushel of corn, and after he had paid eight dollars to the Government he would have four gallons of whisky which he could sell at $1 90 per gallon, making $7 60; so that he would only lose on his distillation forty cents in cash; and the great advantage he would derive from that operation would be that the refuse would be worth fifty per cent. as much as the corn would be to feed to his stock! That is the operation in dollars and cents. I do not think it would be any hardship to the distiller to stop him before he had reduced the value of his corn fifty per cent.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not wish to be misrepresented on the whisky question, or on the corn question either. I do not claim that a man can afford to manufacture whisky and sell it for less than the tax; I do not approve of that; but a man may be willing to go on, his affairs may be in that condition that he would go on, and manufacture notwithstanding the fact that the price in the market was less than the tax. In the first place, he might hope that there would be a rise in the market, and in the second place he might have a stock of hogs to feed that must be fed. I do not know whether the Senator from Wisconsin is aware of the fact, but in very many cases the distiller makes a contract with farmers in the neighborhood to feed their stock for them, so much on the head per day. Then the Senator can see what will be the condition of the farmer and distiller both if he were to stop while the work was going on.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. NYE] remarked some time since that there were honest men engaged in this business of distillation. Now, I cannot positively deny that; but where this product is sold at the prices now paid for it, if the Senator would produce me a man who was distilling and paying the Government two dollars a gallon, as he must pay if he is an honest man, and selling at a dollar and a half or a dollar and a quarter; if he should succeed in satisfying me that he was an honest man, and therefore ought not to go to the State prison, I should certainly conclude that he was an insane man who ought to go to a lunatic asylum. That thing cannot be done.

Mr. NYE. Just make provision for that in the bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOWE. No, Mr. President, I am not framing the bill; I am objecting to it; and my objection is not, as I said before, that the provisions of this section are too stringent. If the conference committee will strike this out and put in the place of it a provision which holds every man in any community who sells a gallon of liquor at a price less than the Government demands for its revenues guilty of high treason, and will sentence him to imprisonment in the State prison for a term not less than one hundred and fifty years and then hang him by the neck until he shall be dead, to adopt the suggestion of a friend near me, I will consider the propriety of that. That would be satisfactory to me abundantly, in comparison to this.

Mr. SHERMAN. Would it be to anybody else?

Mr. HOWE. I do not know. I think it should be to the chairman of the Committee on Finance; I think it should be to the Committee on Finance; I think it should be to the financial minister of the Government; I think it should be to the Legislature of the nation, if they mean that this tax shall be collected. If they do not mean it, I think they had better say so at once and stop the struggle, and let us have peace on the terms on which the distillers are undoubtedly willing to grant it to us, come down to fifty cents or twenty-five cents, and I think you might as well come down at once to fourpence halfpenny a gallon, and then have quiet.

I want it understood if this section is rejected, my vote, as I shall give it in that direction, is not upon the objection which has been urged to it by other Senators. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] was on the floor some time since, and he put a question which I thought was pertinent, but which I did not hear any one answer. He asked, and I think he directed, his inquiry to the Senator from Ohio, the chairman of this committee, what have been done with the liquors which have been seized from time to time by the officers of the Treasury Department as guilty of offenses against the revenue laws? The question was not answered; but I have the answer in my hand, and the Senator from Maryland, if no other Senator, will doubtless be interested in knowing what has been done with these liquors. Sir, they have been sold. The Secretary of the Treasury has told us so, and he has told us what they have brought.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is the date?

Mr. HOWE. The date of the report?

Mr. SHERMAN. The date of sale.

Mr. HOWE. The date of sale is not given, but it is said to include all the sales made subsequent to the 2d of March, 1867. The report was made December 20, 1867. This is the report of the sales of liquors condemned by judicial decree. I find among other sales reported a sale of seventeen hundred and twenty-eight barrels of whisky condemned in the eastern district of New York, and these seventeen hundred and twenty-eight barrels yielded $4,918 61.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose that was sold subject to the tax—sold in bond?

Mr. HOWE. The tax had to be paid on this. There is no evidence of that in the report.

Mr. SHERMAN. The figures as read by the Senator are not evidence of that, of course, but the liquor was sold in bond, because the law expressly declares that it shall not be sold for less than the tax. It was sold, no doubt, subject to the tax. The law was read here awhile ago.

Mr. HOWE. Then here are sales of fifty-eight and a half barrels reported from New Jersey for $4,166 99. Was that sold subject to tax?

Mr. HENDERSON. That was thrown on the market.

Mr. HOWE. There must be some mistake somewhere. Both these sales could not have been subject to tax, and I take it neither of them was. In the northern district of New York eighty-four barrels were sold for $5,125 38, between one hundred and two hundred dollars more than the seventeen hundred barrels sold for in the eastern district of New York. So in Illinois, in the northern district, one hundred and thirty-five barrels sold for $3,775,008 18, while in the southern district five hundred and twelve barrels sold for $1,000,996.

Mr. HENDERSON. Five hundred and twelve barrels for a million! That must be a mistake.

Mr. HOWE. There is unquestionably a mistake somewhere. I do not know whether it is in the report or in the sale. These are the figures returned in the report.

Mr. President, of course, where the Government is furnishing whisky in the market at a dollar and a half or at twenty-five cents a gallon, you cannot expect honest distillers to carry on the business and pay two dollars a gallon tax into the Treasury. Repeatedly I have seen gentlemen whom I had known to be formerly engaged in the business of distillation, and who have told me that they have been obliged to close their business entirely because they could not consent to carry it on in violation of the revenue laws; and they certainly could not carry it on in conformity with them while everybody else was allowed to violate those laws with impunity. I want to see some measure put upon the statute-book which will make these frauds upon the revenue of the United States not, like treason, respectable, but, as some fond gentlemen meant to have treason—infaustus.

Several SENATORS. "Odious."

Mr. HOWE. "Odious." Is it as bad as that? Then I will go even to the full extent of saying "odious;" and when that is done you will begin to discriminate between honest and dishonest practices under your revenue laws.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the measure which is being smothered underneath all this debate is a very brief bill to take off some of the shackles that weigh down the arms of labor; and I rise for the purpose of appealing to the friends of that bill to allow a vote to be taken upon this conference report. Taking the expression so far of the Senate, it is not to be adopted, and it will follow that a new conference is to be ordered. The ordinary hour of adjournment has already arrived; and on Monday, at the ordinary hour of meeting or immediately afterward, the Senate is to proceed to the consideration of business which precludes altogether the possibility of disposing of this; so that I suppose it will be necessary to adjourn until, say eleven o'clock on Monday morning, in order to hear the report of another conference committee, if a new committee shall be ordered. Now, while this debate is instructive—certainly I do not wish to intimate that it is not—and while it is all material to those points to which it relates, I do not think that it is indispensable to an intelligent action upon the pending proposition, and I trust, Mr. President, that we shall vote either upon this motion or upon a motion to be submitted by somebody—I do not propose to submit it myself—to non-concur and ask for another conference, to the end that the committee may have the rest of this evening to confer after our message shall be sent to the House, and be able to come in on Monday morning by eleven o'clock, so that we may then pass a law which, if it is lost in all this wilderness of talk, will carry great and just disappointment to the whole country. We have talked about relieving these taxes. I believe another committee can agree on a bill which, avoiding the whisky difficulty, will enable us to act finally upon that measure; and I trust Senators will postpone to a more convenient season any debate which they feel does not necessarily relate to this question.

Mr. HOWARD. I move that the Senate disagree to the present report and ask for another committee of conference.

Mr. CONKLING. Now let us have the vote.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That does not present any very new question, Mr. President, as the question before was on agreeing. I merely wish to say—and I will not occupy two minutes in saying it—that I shall vote to send this bill to another conference, not because I am not willing to try every experiment possible, either to collect the tax the law imposes upon whisky or else to stop the production of whisky. I will try any experiment and in trying such an experiment I wish it to be as effective a one as possible. But there are defects in this section that strike me at the first blush, and which I wish to call to the attention of any subsequent committee.

First, it proposes to forfeit every piece of real estate that is used by a distiller, whether he owns it or not, in the production of whisky contrary to law. I believe that to be entirely unjust. The proprietor who leases his property may be entirely innocent of any such use as this to which it may be put, and therefore he ought not to suffer in consequence of such action. If he connives at it he ought to suffer; but if he does not he ought not.

Then, in the next place, it is entirely uncertain from this section what is meant by "selling indirectly at a market price." I think the use of that term "market price" will lead to great confusion, and it should be reconsidered and made more definite.

Again, in the latter part of the section it is left entirely to doubt whether the distilleries are to be closed in the district of sale or in the district of manufacture, or in both. The language is so entirely vague that it is impossible on the face of the section to tell which of the places is to suffer by being shut up. It is desirable, of course, to have that rectified. That is, although merely a verbal criticism, a point that in practice it will be of great importance to have thoroughly understood.

These are the reasons, Mr. President, without going into any others, why I shall vote to send this bill back, not because I will not go with the committee in any reasonable experiment to endeavor to accomplish the object they have in view.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, of course at this time of the day I am not going to speak on this subject, although I have felt some anxiety to do so. I withhold myself from the debate, very much opposed though I am to this report, in the expectation that it will not be agreed to, and that we shall have an opportunity to debate whatever measures shall be eventually adopted by the Senate on this subject. I desire to say that much now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan moves that the Senate non-concur in the report of the committee of conference and ask of the House of Representatives another conference on the subject of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

Several SENATORS. Oh, no; do not take the yeas and nays.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, I insist upon the yeas and nays. I want the vote of the Senate to be on record that the other House may understand the view of the Senate.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CAMERON. Before the vote is taken I wish to say that I have tried for four or five hours to get an opportunity to say a word on this subject. I shall not now detain the Senate under the circumstances by which we are surrounded. I will only say that I am going to vote for this report because I desire to have the tax collected, and I shall vote for every scheme looking to that purpose which the Committee on Finance shall bring in to this body. Acting upon this principle, I shall vote for this proposition, and at a future time I may, perhaps, explain somewhat at length my reasons for doing so.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I shall vote against the proposition actuated by a different consideration entirely from that of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.] I do not believe that the tax of two dollars a gallon upon whisky is to be collected by severe and extraordinary and unusual penalties.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then you are in favor of recommitting.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am. I shall vote against concurring in this report. I understood the Senator from Pennsylvania to say that he was for concurring, because he believed in these penalties. I do not believe, in this enlightened and Christian age and in this day of the world, that you are to prevent crime by the extremity of your penalties.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President—

Several SENATORS. Let us vote.

Mr. CAMERON. You shall have the vote in a moment. Just let me say in reply to the Senator from Illinois, that I believe the tax can be collected, and therefore I am going to vote for every measure which I think will produce the collection.

Mr. ROSS. Before the vote is taken I wish to say that I am paired on this question with the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. NORRIS.] If he were here he would vote in the affirmative, and I should vote in the negative.

Mr. THAYER. I am paired with the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORRIS.] If he were present he would vote in the affirmative and I should vote in the negative.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 23, nays 9; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Chandler, Cole, Conklings, Davis, Dixon, Edmunds, Fessenden, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, McGreey, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willer, and Wilson—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Cameron, Cattell, Frelinghuysen, Henderson, Morgan, Pomeroy, Sherman, Sumner, and Wade—9.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Connors, Corbett, Cragin, Doolittle, Drake, Ferry, Fowler, Grimes, Harlan, Morton, Morrill of Maine, Norton, Ross, Saulsbury, Sprague, Stewart, Thayer, Vickers, Williams, and Yates—22.

So the report was non-concurred in and a new conference asked for.

Mr. CONKLING. I now move that when the Senate adjourn it be to meet at eleven o'clock on Monday.

Mr. SUMNER. I suggest ten o'clock.

Mr. CONKLING. That is too early.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that it be ten o'clock. I think that with a view to the public interests an additional hour only will not be enough.

Mr. CONKLING. Allow me to suggest that there is half an hour under the rule. Half past twelve is the time for the other business. By meeting at eleven we shall have a morning hour and half an hour besides. I do not think the Senate will be willing to come as early as ten o'clock, and therefore I say eleven.

Mr. SUMNER. There need be no committee meetings on Monday. I think it better that we should come at ten o'clock.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I would suggest to the Senator making this motion that the House of Representatives must first act on this question before it can come to us again. If we shall meet at an early hour on Monday we shall gain nothing. Besides, under our rules, every day, even though we should sit upon the impeachment, there will be a session of the Senate on the adjournment of the court, and we can go on with this subject in the afternoon.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I desire to make an inquiry whether I am right in supposing that the bill which has just now been disposed of has been informally before the Senate, so that the naval appropriation bill will be the regular order for Monday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir. The naval appropriation bill is now regularly before the Senate; but the pending motion is that when the Senate adjourns it be to meet on Monday morning at eleven o'clock.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask if a message has gone to the other House announcing our action on the manufacturers' bill. The House is waiting for the message.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate ordered another committee of conference to be appointed but did not say how it should be appointed. How shall it be appointed? ["By the Chair."] If there be no objection the Chair will appoint the committee. It will consist of Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. HOWE, and Mr. MORTON.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust that as I was on the other committee I shall be relieved. It is not usual to put a member situated as I am upon a second committee. I voted in the minority.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate excuse the Senator from Ohio. ["No!" "No!"]

HOOR OF MEETING.

Mr. NYE. If it is in order, I wish to submit a motion to take up a bill.

Mr. CONKLING. What has become of the privileged motion in reference to the order of meeting on Monday?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to inquire whether that is a privileged question, or, indeed, whether it is in order at all, as the rules fix twelve o'clock as the hour of meeting.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A motion is in order to fix any hour for the meeting. The Senator from New York moves that when the Senate adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet at eleven o'clock on Monday.

Mr. SUMNER. I move to amend that by making the hour ten o'clock.

Mr. JOHNSON. I hope not. In all human probability we shall be kept here until five or six or seven o'clock on Monday; and to meet at ten is rather taxing us too much.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York, that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet at eleven o'clock on Monday.

The motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 19) requiring certain moneys of the United States to be paid into the Treasury, and for other purposes; and it was signed by the President pro tempore.

POLITICAL DISABILITIES OF R. R. BUTLER.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill for the relief of Mr. Butler, of the House of Representatives, a bill which we ought to act upon. It was up some days ago, and I presume every member of the Senate can understand it without explanation. It is important that the Senate should decide one way or the other in reference to it. He is a member-elect to the House of Representatives, and the case ought to be disposed of. Let us take it up and act on it this evening. We can act on it I think in a few minutes.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If the Senate is disposed to proceed with business, I want to finish the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope the Senator from Maine will not interpose the appropriation bill to-night. The reason I ask to call up Mr. Butler's bill is to get it out of the way of the Senator's bill. It is a matter that ought to be decided.

Mr. BUCKALEW. When the bill to which the Senator from Illinois alludes was up before, I had the floor, and had proceeded part of the way with my remarks upon it when I gave way to a motion made by the Senator from Ohio to take up a tax bill, I think. Now, whenever that measure is taken up I desire to conclude my remarks upon it. I do not suppose the Senate will care to hear me to-night.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois moves to take up the bill (H. R. No. 870) to remove political disabilities from Roderick R. Butler, of Tennessee.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If the Senator from Illinois wishes to proceed with the consideration of that bill at the present moment, I will not object to laying aside informally the regular order before the Senate to oblige him, but I do not wish to have it displaced.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is what I desire. I do not wish to postpone the appropriation bill, but I want action on this measure. If the Senate will allow this to come up and be disposed of, I shall be very glad.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have no objection that the regular order should be laid aside informally to do that thing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking up the bill for consideration.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to—ayes eight, noes not counted.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Now I propose that the special order be laid aside informally, that the bill of the Senator from Illinois may be taken up.

Mr. HENDRICKS. What is it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been proposed to lay aside informally the naval appropriation bill for the purpose of taking up the bill mentioned by the Senator from Illinois. No objection being made, that bill is before the Senate, and it will be read.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not think we understand in my neighborhood how the business stands. I do not understand that there has been any vote on the motion of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No, sir; the question was on laying aside the regular order informally to allow the bill to come up.

Mr. HENDRICKS. There is no such motion as to do anything informally.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can be done by unanimous consent, and in no other way.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is not given.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then I make a motion to lay aside the regular order for the purpose of proceeding with this bill, and I give notice that I will vote to take up the appropriation bill as soon as it is through, and I hope my friend from Maine will allow us to get it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill referred to by the Senator from Illinois is up.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I should like to know how it got up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was taken up by the Senate, and it will now be read.

The Secretary read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 870) to remove political disabilities from Roderick R. Butler, of Tennessee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. When this bill was last under consideration as in Committee of the Whole the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW] moved to amend the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, by striking out in line twelve the words "Constitution or;" so as to read, "any disabilities imposed by the acts of Congress known as the reconstruction acts."

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I shall address the Senate at some inconvenience from the fact that the papers which I had prepared for the further debate of this question are not at hand. However, sir, I will go on as well as I can and submit the additional remarks which I propose to make upon this measure before the Senate shall formally determine it.

When this bill was up before I pointed out the differences which existed between it and the case of Senator PATTERSON, of the same State, of Tennessee, from which this claimant comes, and I endeavored to show that in his case there were grounds for a much stronger appeal for removing or dispensing with a portion of what is known as the test-oath, the oath provided by an act of July 2, 1862; and I commented with some degree of earnestness, though with no ill-feeling, upon the conduct of the House in these two cases. Whereas in that former case, when we sent a bill to them asking them to dispense with so much of the oath as by some gentlemen was supposed to interfere with the admission of Senator PATTERSON, and sent it to them under circumstances that strongly appealed to their equity and to their courtesy also, they flatly and strongly refused to dispense with any portion of the oath; after which the Senate, upon further consideration, permitted Senator PATTERSON to take the oath in its entirety, which he did, and became a member of the Senate. It was then declared in the House by a Representative from Tennessee, who, I understand, is very anxious for the adoption of the present measure, that he would freeze in his seat before he would assent to dispensing with any portion of that official oath in the case of any member proposed for admission to the Congress of the United States. The House of Representatives refused our request; they rejected the bill which we sent to them, and they said, and said strongly, that this oath should not be relaxed; that it should remain a general rule upon our statute-book, and should be enforced in all cases that might arise.

Now, sir, we have before us a bill proposing to dispense with the oath in the case of a gentleman claiming membership in the House from the same State of Tennessee, against whose admission to that House, as appears by the report upon his case, there is much stronger objection than could be urged or was urged against the admission of Senator PATTERSON here. This gentleman was a member of the Legislature of Tennessee at the time of secession; he remained a member of that Legislature for a considerable time afterward; he voted for various bills passed by that Legislature intended to aid the rebellion and to encourage it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I would suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania and to the Senate, as it is getting late, whether it would not be as well for him to continue his remarks on Monday at eleven o'clock, if agreeable to him, and that we now adjourn.

Mr. BUCKALEW. As to that, I conform myself to the pleasure of the Senate. I began this argument on a former occasion, and as the Senate chose to take up the bill against my vote at this time I concluded to adapt myself to their action, and to go on. One thing is certain: so much interest do I feel in this question—not because this single man is involved, but because there are a vast number of cases behind this for which this will form a precedent—that I should consider myself derelict in the performance of public duty if I did not discuss it; and I entertain a strong hope that the Senate will refuse to pass this bill, and that for very good reasons shown. I desire to address myself to the Senate itself with reference to the decision of this case here, not for the purpose of influencing public opinion out of doors.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Will it be agreeable to the Senator to give way?

Mr. BUCKALEW. I will give way to a motion to adjourn.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 28, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CANAL AROUND DES MOINES RAPIDS.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, by unanimous consent presented a joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, in favor of the passage of a law indemnifying the citizens of Lee county, Iowa, for land and property used in the construction of a canal around the Des Moines rapids in the Mississippi river; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

SWAMP LANDS IN IOWA.

Mr. PRICE, by unanimous consent, presented a joint resolution of the General Assembly of Iowa, relative to swamp land selections made by the agents of the State during the years 1859, 1860, and 1861; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence was granted to Mr. BARNES till Monday, April 6, and to Mr. McCORMICK indefinitely.

LEAVE TO PRINT REMARKS.

Leave to print remarks was granted to Mr. MOORHEAD, who would have been entitled to the floor to-day, if it had been assigned to debate on the President's message. [See Appendix.]

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. VAN HORN, of Missouri, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 976) amendatory of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the year 1863, and for other purposes," approved July 14, 1862; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

REORGANIZATION OF NAVY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. VAN HORN, of Missouri, by unanimous consent, also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 977) to amend an act entitled "An act to reorganize the Navy Department of the United States;" approved July 5, 1862; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

CHANGE OF COINAGE.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, presented the following preamble and resolutions adopted at a meeting of the Toledo Board of Trade, held on the 3d day of March, 1868; which was ordered to be printed in the Congressional Globe:

Whereas Senator SHERMAN, chairman of the Finance Committee, has submitted a bill to the American Senate to change the coin of the United States to correspond with the French system, the same to bear on one side the emblems of France and the value of such coin in the French language, and the reverse to show American devices and the value in English; and whereas the expense of the proposed change is estimated by Commissioner Ruggles to be $600,000, to be paid by the United States; and whereas the only reason presented in support of this scheme is the better and freer circulation which it will secure for our coin in Europe, increasing the demand for precious metals in our markets, and stimulating shipments of the same to foreign countries: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That in the judgment of the board the decimal system of coinage originating with our organization as a nation and rooted in the habits and love of the people should not be abandoned to suit the standard adopted by foreign countries.

Resolved, That the French system offers no advantage to domestic commerce or the trade and industry of the country, and the wants of our people do not demand the proposed change in our national coinage.

Resolved, That the secretary be requested to inclose a copy of this action to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

DENISON B. SMITH, Vice President.
CARLOS COLTON, Secretary.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that that body had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the joint resolution (H. R. No. 19) directing that certain moneys now in the hands of the United States Treasurer, as special agent of the Treasury Department, be covered by warrant into the United States Treasury.

STAFF OFFICERS OF THE NAVY.

RIGHTS OF AMERICAN CITIZENS.

Mr. JUDD, by unanimous consent, presented resolutions in relation to the rights of citizens of the United States of America; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

POSTPONEMENT OF PRIVATE BUSINESS.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move that private business be postponed for this day for the purpose of proceeding with the Alabama bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope not. Private bills have had no show. I hope the gentleman will at least modify his motion so as to postpone private business until the Alabama bill shall be disposed of, so that if it shall be disposed of before the close of the day private business may be taken up.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I will modify my motion in that way.

The motion, as modified, was agreed to.

ADMISSION OF ALABAMA.

The House then resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 970) to admit the State of Alabama to representation in Congress, upon which Mr. KERR was entitled to the floor.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I ask the gentleman from Indiana to yield to me to offer an amendment to the substitute of my colleague, [Mr. SPALDING.]

Mr. KERR. I make no objection if it does not come out of time.

The SPEAKER. It is in the power of the House to amend the substitute, but the power to amend the original bill is exhausted.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I move to amend the substitute by striking it out and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

That the constitution framed by the convention of Alabama, which was submitted for ratification by the people at an election commencing on the 4th day of February, 1868, is hereby declared to be the fundamental and organic law for a provisional government for the people of Alabama, so far as the same is not in conflict with the Constitution and laws of the United States. And all State, county, and municipal officers elected at said election shall, on the 1st day of May, 1868, or as soon thereafter as possible, qualify as provided in said constitution and the ordinances of said convention, and immediately thereafter enter upon the discharge of the duties of their respective offices.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Governor at any time after he shall have qualified and entered upon the discharge of the duties of his office, may by proclamation convene the Legislature chosen at said election. The Legislature, when so convened, shall possess all the power conferred by said constitution, which may not be in conflict with the Constitution and laws of the United States. And the Legislature is hereby further empowered to submit said constitution to the electors of Alabama qualified to vote undersaid constitution, for their ratification or rejection at such time or times as it may designate. And said Legislature is also required to submit with the said constitution the "article" proposed in the fifth section of this act.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That whenever the people, by a majority vote of the qualified electors of Alabama, shall have ratified said constitution submitted as aforesaid, together with the article proposed in the fifth section, and the Legislature of the proposed State organization shall have ratified the amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and known as article fourteen, the constitution of Alabama may be presented to Congress for its approval.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the district commanders shall furnish all necessary aid in enforcing this act, and the act of March 2, 1867, entitled "An act to provide for a more efficient government for the rebel States," and the acts supplemental to and amendatory thereof, shall remain in full force except as modified by this act, until Alabama shall be restored to representation in Congress.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the State of Alabama shall be entitled to resume its constitutional relations with the national Government upon the fundamental condition that the following article shall be adopted and made a part of the constitution of said State, which shall be forever irrevocable without the consent of the Congress of the United States: "This Constitution shall never be so altered or amended as to operate as a denial or abridgment of the elective franchise to any citizen of the United States qualified to vote under this Constitution, and no amendment of said Constitution shall hereafter be valid until the same shall be ratified by a majority of the qualified electors of this State, and shall have been approved by the Congress of the United States."

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Has that amendment been printed?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. It has not. I ask that it may be printed if no vote is to be taken on this bill to-day.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I intend to call for a vote to-day.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker, it has many times been asserted in the history of Governments that revolutions never go backward. It seems now to be one of the tenets of the Radical party of this country that revolutions shall not only never go backward, but that they shall never cease to go forward; and it seems to have become so much a part of their political faith that it has become a necessity to them in the progress of their revolution to disregard and override their own laws and violate the provisions of their own statutes, in order to remove obstacles that arise in the course of their political measures and schemes. It is pretended now by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] that by some sort of torturing we may derive from the reconstruction measures themselves some justification for the proposed action of Congress. It will be found an impossibility to find any just excuse for such a construction, unless the search be made with a predetermination to find it. The spirit and intent of the reconstruction laws are utterly opposed to it. Everybody at the date of the laws understood them expressly to give the choice of modes in the rejection of any constitution that might be formed and submitted to the people.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] attempted by a verbal criticism upon the terms of the fifth section to justify the pending measure. Let us see if their appeal to that section affords any relief.

I, too, invite the attention of gentlemen to the same section in order, by a single word, to expose the fallacy that is apparent in his attempt to make that section justify this proposed legislation. I will read it:

"Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That if, according to said returns, the constitution shall be ratified by a majority of the votes of the registered electors qualified as herein specified, cast at said election, (at least one half of all the registered voters voting upon the question of such ratification,) the president of the convention shall transmit a copy of the same, duly certified, to the President of the United States, who shall forthwith transmit the same to Congress, if then in session, and if not in session, then immediately upon its next assembling; and"

I ask especial attention to the following portion of the section:

"If it shall, moreover, appear to Congress that the election was one at which all the registered and qualified electors in the State had an opportunity to vote freely and without restraint, fear, or the influence of fraud, and if the Congress shall be satisfied that such constitution meets the approval of a majority of all the qualified electors in the State, and if the said constitution shall be declared by Congress to be in conformity with the provisions of the act to which this is supplementary, and the other provisions of said act shall have been complied with, and the said constitution shall be approved by Congress, the State shall be declared entitled to representation, and Senators and Representatives shall be admitted therefrom as therein provided."

The obvious and only legal interpretation which this section can bear is that it is the intention of Congress to require that a majority of the registered voters shall vote upon the question of the adoption of this so-called constitution of Alabama; and that, "moreover," in addition thereto, besides that prerequisite and indispensable condition, the other facts recited in this section shall appear. So that there is no foundation in that section, as the gentleman attempts to set up, for this revolutionary movement against your own laws.

But we are told by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] that seven thousand instead of one thousand white men did vote at that election. And we are told at the same time that there are over twenty thousand white men in Alabama who are members of the loyal league, and I am authorized to infer from his language that these members of the loyal league in Alabama are all voters. And yet we are told that there could be no fair election there; that, notwithstanding the military despotism there, manipulated by the Radical party, in the hands of political adventurers, the camp followers and political tools of the Republican party, they are not able in Alabama to secure a fair election. We are told that, after the white men of that State were handcuffed and chained to the car of military despotism, with seven thousand white men voting at that election, and twenty thousand loyal-leaguers to aid the military and Freedmen's Bureau in securing the desired results, there could be no fair and legal election. I take it the people of this country will not accept any such arguments as those as containing any truth or affording the slightest shadow of justification for this legislation.

It is also contended, by way of justification for this legislation, by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] that all civil power in Alabama is in the hands of white rebels and rebel sympathizers, and that they prevented the holding of a fair election there or a fair expression of the public opinion upon this constitution. Now, I submit that, so far as that assertion is concerned, it is unworthy of one particle of respect, because, in the very teeth of that assertion, the country sees and knows and feels the fact that the people of Alabama are not under the control of a civil government, but that this Radical Congress, by its reconstruction legislation, has done what the rebellion never could do and never attempted to do; it has overthrown all civil government in the State of Alabama and set up its own arbitrary and despotic will for a government there, with its own tools, the mere agents of a party, to administer civil government. Yet we are told that the rebel sheriffs and other civil officers have prevented a fair election. We have also served up in this debate a batch of ex parte affidavits of men who have been elected to offices under this bastard government, or expect places after it is forced upon the State, in which they attempt to persuade us that enough negroes were kept from the polls by intimidation to make up the needed majority of the registered voters. But these men dared not, and were not allowed, to appear before the Reconstruction Committee and testify, subject to cross-examination, touching these matters. They get up these ex parte statements to promote their mere personal and selfish purposes, and I consider them entitled to no respect whatever.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. KERR. I can yield no portion of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] except for a question.

Mr. KELLEY. I simply wanted to state—
Mr. KERR. I do not yield to the gentleman for any statement.

Mr. KELLEY. My authority was derived from Democratic papers and speakers.

Mr. KERR. I do not yield to any remarks by the gentleman.

The truth in reference to this constitution is that when Congress enacted this reconstruction law it tendered to the people of Alabama two ways by either of which they might adopt or reject the pretended constitution. The people could either go to the election and vote against the constitution, or stay away, if they opposed it, and thus defeat it. It tendered to the people these two modes of rejection in good faith, I take it. It certainly indicated no bad faith or insincere purpose at the time. I will not presume, for I do not believe, that the party at that time intended or attempted to devise a trap into which the people might fall, and thus enable Congress, by a stupendous fraud, to force upon them a constitution.

The people of Alabama accepted those alternatives. They acted upon them. They rejected that constitution. They did it in pursuance of your own laws. They adopted their own mode of doing it, as they well might do according to the very terms of these reconstruction acts. Now it is proposed, in bad faith, in cruelly and wickedly bad faith, to turn upon those people and say to them, "You have rejected this instrument according to the terms of our law; yet you had no right to reject it in that way. You ought to have rejected it, if you desired to do it, in some other way, and then we might have sustained you in your action." The truth is they did reject it; they never did adopt it. It is not their constitution; it was not made by the people of Alabama; it was not made for the people of Alabama; it was not made in the interests of the people of Alabama. It is a Congress-made constitution, in violation of every principle of civil liberty heretofore universally recognized in this country.

Talk about this being the way to make government "republican in form." Why, Mr. Speaker, if the Radical party want to go to the country and the world as endorsing this mode of erecting governments "republican in form," then in God's name, I say, you are entitled to the distinction it gives. If in this way constitutions are to be framed, utterly void of the spirit and intent which above all things should pervade, should give existence and vitality to constitutions, then, I say, we may bid adieu to "republican forms of government" in this country.

If you were making this constitution for the negroes of Alabama alone I should not raise my voice in protest against it to-day, because I agree that the negroes in Alabama require to be governed by somebody else than themselves. But you pretend to be making this constitution for the white people of Alabama; and while you are acting under that pretext, you are violating every wish of those white people, and outraging every principle of civil liberty in the mode you have adopted to force upon them a system of government.

You assume that this constitution was made for all the people of Alabama. But its entire history and its intrinsic character show that it was conceived and framed in the interests of a political party. It is not made to promote the welfare of all the people, and its administration is not committed to the virtue, refinement, intelligence, and civil experience of the white people of the State. Its effect will be to deprive them of all control and submit them and all their precious interests to the control of the negro population, the latter to be controlled by the Radical party.

Only a few days ago the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] the chairman of the Reconstruction Committee, said, in the hearing of this House, speaking of the bill then pending, substantially the same as this:

"After a full examination of the final returns from Alabama, which we had not got when this bill was drawn, I am satisfied, for one, that to force a vote on this bill and admit the State against our own law, where there is a majority of twenty-odd thousand against the constitution, would not be doing such justice in legislation as will be expected by the people."

But now, taking back the just and righteous conclusion of his judgment, then he proposes to force this hateful government on Alabama with increased and degrading conditions.

The same honorable gentleman offered on the day before yesterday an amendment to this bill. Let us see what it provides. It declares:

"That the right of suffrage of citizens of the United States shall never be denied or abridged in said State on any account except for treason, felony, or other crime infamous at common law; but suffrage as above provided for shall forever be universal and impartial."

This language does not even confine the suffrage which the honorable gentleman would establish by act of Congress in Alabama to males over the age of twenty-one years. In unqualified, unlimited terms it declares that suffrage shall perpetually be "impartial and universal" in the State of Alabama.

Mr. Speaker, the first speech I had the honor to make in this House was against this wretched, this revolutionary heresy now so rapidly being adopted by the Radical party of this country, that Congress may regulate suffrage in all the States of this Union. At that time this doctrine found but few advocates on this floor who were willing or had the courage publicly to announce their faith in it. But how is it now? In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to invite the attention of the House to the opinion entertained on this question less than two years ago by the same honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] who to-day takes back, eats up, and spits upon every one of the teachings of his past life on this most grave proposition.

But why should we complain of inconsistency on the part of the majority here? They are not restrained by any laws, although made by themselves, nor by any constitutional limitations upon their power, and infinitely less by their own political platforms, when the progress of their revolution requires them to violate them. I will let the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] on this great right of the States to maintain their own forms of local self-government and to regulate their own suffrage, answer his revolutionary position of to-day by his true and honorable position of less than two years ago. I read from his speech in this House when speaking of the proposed fourteenth article of amendments to the Constitution of the United States, and when referring to these same southern States:

"I hold that these States have the right, and always have had it, to fix the elective franchise within their own States, and I hold that this does not take it from them. Ought it to take it from them? Ought the domestic affairs of the States to be infringed upon by Congress, so far as to regulate the restrictions and qualifications of their voters? How many States would adopt such a proposition? How many would allow Congress to come within their jurisdiction to fix the qualification of their voters? Would New York? Would Pennsylvania? Would the northwestern States? I am sure not one of them would. Therefore if you should take away the right which now is and always has been exercised by the States, by fixing the qualification of their electors, instead of getting nineteen States, which is necessary to ratify this amendment, you might possibly get five. I venture to say you could not get five."

I might read further in the same direction, and thus make the honorable gentleman answer himself and answer every position that is assumed to-day by the friends and advocates of this infamous bill; but I will not occupy in that way the time of the House.

Mr. Speaker, we are told that this is a constitution for the people of Alabama, and that they made it. The white men of that State protest that they did not make it and do not want it. They prefer even a decent military government by white men to any government by negroes under the manipulation of the skirmishers, camp-followers, and political colporteurs of the Radical party, or of any other party. They stand upon the sacred, original, indefeasible, and God-given right of self-government. They tell you what you and all the world know, that the negroes, whether thus manipulated or left to themselves, are alike incompetent to govern themselves or any other people. You confess the truth of this protest when you organize your machinery for the government of the negroes by your Freedmen's Bureau; you confess it when you prolong the existence of that bureau; you confess it when you provide that the educational part of that bureau shall be continued in existence for an indefinite number of years after the States shall have been fully restored to the Union; you confess it when you assume a Federal guardianship over the negroes in all the southern States; you confess it when you impose millions in taxation upon the people of the North to enable you to continue this condition of pupillage and dependence on the part of the negroes; you confess it when and as long as you refuse to remit these negroes to the control of the natural law and the law of God, which condemns idleness and requires all men to struggle for self-support, and to learn by the discipline of experience and necessity; you confess it when you expend, directly or indirectly, for the government, education, and support of negroes, from fifteen to twenty-five million dollars per annum out of the hard earnings, honest labor, and unaided energies of the people of the North. You confess your own shame, too, when you confess, as many gentlemen do, that this sort of legislation is necessary to enable you to retain continued political power in the country.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, rose.

Mr. KERR. I will yield for a question with great pleasure.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I was going to answer.

Mr. KERR. I cannot yield to be answered now, but only for a question or correction.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I understood you called for an answer.

Mr. KERR. I do not wish to yield for a speech to be put in mine.

The Radical party in Alabama, Mr. Speaker, do not themselves pretend this constitution was freely and voluntarily made by the people of Alabama. They sacrificed their manhood; they surrendered their self-respect; they surrendered their inherent God-given right of self-government and got down upon their miserable knees to the Radical party in making this constitution, and in its presentation to Congress and asking it to be forced upon the people of Alabama.

I hold in my hand a proof of what I say on this subject. The chairman of the Radical central committee of Alabama, on the 2d of January, 1868, issued an address to his followers in that State, and in that address I find this paragraph:

"II. Some features of the constitution that have been adopted have provoked severe and general criticism. It is just and proper to remark that enough is now known of the purposes of Congress to assure us that while the State will expect to be admitted promptly those features will be subject to complete revision. And it is better far to be admitted now, and with this understanding, than, after being tossed about so long, to go to sea again not knowing where we land."

Thus we see it confessed, to the dishonor of the men who want to become masters and rulers in Alabama, and contrary to all precedent in our country, that Congress is to make the constitution anew, to change it, to amend it, or to dictate such terms as Congress pleases to the tools of Congress in the State of Alabama or to the remonstrating majority of the people of that State. The address then proceeds as follows:

"III. Enough is also known of the disposition of Congress and of the Republican party in this State to warrant the statement that the existence of political disabilities in any case need not fetter the party in the choice of a candidate for any office, but that the fact of a Republican nomination will be sufficient evidence of favoring reconstruction to be relied on for the prompt removal of all disabilities."

It is in this way and by such considerations that white men are to be induced to stultify themselves, surrender their judgments, and become allies of the Radical party in its efforts to force a hateful, odious, and anti-republican constitution on all the people.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, it will not be any longer pretended that this constitution comes here as the voluntary work of the people of Alabama. It does not possess a single essential attribute of a freely-adopted government of the State of Alabama. If it is a principle of republican government in this country that the people who are to be ruled by the fundamental law of a State have the inherent and undeniable right to make that law, then in God's name I say this constitution possesses not one of these attributes.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I invite attention briefly to some remarkable provisions contained in this bill.

Mr. MULLINS rose.

Mr. KERR. I do not yield.

Mr. MULLINS, (in his seat.) Have they lost their fundamental rights?

Mr. KERR. No, sir; they have not. But, whatever they have lost, they have given you no power to change their government for them or to dictate one to them. Any attempt to do it is simply usurpation.

Now, let us see what are some of the provisions of this bill. I call attention to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] offered as a substitute for the bill. It is proposed in the first section of that amendment to declare that "the constitution framed by the convention of Alabama, which was submitted for ratification by the people at an election commencing on the 4th day of February, 1868, is hereby declared to be the fundamental and organic law for a provisional government for the people of Alabama."

Provisional government for the people of Alabama! What is the logical result and legal effect of that kind of a proposition? It is to make this constitution a matter of pending legislation before this body for its consideration, for adoption or rejection as the law of Congress. It does not attempt, it does not present even a pretense of attempting, to recognize a constitution made by the people of Alabama, but to make a law for the provisional government of the State, a sort of territorial act.

Then this amendment proposes that Congress by an act of legislation shall make a body of legislators, elected as a State Legislature under a pretended existing State constitution, a constitutional convention, conferring upon them powers which that same constitution denies to them, and which belong alone to conventions elected to make constitutions, not to Legislatures elected to execute constitutions.

It is provided in the second section of the proposed amendment that when this Legislature shall have been convened they shall possess all the power conferred upon them by the proposed constitution of Alabama if the same had been ratified by the people. And then it further proposes, after this rejected constitution is given vitality by Congress and put into practical operation, that they may submit this proposed constitution to the people of Alabama for ratification, with or without amendments. Amendments to be proposed by whom? By this provisional government, by this pretended Legislature of the State of Alabama. But what are these amendments to be proposed? Why, they are to be amendments to the constitution which now lies on our desks, and which it is pretended has been formed by the constitutional convention of the people of Alabama. In other words, this Legislature is declared to have the power to make a constitution for the people of Alabama. In other words, it is further declared by this act of Congress that this Legislature shall have the power at its first meeting, after the members shall have taken the oath prescribed in the constitution itself, to go to work at once and by its very first act violate its own fundamental law, its own constitution, because that constitution in its last chapter prohibits the making of amendments except in a certain very tedious, cumbersome, and bungling way. It is proposed, then, not only by Congress to violate this fundamental law of Alabama, but to authorize this pretended Legislature of Alabama to violate the constitution of Alabama and the oath of office taken by its members to support it and every principle of decent government known to our institutions.

It is further provided by the last section of the proposed amendment or substitute that until all these things shall have been done by this newly-created legislative convention your military despotism shall continue in full force and power in the State, and that the people of the State, including the Legislature, the courts, the civil officers, and everybody else, shall be under it, subject to it, controlled by it, and that the election to be held and ordered by this new constitutional convention shall be held and ordered as it has hitherto been; in violation of every principle of just government or of self-government.

But in this proposed substitute of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] I think there is a secret and hidden purpose, more cruel, wicked, and tyrannical than any expressed upon its face. The reconstruction laws under which the registration of the people of Alabama was made, the constitutional convention elected, and the pretended constitution voted upon by the people, prohibited certain classes of white men from registration or voting and disfranchised them. But the number of persons disfranchised is greatly increased by the provisions of this pretended constitution. It requires a new registration. That registration would have to precede the submission of the constitution again to the people for ratification. Thus the relative power of the negroes and Radicals in Alabama to adopt the constitution and further disfranchise and oppress the whites will be greatly increased. Hence this cunning device of a provisional government, which consists in imposing upon that State a Congress-made constitution and giving force and validity to its meanest and most oppressive provisions, so that by their aid its adoption may be secured.

Mr. Speaker, I further invite attention to the last section of the bill itself as introduced by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH.] It is proposed by that section that the constitution of Alabama, whatever it shall be, when it shall be submitted to the people and shall have been adopted by them, "shall never be so amended or changed as to deprive any citizen or any class of citizens of the United States of the right to vote who are entitled to vote by the constitution herein recognized; nor so amended or changed as to allow any person to vote who is excluded from office by the third section of the fourteenth article of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States." And then it reserves to Congress the power to annul any amendment of the constitution of Alabama or any act of the Legislature of the State contrary to the provisions of this section.

Now, I would inquire of any honest man on this floor or in this country whether, if the State of Alabama shall ever be admitted into the Union under this law and in pursuance of its provisions, with these shackles proposed by this last section upon her limbs, that State can stand up in this family of republics and say she is the equal of her sisters, when she will come into the Union with a brand of degradation and inferiority upon her, put there by the edict of this Congress and made absolutely perpetual, irrepealable? Thus, for the first time in our history, it is proposed to admit into the Union a State inferior in most vital powers to her sister States. The great bond and precious principle of equality, of equal statehood in the Union, is broken, is rejected, and a hateful Union of unequal members is to be established. This is a most dangerous innovation, and will erect a most vicious precedent in our history. In every instance in our past history when a State has been admitted into the Union its equality has been guaranteed in express terms by the act of admission. The usual formula has been that such State be "admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States." The spirit, intent, and genius of our institutions demand that when a State is admitted the measure of its obligations shall consist in obedience to the Federal Constitution and the laws made in pursuance thereof. All powers not granted in that instrument to the Federal Government are, by its very terms, "reserved to the States or to the people respectively." And yet we are told that this is to be a government "republican in form!" A government that the people despise, that they loathe, that they reject in every way that is left to them by military despotism to express their feelings.

It is a somewhat interesting fact, in connection with the history of this State of Alabama, that when she was first admitted she inserted in her coat-of-arms, as the motto of the State of Alabama—which motto expresses the true philosophy of the Constitution of the United States in reference to all the States—"Younger, but equal;" and you can see it now inscribed on her coat-of-arms in the beautiful canopy which covers this Hall. In that motto is expressed the law of this country; a law most important, most valuable, most vital to the essential principles of the equality of State governments, of equal self-government, which have always characterized the legislation of the country, either in these Halls prior to the ascendancy of the Radical party or in the States of this Union.

In this connection I invite attention to the fact that in 1845 there was decided by the Supreme Court of the United States the case of Pollard's lessee vs. Hagan et al. I read from that decision, reported in 8 Howard's Reports:

"To maintain any other doctrine is to deny that Alabama has been admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, the Constitution, laws, and compacts to the contrary notwithstanding. But their rights of sovereignty and jurisdiction are not governed by the common law of England as it prevailed in the Colonies before the Revolution, but as modified by our own institutions. In the case of Martin and others vs. Waddell, 11 Peters, 410, the present Chief Justice, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: 'When the Revolution took place the people of each State became themselves sovereigns, and in that character had the absolute right to all their navigable waters and the soils under them for their own common use, subject only to the rights surrendered by the Constitution. Then to Alabama belong the navigable waters and soils under them in controversy in this case, subject to the rights surrendered by the Constitution to the United States; and no compact that might be made between her and the United States could diminish or enlarge these rights.'

Yet it is proposed by this measure that the State of Alabama shall come into this Union only upon the fundamental condition that she shall indorse certain conditions precedent, certain stipulations, certain compacts which, if adopted, will forever degrade her below the rank of an equal State in the Union. I say, Mr. Speaker, that if this thing shall be forced upon the people of Alabama it will not possess one whit of legal or constitutional validity.

But, sir, we are told that all this legislation is carried on for the purpose of the "better government" of the rebel States. Better government! If this matter were not so intensely grave and solemn as it is, that expression might be received as a mere caricature, or as bitter and cruel irony, upon the conduct of Congress in reference to these States. If Congress has entered upon the duty of making constitutions for States in this Union, as it certainly has done, as it is boldly declared in this law that it will do, and that it has the physical power and right to do—for no honest man will say it has got the constitutional right to do it—then I submit to the House that it is our duty to make for Alabama, at least, a decent constitution; one that is in fact and in truth republican in form and not a despotism. We have no right to make it, and if we should make the most faultless instrument that ever came from human hands and force it upon the people of Alabama it still would not be a constitution republican in the spirit and intent of that word. But still we are doing it, and therefore it becomes our duty to consider what it is that we are doing, what it is that we are forcing upon Alabama, what kind of constitution it is that we are tendering her. And I desire now to invite the attention of the House for a short time to some provisions that are contained in this constitution.

I first refer to the fact that by an express article of the constitution it is provided,

"That all persons resident in this State born in the United States or naturalized, or who shall have legally declared their intention to become citizens of the United States are hereby declared citizens of the State of Alabama, possessing equal civil and political rights and public privileges."

Why force that unprecedented constitutional provision on the people of Alabama? It has no precedent in the constitution of any State in this Union. Why, then, force it upon Alabama? Because the party in power must be able to go into that State, and, in the persons of citizens of other States, mere adventurers, assume the control and civil administration of the government of the State of Alabama. And to that end the constitution of Alabama must provide that every man who shall come into the State and declare himself a resident thereof shall possess all civil and political rights and public privileges, including the right to hold office.

Hence it is that we to-day see the shameful and disgraceful spectacle presented here of a civil government proposed to be set up in the State of Alabama, the great majority of the persons holding office under which consists of citizens of other States, who have no interests or sympathy with the people of Alabama, but are simply place-hunters, political adventurers and vultures, that now swarm in the devoted States of the South, and seek to make themselves masters over their people, to fatten and filch from their substance, and defeat the return of material prosperity by prolonging insecurity and strife among the people and between the races.

I next invite the attention of gentlemen to the test-oath that is prescribed in this constitution. I will not devote much time to its consideration, although in my judgment it is one of the most important and obnoxious provisions in that instrument. It is one which, above all others and more than all others, stamps the instrument with the inherent and intrinsic character of anti-republicanism and despotism. The genius of our Government, the very spirit of our forefathers revolts at the idea of incorporating into a fundamental law any of these odious test-oaths, these mean-spirited, detestable, retrospective, expurgatory test-oaths, which free men throughout the history of the world have ever held to be most worthy of their detestation. I will read that provision of the constitution. Article seven provides:

SEC. 3. It shall be the duty of the General Assembly to provide, from time to time, for the registration of all electors, but the following class of persons shall not be permitted to register, vote, or hold office: 1. Those who, during the late rebellion, inflicted, or caused to be inflicted, any cruel or unusual punishment upon any soldier, sailor, marine, employé, or citizen of the United States, or who, in any other way, violated the rules of civilized warfare. 2. Those who may be disqualified from holding office by the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States known as article fourteen, and those who have been disqualified from registering to vote for delegates to the convention to frame a constitution for the State of Alabama, under the act of Congress to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States, passed by Congress March 2, 1867, and the acts supplementary thereto, except such persons as aided in the reconstruction proposed by Congress, and accept the political equality of all men before the law: Provided, That the General Assembly shall have power to remove the disabilities incurred under this clause. 3. Those who shall have been convicted of treason, embezzlement of public funds, malfeasance in office, crime punishable by law with imprisonment in the penitentiary, or bribery. 4. Those who are idiots or insane.

"SEC. 4. All persons, before registering, must take and subscribe the following oath: I, _____, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support and maintain the Constitution and the laws of the United States and the constitution and the laws of the State of Alabama; that I am not excluded from registering by any of the clauses in section three, article seven of the constitution of the State of Alabama; that I will never countenance or aid in the secession of this State from the United States; that I accept the civil and political equality of all men; and agree not to attempt to deprive any person or persons, on account of race, color, or previous condition, of any political or civil right, privilege, or immunity enjoyed by any other class of men; and, furthermore, that I will not in any way injure, or countenance in others any attempt to injure, any person or persons on account of past or present support of the Government of the United States, the laws of the United States, or the principle of the political and civil equality of all men, or for affiliation with any political party."

Tell me that the constitution with this test-oath in it is "republican in form?" You might as well tell me that Haynau himself was the impersonation of a true Republican. I object to these test-oaths because they violate one of the most fundamental provisions contained in the Constitution of the United States. They contain in effect both bills of attainder and ex post facto laws, and violate some of the most essential principles of civil liberty. A bill of attainder is a legislative act which inflicts punishment without a legal trial.

An ex post facto law is one which imposes a punishment for an act which was not punishable at the time it was committed, or imposes additional punishment to that then prescribed, or changes the rules of evidence by which less or different testimony is sufficient to convict than was then required. Either of these violations of the Federal Constitution may be effected by provisions embodied in a State constitution or law or in an act of Congress. The prohibition of the Constitution was intended to secure the rights of the citizen against deprivation for past conduct by legislative enactment, under any form, however disguised. These most valuable principles have been repeatedly defended by the Supreme Court in solemn judgments declaring void, not only acts of State Legislatures and laws of Congress, but even constitutional provisions in State constitutions. This was done in the late great case of Cummings against the State of Missouri, in 4 Wallace's Reports. This pretended constitution of Alabama violates every principle laid down in that case. The purpose of these two sections is to disfranchise and withhold most valuable rights and privileges from thousands of white men in Alabama as a punishment for past conduct, without trial or conviction, and to prolong the denial of these precious rights during the pleasure of Congress and the negro government of Alabama.

The oath prescribed in this third section has no parallel in modern governments. It is fit only to mark and disgrace the sway of an oppressor. Every person who refuses to take it is therefore deprived of some of his most precious and valuable rights and privileges, and if he does take it he does violence to his own manhood, judgment, and conscience. He is compelled to swear that "he accepts the civil and political equality of all men," which he knows exists only in the imaginations of political Utopians or demagogues. He is also compelled to swear that he "agrees not to attempt to deprive any person or persons, on account of race, color, or previous condition, of any political or civil right, privilege, or immunity enjoyed by any other class of men." He is thus required under oath to agree, before he is permitted to exercise any of the rights of a free American citizen, that he never will exercise certain of those rights. One of the inherent rights of every human mind is to change his opinion on subjects connected with politics, policy, and government, and to make the government a fair reflex of the enlightened popular judgment. But in Alabama this cannot be done. The voter must swear and agree that he will never attempt any improvement in the government or change in the basis of suffrage in his State. He may be profoundly convinced that the safety of civil liberty, the welfare of both races, the interests of society, morality and religion demand the limitation of colored suffrage or its reduction to a property or educational qualification, but his oath stands as a perpetual bar to any effort to do his duty in these matters. Very few men not themselves purblind fanatics can take this oath without violence to their convictions, a sort of moral perjury. How can northern men, who may go to and desire to become citizens of Alabama, take such an oath when all their lives in their own States they opposed, voted against, and resisted every attempt to establish any such dogma?

These scandalous provisions disclose a purpose not only to control the actions, but also to debase, demoralize, and enslave the judgments and consciences of men. Governments in this country that do not express the honest and voluntary will of the governed are simply usurpations or despotisms. That will cannot be chained without doing violence to every principle of civil liberty and defiance to the laws of God.

But it may be said by honorable gentlemen that these provisions in the constitution of Alabama are justified by the proposed fourteenth article of amendments to the Constitution of the United States. But that article is not to-day the law of the land. It never has been ratified, and I pray God it never shall be; and if it ever is it will be against the will and judgment of the white people of this country. It will be done under the lash of military power; it will be done at the dictation of the Radical party; and, if done, it will involve in itself a palpable violation of the fundamental principles of republican government as prescribed for this country by our fathers, in just so far as it approves or makes valid these infamous test-oaths.

But I now invite attention to another very remarkable provision in this constitution of Alabama. The white men of Alabama, in the constitution which they made for their own government and for the government of the black men, exempted $500 of property from execution for debts. They considered that just, liberal, and sufficient for the purposes of humanity and good government. But what does this radical constitution do? What does this convention of negroes and Republican camp-followers do? They provide that $3,000 worth of property shall be exempt from execution for the payment of debt. I read from article fourteen:

"Sec. 1. The personal property of any resident of this State, to the value of $1,000, to be selected by such resident, shall be exempted from sale on execution or other final process of any court issued for the collection of any debt contracted after the adoption of this constitution.

"Sec. 2. Every homestead not exceeding eighty acres of land, and the dwelling and appurtenances thereon, to be selected by the owner thereof, and not in any town, city, or village, or, in lieu thereof, at the option of the owner, any lot in the city, town, or village, with the dwelling and appurtenances thereon, owned and occupied by any resident of this State, and not exceeding the value of $2,000, shall be exempted from sale on execution or any other final process from a court from any debt contracted after the adoption of this constitution."

Now, can any gentleman in this House say that he believes there are to-day in the entire State of Alabama twenty negroes who are each the owners of $3,000 worth of property? I do not believe there are ten negroes in the State of whom, under this constitution, one solitary dollar could be collected by law for any debt or civil obligation. Why is this provision adopted? Is it to make this constitution "republican in form?" Ah, no; it is done to make the civil government of Alabama in perpetuity radical in its administration. That is the object. It is a bid for negro votes. It is a bid for the control of a debased, demoralized, corruptible population. That is the way you propose to illustrate your ideas of government "republican in form."

I make no objection to any just provision on this subject. My own State has adopted an exemption of only $300 in favor of the debtor. But what I solemnly protest against is the mean partisan animus that pervades this entire instrument, this part no more than others. But I venture the prediction now that if the shackles shall ever be removed from the white men of Alabama and they obtain the control of the State, which rightfully belongs to them, the negroes will become their allies, because they will find in them their best and truest friends and protectors. The result of the exacting and selfish reign of radicalism in that State, as in every other State, will tend more and more to burden and impoverish the people of all classes. It will promote strife and hatred instead of good-will, peace, and prosperity. It will never bring the races together in harmonious and intelligent coöperation. It will inspire the ignorant negro with false and baseless fears, organize him into secret societies the better to control his political actions and enslave his feeble judgment, and attempt, by his aid, to control the legislation of the country and retain partisan power. The poor negro, sooner or later, following the guide of his instincts, if not his awakening reason, will discover that radicalism has done him no good and will renounce it.

Mr. Speaker, I next invite attention to the provisions of this remarkable instrument on the subject of taxation for the maintenance of schools. Now, I desire it to be distinctly understood that I and, so far as I know, every gentleman on this side of the House, entertain as sincere a devotion to the interests and advancement of education everywhere as any men in this country; but we want those interests so advanced, so promoted, as not to make them the very engines of tyranny for the oppression, demoralization, and destruction of social and civil government. This constitution provides for the levying of most onerous taxes for the support of education in the State of Alabama. Those taxes must be nearly all paid by the white men of Alabama. Yet every dollar (and I assert this without the fear of successful contradiction)—every dollar that shall be so raised will go to the education of the negroes of Alabama and to the support of radical officers connected with its expenditure, not to the support and education of white children. Why? Because by your fundamental law you make it a perpetual obligation upon the people of Alabama that they shall educate all their children in the same schools; that they shall practically amalgamate; that they shall educate the white children in debasing, personal association with the black children under the control of your Freedmen's Bureau and the agents of your military despotism, or such other machinery as shall succeed them. Yet we are told that this is a government "republican in form." These white men of Alabama, in order to maintain their self-respect, their manhood, the integrity of their blood and race, will be compelled from their own impoverished pockets to draw whatever they may for the education of their own people, independently of any provision that may be made by the State under this constitution. Why did you not suffer your political allies in the convention of that State to secure to the negroes their just proportion, or one half, or even more, of the school fund, and give to the white men the balance, so that the races might be educated apart? Would it have been anti-republican to make so just an adjustment? It would have secured justice and equality to both races in the enjoyment of the school funds. The refusal to do it is a disgrace to the convention and to the Radical party, and an outrage upon the white people.

Then this constitution gives to what it calls a school board legislative power, making them a sort of imperium in imperio. They may make laws; they may enforce those laws, no matter how rigid, how cruel, how exacting they may be, they must be obeyed until by the Legislature of Alabama they may be repealed.

Mr. Speaker, I invite attention to another provision of this remarkable instrument. It is provided in article nine that—

"All taxes levied on property in this State shall be assessed in exact proportion to the value of such property."

That is right. It prescribes a rule of equality. It does, or proposes to do, justice. It is in harmony with the idea of republican government. But in the eleventh article we find another provision. I read it:

"Sec. 13. The General Assembly shall levy a specific annual tax upon all railroad, navigation, banking, and insurance corporations, and upon all insurance and foreign bank and exchange agencies, and upon the profits of foreign bank bills issued in this State by any corporation, partnership, or persons, which shall be exclusively devoted to the maintenance of public schools."

The Constitution thus first provides for an equality of taxation. Then, in another article, it provides for an absolute inequality of taxation. It selects out certain objects of taxation and makes it the imperative duty of the Legislature to impose upon them a specific tax. What is a specific tax? Is it a tax levied according to values? Is it a tax having relation to the intrinsic value or productiveness of any enterprise or capital? No; it is an arbitrary tax—a tax having no relation to the intrinsic value or productiveness of the thing taxed. Such taxation is therefore in spirit, in intent in all its results, an unequal kind of taxation, destroying the very spirit of equality which should pervade all fundamental laws. Then, I submit that it involves a violation of that provision in the Federal Constitution which says that the citizens of each State shall enjoy in the other States the immunities and privileges of citizens of the several States. Can it be pretended that this is making a republican constitution? Will such a system of unequal taxation advance the material welfare of the State? Is this the way you would invite enterprise and capital to seek homes and make investments in Alabama? I fear there is design in this provision, so singular in itself, so exceptional in its terms, so plainly partial in its requirements, and so violative of the just principles of equality. It may produce a large fund, for it is required to be levied on the aggregated capital which is chiefly employed in the development of the great material interests and resources of the State. But who will own that capital? White men of Alabama and of other States. Who will enjoy the benefit of that fund? Negroes alone, not white men. But you may say, let white men send their children to schools with negroes. Do you do so yourselves? Would you not esteem it contamination to do so? Yes, sir. But you commend by this legislation to the poor, already impoverished, oppressed people of Alabama, what you would never submit to yourselves, what you would resist as unjust and cruel. I conclude, therefore, that the purpose of this specific tax is further to burden the white people of Alabama.

I next invite attention, Mr. Speaker, to the apportionment provisions of this "republican" constitution for the people of Alabama. It is said to be a "republican form of government." Let us see. We find in this constitution an infamous system, not exactly of "gerrymandering" as we call it in the States where tricks and frauds of this sort are sometimes resorted to by political parties having the ascendancy for the time; but it is proposed to indulge in this infamous kind of legislation in a charter of government and to fasten it perpetually upon the people of that State.

Let us see how it is to be carried out. The thirty-five counties in which the whites predominate, having 282,282 whites to 111,159 blacks, have but thirty-five representatives to an aggregate population of 393,441. The twenty-four counties in which the negroes predominate, 323,300 blacks to 252,407 whites have sixty-five representatives to an aggregate population of 580,717.

In other words, wherever the whites predominate, the apportionment of representatives is one to 11,241 people, and where the negroes predominate, the apportionment is one to 8,933 people. So that with nearly one hundred thousand less population in the State, the negroes will control two thirds of the State Legislature, and thus prevent amendments to the constitution or any amelioration of the horrible oppressions of the whites. Is this making a government "republican in form?" If it is, then the spirit and purpose of republican government are more unholy and infamous than those of a monarchy, aristocracy, oligarchy, or despotism. If Congress can make and dictate to States no more republican systems of government than this one, it would be infinitely better for the country that it should attend to its proper and legitimate duties and let the States alone. If the States cannot govern themselves better and more wisely than Congress has done, then I agree that the boasted capacity of our own race in this country for self government is a dream, a myth.

Mr. FARNSWORTH rose.

Mr. KERR. I will yield for a question.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I wish to inquire whether the gentleman speaks of voters, registered voters under the reconstruction acts?

Mr. KERR. I speak of population.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The gentleman has been speaking of voters.

Mr. KERR. I referred to the population as my aggregates will show. But, sir, it makes no difference—the result is the same, although the figures would be less if I took voters alone. Now, it is pretended there are but a few thousand white men in the State of Alabama who have been disfranchised by this constitution. Mr. Speaker, with a predominance in numbers of nearly one hundred thousand in the State, the white voters are made about twenty-one thousand less than the negroes by the process of military registration there and radical disfranchisements of the white voters.

I invite attention to the following facts on this subject, which settle forever the pretense that but few are disfranchised. In 1866 a census was taken of the people of Alabama, and is reported by the assistant commissioner of the Bureau of Refugees and Freedmen, by which it appears that the whole population, white and black, was 972,158. The negro population alone was 439,469, and the white population was 532,689, making an excess of whites of 93,220. By the census of 1860 the whole population was 964,191, and the blacks were 437,760, and the whites 526,431, making an excess of whites of 88,671. By the census of 1861 the white males over twenty-one years of age were 108,416, and the black males were 90,603, making an excess of white males of voting age of 17,807 in the State.

Mr. Speaker, I invite attention to another beautiful illustration of the manner in which it is proposed here to make constitutions "republican in form." In the State of Alabama, by this proposed constitution, three entire counties are disfranchised; their very existence is ignored—they are not noticed even by the constitution in the apportionment of representatives. They have no representation in the Senate or House of the Alabama Legislature. Why? Because they have a predominance of white voters. They would send white representatives. They would be controlled by white men. They must therefore be stricken down and ignored entirely.

Mr. UPSON. I should like to ask the gentleman to state by what authority these counties were created?

Mr. KERR. I will state by what authority they were created. By the constitution of Alabama as it stood until 1866 it was provided that no county should contain less than nine hundred square miles. Under that arrangement there were fifty-two counties in Alabama. The convention of 1866 reduced the minimum of land necessary to constitute a county to six hundred square miles. The latter provision is adopted and continued in the constitution now before the House. Under that ten new counties were created, to-wit, Clay, Cleburn, Crenshaw, Elmore, Hale, Lee, Bullock, Baine, Colbert, and Jones. All these ten counties were recognized in the registration of voters for the convention in the fall of 1867. The convention ignored the existence of three of them, to-wit: Baine, Colbert, and Jones, recognizing and retaining the other seven. The registration shows that there were hardly any negroes in Jones and Baine, and in Colbert the whites exceeded the negroes more than two to one. In four at least of the seven retained, to-wit, Elmore, Hale, Lee, and Bullock, the blacks greatly exceeded the whites. The three counties were ignored, I have no doubt, because they would be controlled by white men. This is the history of that matter.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to invite attention for a moment to another of the documents which illustrate the republican character of the constitution of Alabama. I refer to what is called the militia ordinance of that State. That military ordinance is not published with this constitution. It is not put into the possession of the members of the House. It is purposely kept out. It is the design to keep it in the back-ground. It is a "good thing," and when the constitution is adopted that ordinance will be adopted and become part of the fundamental law of Alabama. It provides, Mr. Speaker, that a volunteer militia shall be organized from the male inhabitants between eighteen and forty-five years of age, "without regard to race or color," with one company at least to each county, and not more than one company to every one thousand electors. It is made a complicated and expensive military organization. Of whom will that militia consist? Mr. Speaker, it will consist only of the black men of Alabama. The white men will not degrade themselves by going into the ranks and becoming a part of the militia of the State with the negroes. They will never do it; they will shrink from it with loathing. They did not do it during the war; they did not degrade themselves by that kind of association in which we indulged even during that struggle. They have never done it and they ought not to be required to do it.

But when this militia is organized let us see what are some of its powers. It is proposed:

"SEC. 13. Any one who shall have enlisted in the volunteer militia of the State, having been previously made acquainted with the duties and requirements of the service, and shall afterward neglect or refuse to obey the lawful orders of his superior officer, or willfully violates any of the provisions of this ordinance, shall pay the sum of twenty dollars, to be levied upon his goods and chattels, by order of the commanding officer of the district, and may be imprisoned or put to hard labor by said officer until said fine is paid, and shall then be assigned to such platoon or company as the commanding officers of the district may direct; and any person thus liable to militia service, who shall refuse or neglect to perform such service, shall pay a fine of five dollars per day for every day he fails to render such service, after having been thereto required by his officers, and in addition thereto such delinquent shall be subject to arrest and punishment, within the discretion of a court-martial; and nothing in this section shall be construed to exempt any man from military service."

"SEC. 14. The commanding officer of each platoon or company shall certify to the commanding officer of the battalion or regiment to which he is attached a list of all persons liable to fine under the provisions of this ordinance, with the number of days each person has neglected or refused to do duty, which list shall be by the commanding officer of the battalion or regiment certified to the clerk of the circuit court of the county ten days before the next term of the said court, who shall place a copy of said list on a conspicuous place in his office at least five days before the first day of the term."

These military officers of this volunteer militia, this colored army under the control of course as they will be of white men, of members of the party of the majority here, will certify all the delinquencies of these men to the clerk of the circuit court, and then without trial, without evidence, without hearing, without appeal, without any safeguards of civil or personal liberty, these returns are to be entered as the solemn judgments of that court, to be collected by execution.

But it is further provided:

"SEC. 15. It shall be the duty of the circuit court to render a judgment and an execution against each person named in his said list for the sum due by him and cost, which shall be collected as other fines. The sheriff of the county may collect all sums due in said list before judgment, and shall pay over the same to the State treasury, to the credit of the militia fund. He shall certify to the commanding officer of the district the names of all persons who fail to pay the amount stated against them in said lists, or who have no property whereof to levy such execution, and the commanding officer of the district shall arrest and put at labor the persons mentioned in the last-named lists, until the amounts due by them are paid; and it shall be the duty of the circuit attorney of the proper circuit, to prosecute all such matters as shall come before the said court by virtue of said section."

Before judgment, upon the mere return of militia officers, in violation, I submit, of every principle that has hitherto characterized the organization of civil governments in this country, or our legislation in such cases, the power is here given to the sheriff to proceed to collect fines and forfeitures by levy and sale of the property of the citizens.

But the most remarkable section in this ordinance is the twentieth, which I now read:

"SEC. 20. All taxes levied and collected for military purposes, and all fines imposed upon militia-men by this ordinance, all proceeds of the sale of contraband or captured property seized or captured by the militia, and all other appropriations and levies made for the benefit of the militia, shall likewise be paid into the treasury to the credit of the said fund. Out of such fund shall be paid all expenses incurred according to law, and audited by the proper officers, and appropriations for military purposes, as other claims against the State."

Mr. Speaker, what does this section mean? What is it that may become "contraband or captured property seized or captured by the militia?" I confess I am embarrassed to understand the exact meaning of that expression. It seems to be expected that the militia are to make war upon somebody; to prowl about the country in search of contraband property. What is contraband property? It is usually defined to be property the importation or exportation of which is prohibited by law. Are the civil laws of Alabama to be enforced by this negro militia? Are white men to be disarmed by them? It appears to me that this whole system of legislation for the States of the South is most cruel; it tends to perpetuate and intensify the natural antagonism of races; to provoke strife, envy, hatred, open hostility, and finally a war of races; to prevent the growth of hearty sympathy, generous confidence and coöperation, and obedience to the laws of mutual and intelligent self-interest between the races; for there needs not and ought not to be any conflict of interests; both races would naturally seek the aid of each other in appropriate ways if not poisoned and estranged by the pestiferous and wicked interference of partisans and demagogues. The most of this interference has no higher motive than malignity against the whites and a selfish interest in the control of the negroes.

This prolonged oppression, agitation, and injustice is rapidly crushing out the recuperative power of the people of Alabama; reducing one of the greatest natural fields of fruitfulness, wealth, health, and happiness on this continent to a desert waste; depreciating the value of and destroying the demand for all property in the State, until it is true to-day that many of the best lands will not sell for as much as they could have been, and in many cases were, rented for in 1866. The business of the State is everywhere crippled or prostrated; her industry and material development are discouraged and suspended; immigration is repelled from her borders; foreign capital sees neither security, equal laws, nor reasonable prospect of return; and hope has well nigh fled from her unhappy and suffering people. If punishment is the object of these laws it seems to me the most cruel nature should be satiated by what her people have already suffered.

The State should be admitted at once to representation under her own constitution, not this mongrel and bastard instrument, because she was never out of the Union, never lost or forfeited her equal right with the other States to self-government, and is now simply the victim of superior brute force, not of lawful or constitutional punishment or control.

Mr. Speaker, I desire, for future information, to make this militia ordinance a part of my remarks:

An ordinance for the organization of the volunteer militia.

SEC. 1. A volunteer militia of this State shall be organized from the able-bodied male inhabitants of the State over the age of eighteen years, without regard to race or color.

SEC. 2. Upon the written petition of forty persons, liable to military duty under the constitution of this State, recommending a suitable person to raise and command a militia company, the Governor may give such person authority to organize the same when filled to the maximum number required for a company by the United States Army regulations; when the company so raised shall be accepted by the Governor he shall issue a commission as captain to said person.

SEC. 3. Subalterns and non-commissioned officers shall be chosen by two thirds of the members of their respective companies; field officers of regiments and separate battalions, by the written roll of the commissioned officers of their respective regiments and battalions; major generals, brigadier generals, and commanding officers of regiments or separate battalions shall appoint the staff officers of their respective divisions, brigades, regiments, or separate battalions.

SEC. 4. There shall not be less than one organized company of militia in each county in the State, nor more than one company to every one thousand qualified electors.

SEC. 5. The Governor, on entering upon the discharge of his duties, shall immediately proceed to organize the militia into platoons, companies, battalions, regiments, brigades, and divisions. Platoons, companies, and regiments shall be composed of the number of commissioned officers, non-commissioned officers, and men now required by the revised regulations of the Army of the United States. A regiment shall consist of not less than eight companies, with the number of field and staff officers prescribed by the revised Army regulations for the particular branch of the service to which it may be assigned. A brigade shall consist of three or more regiments.

SEC. 6. Platoons or companies, as soon as organized, shall elect the subalterns and non-commissioned officers. The commissioned officers of all regimental brigades and staff officers appointed by the Governor shall, before commissions are issued to them, take and subscribe to the following oath.

* * * * *

The staff of general officers shall be the same as, for the time, may be prescribed by regulations of the United States Army or orders of the War Department, governing appointments of officers of the same grade in the United States service, all of whom shall be detailed from the line of the command of the officers to whose staff they are attached.

SEC. 7. The staff of the commander-in-chief shall be an adjutant general, with the rank and pay of colonel of cavalry; a quartermaster general, an inspector general, and a commissary general, each with the rank and pay of colonel of cavalry; a paymaster general, with the rank and pay of lieutenant colonel of infantry; a surgeon general, with the rank and pay of colonel of infantry; a judge-advocate general, with the rank and pay of lieutenant colonel of infantry; three aids-de-camp, with the rank and pay of major of infantry; he may detail from the line and field officers of any regiment such officers as he may deem proper, and assign them to duty on his staff.

SEC. 8. It shall be lawful for the commander-in-chief to call into service such platoons, companies, regiments, or other force, as the safety and peace of the State may require, and to issue such orders, instructions, general and special, as may be necessary to insure good discipline and perfection in drill, and safety to the persons and property of the citizens of the State.

SEC. 9. The publication of the proclamation of the Governor shall be deemed sufficient notice to all persons belonging to the organized militia to report to their respective commanding officer for active service.

SEC. 10. The Articles of War and Regulations, as published by the War Department of the United States, shall be observed by the volunteer militia of Alabama in every particular, not otherwise provided by this ordinance, and the manner of drill shall be such as is prescribed in the tactics adopted for the United States Army.

SEC. 11. Whenever the militia, or any part of it, is called into service, the inspector general, or his assistants, shall muster such force into the service, on the rolls of the platoon or company, one of which rolls shall be retained by the commanding officer of the platoon or company, one copy shall be returned to the adjutant general of the State, and one copy to the district headquarters. He shall administer to each platoon or company, separately, the following oath: "You, and each of you, do solemnly swear that you will support, protect, and defend the United States and the State of Alabama, and the constitution and laws thereof, against all their enemies; that you will assist in enforcing the laws, and will obey all lawful orders of the officers having authority to command you while in the service, so help you God."

SEC. 12. This paragraph imposes penalties for neglect of duty.

SEC. 13. Any one who shall have been enlisted in the volunteer militia of the State, having been previously made acquainted with the duties and requirements of the service, and shall afterward neglect or refuse to obey the lawful orders of his superior officer, or willfully violates any of the provisions of this ordinance, shall pay the sum of twenty dollars, to be levied upon his goods and chatties, by order of the commanding officer of the district, and may be imprisoned or put to hard labor by said officer, until said fine is paid, and shall then be assigned to such platoon or company as the commanding officers of the district may direct; and any person thus liable to militia service who shall refuse or neglect to perform such service, shall pay a fine of five dollars per day for every day he fails to render such service, after having been thereto required by his officers, and in addition thereto such delinquent shall be subject to arrest and punishment, within the discretion of a court-martial, and nothing in this section shall be construed to exempt any man from military service.

SEC. 14. The commanding officer of each platoon or company shall certify to the commanding officer of the battalion or regiment to which he is attached a list of all persons liable to fine under the provisions of this ordinance, with the number of days each person has neglected or refused to do duty, which list shall be by the commanding officer of the battalion or regiment certified to the clerk of the circuit court of the county ten days before the next term of the said court, who shall place a copy of said list on a conspicuous place in his office at least five days before the first day of the term.

SEC. 15. It shall be the duty of the circuit court to render a judgment and an execution against each person named in his said list for the sum due by him and cost, which shall be collected as other fines. The sheriff of the county may collect all sums due in said list before judgment, and shall pay over the same to the State treasury, to the credit of the militia fund. He shall certify to the commanding officer of the district the names of all persons who fail to pay the amount stated against them in said lists, or who have no property whereof to levy such execution, and the commanding officer of the district shall arrest and put at labor the persons mentioned in the last named lists, until the amounts due by them are paid, and it shall be the duty of the circuit attorney of the proper circuit to prosecute all such matters as shall come before the said court by virtue of said section.

SEC. 16. The sum of one dollar per day shall be reckoned to every person put at labor under the provisions of this ordinance.

SEC. 17. The uniform of volunteer militia of Alabama shall be the same as prescribed by the United States Army regulations for the Army of the United States, until otherwise ordered by the commander-in-chief.

SEC. 18. All officers when on duty shall wear the uniform of their rank, and no person not in the military service of the State or United States shall wear any insignia of rank, under a penalty of $100 for every offense, to be recovered by suit and summary trial before any justice of the peace.

SEC. 19. The pay of the volunteer militia when called into actual service of the State or of the United States, shall be the same for officers and men as allowed for the time by the United States to officers and soldiers, and fifty cents for each day's service of his horse when he is mounted.

SEC. 20. All taxes levied and collected for military purposes, and all fines imposed upon militia men by this ordinance, all proceeds of the sale of contraband or captured property seized or captured by the militia, and all other appropriations and levies made for the benefit of the militia, shall likewise be paid into the treasury to the credit of the said fund. Out of such fund shall be paid all expenses incurred according to law, and audited by the proper officers, and appropriations for military purposes, as other claims against the State.

SEC. 21. The Governor of the State shall lay before the General Assembly at each regular session thereof, a report of the money expended for militia purposes, and an estimate of the funds necessary for support of the militia for the next two years.

SEC. 22. Any officer, civil or military, who may refuse to account for, and pay over according to law, any moneys or property, coming into his hands belonging to the militia fund, shall, upon conviction thereof in the circuit or criminal courts, on indictment, be sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term of not less than five or more than ten years.

SEC. 23. Courts-martial shall be constituted and shall proceed in all cases, and be governed by the laws and regulations prescribed for the United States Army.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. TABER asked and obtained leave of absence for next week.

ADMISSION OF ALABAMA.

Mr. PAINE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. KEAR,] who has just taken his seat, asserts, as one of his objections to this constitution of Alabama, that the convention has disfranchised three of the counties of that State. That objection was made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] the other day in the document which was submitted to the House as the views of the minority of the Committee on Reconstruction. That, sir, is a serious objection to this constitution if it can be said upon this floor with truth that the people of three of the counties of the State have actually been disfranchised by the convention. That would be an objection which might well have great weight with the members of this House when asked to vote for the admission of Alabama under this constitution. But I meet that assertion here with a point-blank denial. I tell you, sir, the convention did not disfranchise the people of three of the counties of the State of Alabama, that the framers of the constitution have not in any way impaired the representative power of the people of any of the counties of the State, and I will show that what I state is true. I know what counties the gentlemen has in mind, although he has not named them. He refers to the counties of Baine, Colbert, and Jones.

Now, sir, I might call upon the gentleman to present proof of the fact which he asserts. I might call upon him to show you that the three counties to which he refers were actually counties of the State of Alabama, and that the people of those counties have been stripped of their representation by this constitution. He has not offered any proof. He has not pointed to the facts in the case upon which he bases his assertion. I deny the assertion; and I will assume the burden of proof and will present the facts which show the assertion to be incorrect. It is true that in the year 1867 three new counties were erected; erected, not, as the gentleman says, by a constitutional convention, but erected by an act passed by a Legislature which was the creature of executive usurpation, and approved by a Governor who was also a creature of executive usurpation. We have already twice, if not more than twice, in our legislation, repudiated that Legislature and that Governor and their acts. We have declared them all illegal and without authority. This was not the Legislature which Alabama had before secession. It was not the Legislature which was in power pending the war, clothed with whatever semi-sovereign State power remained to Alabama at the end of the war. But it was a Legislature which Andrew Johnson, in violation of the Constitution, in contempt of the fundamental principles of our Government, manufactured and attempted to fasten upon the people of Alabama, which erected these counties. It was a Governor appointed by Andrew Johnson, in like violation of our Constitution, over the people of Alabama who approved the acts by which these counties were created.

Such was the origin of these three counties. The constitutional convention assembled under our reconstruction acts adopted ordinances which restored the territory which those three counties embraced to the counties from which it was originally taken. So far was the convention from withholding from the people of those counties in their new condition any part of the representation to which they would have been entitled if their county organizations had been preserved, that it actually increased the representative power of the people of those counties in their restored relations. It extended to them, as a matter of fact, a power which is above that of the average of the people of the State of Alabama. In other words, the convention actually provided that, so far as these three counties are concerned, a less number of voters shall be sufficient to elect a representative than constitute the average basis of representation in the State.

Mr. BECK. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PAINE. Certainly.

Mr. BECK. As the gentleman has referred to what I said the other day, I would ask him if it is not a fact that there were ten new counties created at that time, and that three of those, Baine, Colbert, and Jones, were stricken out, and the other seven, which were created at the same time, in 1866, were retained?

Mr. PAINE. That is not the fact, as I am about to show. It is a fact that on the 7th of December, 1866, by an act which I hold in my hand, the act of the bogus Legislature of the State of Alabama, the county of Baine was formed out of portions of Cherokee, DeKalb, Marshall, Blount, St. Clair, and Calhoun counties; that is true, and that act was approved by Robert M. Patton, then provisional Governor of Alabama. This act was passed, not by any constitutional convention, but "by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Alabama in General Assembly convened."

It is also true that on the 4th of February, 1867, the new county of Jones was formed out of portions of the counties of Marion and Fayette by the same bogus Legislature. And on the 6th of February, 1867, the same Legislature formed the county of Colbert out of a portion of the county of Franklin. So far my friend from Kentucky is correct; this Legislature did erect these three counties of Baine, Jones, and Colbert.

But when this convention of Alabama assembled ordinances were introduced to restore the territory of these new counties to the counties from which it had been taken. I have before me the journal of the proceedings of the eleventh day of that convention, the 16th of November, 1867. On that day an ordinance was introduced in these words:

"Be it ordained by the people of the State of Alabama in convention assembled, That the county of Colbert, formed out of the county of Franklin, created by an act of the last General Assembly of the State, and purporting to have been approved on the 6th day of February, 1867, be, and the same is hereby, abolished; and that the territory and jurisdiction of said new county be restored to the said county of Franklin, just as it was on the 10th day of January, 1861."

I have here, also, the journal of the ninth day of the convention, in which I find noticed the introduction of an ordinance in precisely the same words, mutatis mutandis, for restoring the territory of the new county of Jones to the old counties of Marion and Fayette, from which it was taken. I have not been able to obtain the journal of the convention showing when these two ordinances were adopted, but I have before me the correspondence of the New York World, dated Montgomery, Alabama, December 7, 1867, which I have no doubt will be accepted as good authority by gentlemen on the other side. In that correspondence I find mentioned among the ordinances adopted by the convention the following: an ordinance to abolish the county of Colbert; an ordinance to abolish the county of Jones; an ordinance to abolish the county of Baine.

The complete journal of the convention is not accessible to us. Fortunately I found the portions which I have read and also the foregoing correspondence in the office of the Clerk of the House. Here is the explanation of the disappearance of these three counties: they were by the convention returned to the condition which they held before the non-descript Legislature, installed by President Johnson, undertook to erect them into new counties. And when the gentlemen assert that these three counties were disfranchised they are utterly mistaken. Why, sir, if they will look at those counties, in their present condition, they will perceive that they not only retain the whole of the representative power which is bestowed upon other people of the State, but on account of the accidental numbers of their people they actually have now a greater power than the average people of the State possess. This results from no purpose to give them increased representation at the expense of the rest of the State, but from the fact that their population happens to fall a little short of the average basis of representation of the State.

Under the new arrangement the former counties of Franklin and Colbert are embraced in the single county of Franklin, and have two representatives in the State Legislature. Those two counties have of registered voters 3,352, as the gentleman will see if he will refer to the tables from which he obtained his other facts. The ratio of representation for the entire State is one representative in the Legislature for 1,658 registered voters. Now, the half of 3,352 is 1,676, the ratio for the county of Franklin. This, to be sure, exceeds the average basis by eighteen. But the counties of Jones, Fayette, and Marion constitute now two counties, with 3,121 registered voters, entitled to two representatives, or at the rate of one for 1,560 voters. This is almost one hundred less than the average. The counties of Cherokee, DeKalb, Marshall, Blount, St. Clair, and Calhoun, to which the county of Baine has been restored, with 3,912 voters, have six representatives, or one to 1,485 voters, almost two hundred less than the basis in each case. Is it denied, in the face of all this, that Colbert is in fact authorized to vote in Franklin? Then tell me how it happens that Franklin alone, under General Pope's registration, made before the restoration of these short-lived counties, had only 985 registered voters, only a little more than half the basis for a single representative, and yet, under the constitution, has two representatives. The reason is that Colbert has returned to her former place with her 1,810 registered voters. Is it denied that the people of Jones are permitted to vote in their old county organizations of Fayette and Marion? Then why have Fayette and Marion each a representative, when General Pope's registration shows only 1,106 voters for the former and 837 for the latter? Sir, the 1,178 voters of Jones are distributed among them, and so the number of voters in each is made to approximate to the average basis of the State."

It appears, then, that the counties to which Baine, Colbert, and Jones counties are restored, in forming these representative districts, have, under the apportionment of this convention, the full representation, and even more than the full representation, of all their registered voters. If, on the other hand, you withdraw the population of these counties, Colbert, Baine, and Jones, from the counties with which they are associated in this apportionment under the constitution, you give these original counties a representative power vastly greater than their population or their registration entitles them to wield.

I say, then, that here is the explanation of the fact that the three names, Colbert, Baine, and Jones, do not appear in the constitution, that they have disappeared from the list of counties as it existed in 1867. They were restored by the convention to their old places, the places they occupied before these three acts were passed; and when they were restored their representative power went with them to those old counties. The counties of Cherokee, DeKalb, Marshall, Blount, St. Clair, and Calhoun have representative power which is increased by distributing among them the registered voters of Baine county registered by General Pope when that county stood by itself. So the representation of Fayette and Marion is increased by distributing to them the registered voters of Jones. And the representation of Franklin is increased by giving to it the representation to which the people of Colbert would have been entitled if that county had remained separate from Franklin.

These counties, then, are not disfranchised. Their voters are required by the Constitution to vote in the counties where they formerly voted; and voting there, instead of being stripped of their power, they find it materially increased. And this increase, Mr. Speaker, does not result from any injustice purposely done by this convention to the other counties of the State. It is always impossible to make the size of the counties or of representative districts conform exactly to the basis of representation. Some counties will have more, some less, population or registered voters than the average basis for the whole State. It so happens that these counties had less than the basis, and they actually have in the aggregate more representation in the State Legislature, (including both the Senate and the House of Representatives,) and will have more representation in Congress than the same number of people on the average in other parts of the State. There is, then, no injustice done to them; and there is no intentional injustice to the other people of the State, because this results from the accidental numbers of their population.

Another objection made to this constitution is, that the State has been "gerrymandered," as the phrase is. It is said that an undue portion of political power is given to one part of the State while its proper share is withheld from another. I desire to present to this House the facts so far as this point is concerned. It is asserted here by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KERR] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] that to twenty-four counties of the State sixty-five representatives are allotted, whereas to thirty-five counties only thirty-five representatives are given; that to these twenty-four counties is assigned a proportion of political power vastly greater than that to which their population entitles them, because there is a preponderance of black voters there, while there is a preponderance of white voters in the other counties. Well, sir, it happens that to each one of the thirty-five counties to which the gentleman refers one representative is given. They are the small counties of the State. As I have said, the basis of representation in the State is 1,658 votes; and I state to this House now, in answer to all that has been said in the way of charging unfairness upon the convention in this apportionment, that of those thirty-five counties seventeen have actually less than the average basis of representation in the State—less than 1,658 voters each; and eighteen of them have a little more than that; and when you look at the twenty-four large counties which have respectively two, three, or five representatives you discover that exactly the same thing is true of them as of the thirty-five small counties; that some of them have a slightly smaller number of registered voters than the average basis of representation in the State, while some of them have a slightly larger number. Now, take, for example, the county of Tuscaloosa, which has but two representatives in the Legislature. Its registered voters number 3,390; whereas twice the average basis of representation would only be 3,316. This county, therefore, instead of having excessive representation, has less than the average of the State; and yet Tuscaloosa is one of the twenty-four counties alleged to have more than their just political power. The same is true of the county of Russell. It has a population of 3,551, and it has only two representatives, though twice the average basis of representation would be 3,316. This county, therefore, has less than its due proportion of political power in that State. The same is true of the counties of Lee, Hale, and Greene.

But, sir, I will not go through with all these counties in detail. I turn to the counties that have three representatives each. Three times 1,658 votes, the basis of representation, would be 4,974. Barbour has 5,123 registered voters, being more than enough for three representatives. Bullock has 4,482, a little less. Lowndes has 4,654, and Madison 4,770, each a little less; while Marengo has only three representatives, and yet has 5,168 registered voters; and Perry, with only three representatives, has 5,359 registered voters. So it is with the counties that have five representatives, Dallas, Mobile, and Montgomery. Every one of these counties has more voters for each representative than form the average basis of representation for the State.

It would be impossible, Mr. Speaker, to apportion this representation upon any plan fairer than that on which representatives are distributed among these counties. You can not certainly deprive the small counties of their single representatives; you cannot make the registration or population of all the small counties equal. The consequence is, that some are below and others above the basis fixed for representation. The counties entitled to more than one representative of course could not have, without a miracle, the precise number of population, which would entitle them to any particular number of representatives; and very properly the convention of Alabama undertook to make the division in the most equitable manner possible under the circumstances of the case. And, sir, I defy the ingenuity of any member upon this floor to take the tables of registered voters or the population tables given by gentlemen on the other side, and make a fairer apportionment than that made by this convention for the State of Alabama.

If you consider the population of these counties, as stated by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] and the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. KERR,] you arrive at the following results. They make the total population of Alabama 972,153. This, divided by one hundred, the number of representatives, gives a basis of 9,721. Now, while it is true that these thirty-five counties have, on an average, a basis of 11,181, yet, if you give them each an additional representative the average basis would be only 5,592; and if you deprive each of the twenty-four large counties of one representative, the average basis in those twenty-four counties will be 14,163. This would result in a great wrong in either case. And if you give one additional representative to each of the small counties you will give two representatives each to seventeen counties which have not registered voters enough for one, and you will give two representatives to sixteen other counties whose number of registered voters comes nearer to the basis for one representative than for two. On the other hand, if you reduce the representation of the large counties by one member for each county you will reduce a representation already less in nearly every case than that to which the number of their registered voters would entitle them.

I say to the gentlemen on the other side of the House, and I say to my friends on this side of the House, after a most careful scrutiny of this constitution and this table of registered voters, that I can see no reason to complain of any unfairness on the part of this constitutional convention; but I can, on the contrary, see every reason to applaud the exceeding great care they have taken to give every county in the State a fair representation. It will be impossible for gentlemen to go through with the whole State and make any more equitable distribution of political power.

But it is further objected that many of the members of this convention were candidates for State or county offices at the first election under this constitution. Well, sir, if they have erred in this matter they have erred following great and well-known examples—the examples of the illustrious founders and fathers of the Republic themselves. If this is an unpardonable offense, a disgrace to be punished by the rejection of the Alabama constitution, what shall we do to efface the stain from our own Federal Constitution and from the good name of its honored framers? George Washington was the President of the Convention which framed the Constitution of the United States, and he was the first President of the United States under the Constitution which that Convention framed. John Langdon and Nicholas Gilman represented New Hampshire in that Convention and the former was a Senator and the latter a Representative in the First Congress of the United States. William S. Johnson and Roger Sherman represented Connecticut in that Convention, and the former was a Senator and the latter a Representative in the First Congress. Alexander Hamilton alone represented New York, and he was our first Secretary of the Treasury. John Blair and James Madison represented Virginia. The former was one of the first justices of our Supreme Court and the latter was a Representative in the First Congress. William Few and Abraham Baldwin represented Georgia, and were members of the First Congress. Robert Morris and George Clymer of Pennsylvania, George Read and Richard Barrett of Delaware, William Patterson of New Jersey, and Daniel Carroll of Maryland were delegates in the Convention and members of the First Congress. John Rutledge, of South Carolina, was a member of the Convention and was one of the first associate justices of our Supreme Court. These names occur to me. Doubtless an examination of the records would show that many others of these great men held office under the Government at its first organization. And who shall say that they impaired the value of their work or disgraced themselves by doing so? Who shall say that the constitution of Alabama is any the worse, or the State any the worse, or the framers of her constitution any the worse because members of the convention were esteemed worthy and were willing to hold office under that constitution?

Another objection made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KERR] to this constitution is that it exempts from execution property of the value of $3,000 for the benefit of the poor men of that State. It is supposed that the colored men will be the poor men, worth always less than three thousand dollars, and so this provision is virtually an odious discrimination in favor of the poor blacks against the rich whites. Well, sir, I am not so very sure that every white man in Alabama is worth $3,000, or even three thousand cents; and, now that labor owns itself, I am not confident that the whites are to engross the wealth of that region of country. This constitution, however, exempts only $1,000 in personal property, and it exempts real estate not exceeding in value $2,000. I see nothing very remarkable in the constitution so far as this exemption is concerned. If the gentleman complains that these exemptions are extravagant, I do not know what he would say if he should go to my own State and find there no limit in value to the exemption of real estate—no limit except as to quantity. I think the Alabama exemptions wisely provided. I certainly see nothing in them so atrocious as to justify us in excluding the State from representation in this House.

Gentlemen tell us that by accepting this constitution and admitting Alabama to representation under it we shall impose upon the people of that State a test-oath which is too infamous to be imposed by this Congress or any other authority upon any people? What is this test-oath? I will read it:

Not to attempt to deprive any person or persons, on account of race, color, or previous condition, of any political or civil right, privilege, or immunity enjoyed by any other class of men.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] stated the other day that not over twelve thousand white people were excluded from registration by our reconstruction acts. He might have said that not over five thousand white people were so excluded. And it is possibly true, as some of the members of our committee believe, that even one thousand would be the maximum of white men who were in fact excluded.

The gentleman from Kentucky has further admitted, nay, he has asserted in the presence of this House, that a majority of the white registered voters of Alabama were rebels during the war. I have no doubt that this is true. And now we are assailed by gentlemen as if guilty of the most outrageous tyranny because we require these men who were rebels during the war to swear that they "will not attempt to deprive any person or persons, on account of race, color, or previous condition, of any political or civil right, privilege, or immunity enjoyed by any other class of men." The gentlemen from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] in speaking on this subject, declared:

"It is the very essence of tyranny, the very climax of despotism, to require a man to take an oath, as a condition precedent to the exercise of any political rights or privileges, that he will never, in any emergency, no matter how urgent, do what, in his judgment, not only patriotism, but the very existence of republican liberty and free institutions may require, to wit, deprive all or certain classes of the negro population of the State of political rights and privileges."

"He may be willing now to make the experiment of negro suffrage, if you please; but to require him in all time to swear that he will maintain and defend it, even though it may be apparent to him and to all the world that it is a failure, is to degrade and disgrace him, and make him swear in advance that he consents to his own degradation."

And the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BOYER] said:

"But there is one feature in that instrument so especially monstrous that I cannot forbear its mention. It disfranchises all citizens who will not swear eternal fidelity to negro equality. The fourth section of article seven provides as follows:

"That I accept the civil and political equality of all men, and agree not to attempt to deprive any person or persons, on account of race, color, or previous condition, of any political or civil right, privilege, or immunity enjoyed by any other class of men."

"Was there ever so shameless a law to fetter free thought and the utterance of honest convictions? And this is in the name of republican government!"

Why, sir, of whom do they speak when they utter these words? Of these very white men of whom my friend has asserted that a majority were rebels during the war. Now we consent that they shall be enfranchised and registered themselves. We permit them to vote, we allow them to exercise full political power in that State. But when we require that as a condition of the enjoyment of these privileges they shall declare under oath that they will not hereafter attempt to deprive the loyal men of the South who happen to be black of their political rights they upbraid us as perpetrators of an atrocious wrong upon these enfranchised rebels.

Sir, I can look upon this in no such light. I think it is a favor to those white men who were traitors during the war that we allow them to partake of political power at all. I do not believe that we are bound in justice to do it under our Constitution. I think it would be right for us, if we deemed it expedient, to withhold absolutely from them all political power. Nay, sir, I am not sure that it was not our duty to deprive some of the leaders of their lives and to consign more to perpetual exile. Certainly I can see no reason; I can see no justice, I can see no propriety in the course of any man who stands up on this floor and charges us with wrong because we say that those men who were, as my friend admits, rebels during the war shall not exercise political power which we have a right absolutely to withhold from them, unless they will swear not to wrest it from those men who were loyal during the war and to whom we are in justice and honor bound to extend and perpetuate these rights.

Again, sir, our friends on the other side of the House denounce most bitterly the declaration of rights contained in the second section of the first article of the constitution. They denounce it as an intolerable outrage upon these penitent rebels whom we generously and graciously permit to vote under our reconstruction acts. They denounce it as galling tyranny over these white men who have so earnestly striven to overthrow our Republic—who are conquered, but, I fear, none the less hostile to their country. What is the language of this detestable declaration of rights? Here it is:

Sec. 2. That all persons resident in this State, born in the United States or naturalized, or who shall have legally declared their intention to become citizens of the United States, are hereby declared citizens of the State of Alabama, possessing equal civil and political rights and public privileges.

I am amazed that such a complaint should be made in this presence. What? is it oppressive to these white men who are punishable with the doom of the basest traitors to give the loyal men of the South who happen to be black equal civil and political rights and public privileges? Instead of thanking us because we give them back their rights which they have forfeited, do they curse us because we extend them to loyal men who never forfeited them? Do they suppose that all distinctions between loyalty and treason have so soon disappeared in the quicksands of our consciences? It was simply a question of policy, of expediency, whether we would or would not give these privileges to white traitors. But, sir, it was not merely a question of policy whether we should give them to the loyal blacks; it was a solemn duty which we could not evade without such national disgrace as the penitential tears of ages could not wash out. We enfranchised the white rebels. They ought to be thankful for it. Their champions on this floor ought to thank us for our unspeakable—perhaps, also, unwise—magnanimity toward their friends. And yet they sting the hand that blesses them, and accepting our benefactions as absolute debts they upbraid us because we remove their heels from the necks of the loyal men whom they have so long oppressed. There is a cruel forgetfulness of all distinctions between treason and loyalty in this objection to our bill which shocks me. And I am the more pained because I see gentlemen on this side of the House lending an altogether too willing ear to this monstrous doctrine. Sir, we have no right to accept this constitution without such a provision. Instead of being an objection it should be a sine qua non to the reconstruction of the State.

But gentlemen complain that this constitution was framed by a convention some of the members of which were not born upon the soil of Alabama. I admit that. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Beck] proved this by a table which he read from the Selma (Alabama) Times and Messenger of February 28, 1868, a table copied into that journal from the New York World. This is far enough from being official authority, and yet, for the sake of argument, I admit that several of these delegates were not natives of Alabama.

But, sir, there is no atrocity, no enormity in this. There is nothing startling or shocking or disgusting in this; no reason for sneering or groaning at foreigners or adventurers or Yankees. This will afford us no pretext, no excuse, for rejecting the application of the people of the State for admission under this constitution. Why, sir, on this floor to-day there is not a single member from my own State who was born in Wisconsin, nor is there a Wisconsin Senator in the other end of the Capitol who is a native of that State. In our State Legislature, which has just adjourned, there was not one senator who was born within our State; there was but a single representative who was a native of our soil.

The State of Alabama was originally admitted to the Union in 1819 and the State of Indiana in 1816. More than half of the Representatives from the State of Indiana in this Capitol to-day were born elsewhere than on the soil of that State, although Indiana was admitted into the Federal Union before Alabama was ever admitted. The State of Illinois was admitted into the Union in 1818, and before the State of Alabama. There are sixteen Senators and Representatives in this Capitol from that State, and of that entire number only four were born on the soil of Illinois. Why, sir, almost as many of them were born in the State so honorably represented by my friend from Kentucky [Mr. Beck] as were born in Illinois. Three were born in Kentucky and only four in Illinois. The State of New Jersey, one of the original thirteen, has more foreign-born than native-born Representatives upon this floor to-day; of the five Representatives of that State only two were born within her borders.

When my friend from Kentucky [Mr. Beck] was hurling his execrations against this convention and its work because some of its members were not natives of Alabama, his voice, though powerful and eloquent, was marked by a foreign accent so strong that I could not escape the conviction that he himself was not a native of Kentucky; and although I do not know where was the place of his nativity, I venture to express the belief that the gentleman who so ably represents the State of Kentucky on this floor, and who uttered these maledictions against the Alabama convention, was not born himself on the soil of the State which he represents; nay, not even born on the soil of this continent. I venture to say that today an ocean rolls between him and the island of his nativity. But, sir, the people of Kentucky have sent to us a representative man, whom I am happy to be able to call my personal friend and to meet on this floor—a gentleman who is none the less welcome because he is, if he is, foreign born. But, sir, it is not for him, as it certainly is not for any other man on this floor, to upbraid those citizens of the Republic, whether natives or foreign born, who framed this constitution for Alabama because some of them were not born within her borders. Nor is the other gentleman who signed this minority report, and who represents so ably the city of New York, [Mr. Brooks,] if I am correctly informed, a native of the State he represents; and I know that the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. Kerr,] who has just addressed the House, was not born in the State which he represents with so much credit on this floor. And, sir, if you will look into our directory, you will find that only a little more than half the members of this House were born in the States which sent them hither. Why, then, add this frivolous complaint to the burden of execration heaped upon the framers of this constitution?

Again, we are reminded that of the members of this convention sixteen were blacks. Well, that is true. In a convention numbering over one hundred sixteen were actually blacks. But it must be remembered that the number of registered black voters was 93,543, while the number of registered white voters was 72,746. If, under that registration, one third or even one half the members of the convention had been blacks there would have been no injustice done to the whites. I think they were exceedingly modest in only requiring that sixteen out of the one hundred should be of their own race and color. I think that, instead of reproaching them for sending so many, we ought rather to commend them for that spirit of self-sacrifice which prompted them to send so few.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Beck] assures us that the whole proceedings of the convention are so infamous that thirteen of the members of the convention presented their protest and refused to sign the constitution, and among the extracts from that protest he read the following:

"The constitution provides a mode for its amendment, but each elector must swear that he will never seek to exercise that constitutional right in a certain direction.

"The evils of universal suffrage may become intolerable, but he must swear that he will endure them without even a peaceful and constitutional effort at amelioration."

And this is the main point in the protest. This is the burden of the grievances inflicted by the constitution. Here is the height and depth, the length and breadth of the infamy of these proceedings, which my friend says was sufficient to prompt this protest. I think this was no infamy. I think it was honorable and honest and just. If I had been a member of that convention I should have esteemed the places of these protestants more valuable than their company. It was, in my judgment, not the constitution but the protest that was infamous.

The gravest objection to this measure seems to be this: that we have pledged the faith of this nation to these white men of the South, to these men who, as is admitted, were chiefly traitors during the war, whether now friendly or hostile to the Union; that we have pledged the faith of this nation to them, by our act of 1867, that they should be permitted, if they saw fit, to defeat this constitution by effectuating such a result of the election that either the constitution should not receive a majority of the votes polled or a majority of the registered voters should neglect or refuse to vote. They say we made this solemn pledge to these white people of the State of Alabama; that we gave them the privilege of defeating the constitution, either by going to the polls and voting against it so as to cast a majority of hostile votes, or by absenting themselves from the polls so that a majority of the registered voters might not vote at all. They say we made this solemn pledge to them by the passage of the reconstruction act; that these white people of Alabama have availed themselves of it, have seen fit to stay away from the polls, and thereby defeated the constitution which would have been adopted if they had actually voted "no." that we gave them the power and the right to accomplish, by absenting themselves from the polls, that which they could not have accomplished if they had gone to the polls and voted against the constitution. They say that, having made this pledge to these people, we have no right now to withdraw it; that to do so would be a breach of the faith of the nation.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Beck] says:

"If language can make any proposition clear beyond dispute, these acts establish the facts, first, that a majority of the registered votes had to be cast on the question of a convention and on its ratification; and, second, that two modes were allowed to the people of Alabama of rejecting any constitution that might be submitted to them if its provisions were obnoxious—one by a majority of those voting to vote against it; the other by a concerted abstention from voting by those who were registered voters. Either course was equally legal and equally efficient. It was as legitimate a mode of opposing its ratification by the qualified voters by refusing to vote as by voting against it. That this was a mode deliberately and purposely adopted by those who opposed the ratification is a part of the political history of the country. The primary conservative county conventions of the people of Alabama adopted it as the best mode of opposition, and by resolution recommended it to the conservatives of the State. All their newspapers advocated it, and it was well known, both to this Congress and to the advocates of the constitution, as the mode of opposition, most publicly and deliberately adopted long before the vote was taken."

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Boyer] said:

"The act of March 23 told the people of Alabama, as plainly as language could express it, that the vote of every registered citizen not polled should count as a vote against the constitution framed by the mongrel convention lately assembled in that State,

This Congress pledged itself to reject any constitution not sustained by at least one half of the registered voters of Alabama. Upon the faith of that pledge a majority of the registered voters refrained from voting; and thus, by staying at home, they defeated the proposition in the very mode provided by Congress for that purpose. Now, it is proposed to go back upon this pledge thus solemnly made by Congress, and accepted and acted upon in good faith by the people of Alabama, and in the face of the American public and before high Heaven the Reconstruction Committee advises this Congress to eat its own words, and to perpetrate that which in a statute, enacted, printed, and promulgated as a law of the land, it has heretofore declared ought not and should not be done."

And in the minority report it is asserted that the voters were expressly authorized by the provisions of the reconstruction acts to reject the constitution, either by voting against it or not voting at the election.

All this, I confess, seems to me incomprehensible. Is it true, then, that we said to these white men who had been traitors so long, you may, if you see fit, avoid the polls, and thereby defeat a constitution which you could not defeat by voting against it. When and where did we expressly, or even by implication, authorize these men to avoid the polls? Did we do this when, in the third section of the act itself, we peremptorily declared that "at said election the registered voters of each State shall vote for or against a convention to form a constitution therefor under this act," and extended that order by the last clause of the fourth section to the election held for the ratification or rejection of the constitution? No, sir; no. We never expressly or by implication said, we never intended to say, to these men that they were authorized to avoid the polls, either for the purpose of defeating the constitution or for any other purpose.

I well remember the reasons which actuated this House in the enactment of this law. We are still here members of the same Congress which passed that act. We voted for it in this very Hall. Why that law was enacted we all well understood and well remember. We did not enact it for the purpose of enabling the late rebels of the South, the minority of the registered voters, to defeat constitutions which the loyal people of the South should frame and attempt to ratify. But we enacted it for the purpose of preventing the white rebels of the South, the minority of the people, from fastening on those States constitutions framed by minorities which should be objectionable to the majorities of the people of those States. That was the motive which prompted us. We knew that the whites of Alabama, as of the other rebel States, having enjoyed freedom and the opportunities of education and the exercise of political power hitherto would inevitably exercise in that State a political influence vastly disproportioned to their numbers. Everybody could see that. No one will even now deny it. Apprehensive that, although they might be in the minority so far as numbers were concerned, they would nevertheless get possession and control of the convention and frame a constitution themselves; and that when the election day came, by intimidation and by threats and by all the various means which their superior knowledge and experience and wealth could command, they would unduly influence the ignorant, inexperienced, and needy blacks of the State and thus repel from the polls large numbers of loyal voters, and enable themselves, by a majority of the votes actually cast, which might be only a small minority of the votes of registered voters, to ratify their minority constitution, we resolved and endeavored to prevent them from framing and foisting and fastening upon the people of the State a constitution, the work of their own hands, which should perpetuate the oppression under which the blacks, who were loyal during the war, had so long and so fearfully suffered. This law was not framed to enable the minority to defeat the constitution of the majority. It was framed to secure the majority from a constitution framed by an adroit and unscrupulous minority.

On the 11th day of March, 1867, this bill was before our House, and my colleague on the committee [Mr. BINGHAM] proposed so to amend it as to permit a majority of the votes cast at the election to ratify the constitution. The chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary then stated the object which the committee, and, in fact, the majority of the gentlemen on this side of the House, had in the enactment of the fifth section of the act of 1867. He said that the question had been considered in the committee and the judgment of the committee was against it, and he added:

"The judgment of the committee was against it upon this ground: that in the rebel States the whites, being in possession of political power, might, by threats and intimidation, prevent the colored citizens from voting, keep them away from the polls, and adopt a constitution which would not be free and equal in its operation, and therefore they rejected the amendment when it was proposed in the committee."

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] on the same occasion said:

"I submit that the power which Congress has to reject the work of any of these conventions is merely a negative power. I know very well that when any of the rebel States come here with the work of their conventions, and it conforms to the acts of Congress, even though but one third or one quarter of their people have assented to it, we shall be under an irresistible pressure to accept what they have done, and to admit their Representatives to seats upon this floor. I am, therefore, opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM]."

It was not to put a weapon in the hand of the disloyal minority wherewith to destroy the loyal majority that we framed this act, but we framed it to furnish a safeguard to the loyal majority against the cunning and fraud and violence of the disloyal minority.

It was not to give the late rebels of the South an opportunity and the means of defeating the will of the ever-loyal people of the South by defeating the constitutions which the loyal people might adopt. But it was to give to the loyal people of the South security against the imposition of constitutions framed, adopted, and ratified by disloyal minorities. Yet gentlemen on the other side of the House, in unholly sympathy with the rebellious element of Alabama, seek to make that fifth section the means of defeating the will of the majority of the people of that State. They insist that we expressly authorized them to avoid the polls when the fact is that we expressly and peremptorily ordered them to attend the polls. They seek to hold us to a forced construction of that text. They maintain that when we declared, as we did in that section, that upon certain conditions we would admit Representatives from that State, we declared virtually, but not the less solemnly, that unless those conditions should be fulfilled we would not admit Representatives from that State into this Congress, that we would not allow that State to be restored to its former place in the Federal Union. Now, sir, I deny that we ever made any such promise as this. I deny that we ever did by implication, as nobody pretends we did expressly, promise to the disloyal whites of the South that if these conditions should fail we would reject the constitution and reject Representatives calling upon us for admission. No, sir; we did none of those things; and the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. KERR,] in my judgment, misconstrues this law when he declares such to be the purport of this fifth section. As I understand this fifth section it was not made one of the conditions of the admission into Congress of Representatives from that State that a majority of the votes polled should be for the constitution, nor was it made a condition to such admission that a majority of the registered voters should vote. Those are the first two conditions named in this fifth section. I say that it is an unnatural, a forced construction of this section which refers those two first-mentioned conditions to the admission of Representatives from that State. I assert my opinion that those conditions are solely conditions precedent to the authorization of the president of the convention to forward to the President of the United States the certified copy of the constitution. The exact provision of the section is:

"That if, according to said returns, the constitution shall be ratified by a majority of the votes of the registered voters qualified as herein specified, cast at said election—at least one half of all the registered voters voting upon the question of such ratification—the president of the convention shall transmit a copy of the same, duly certified, to the President of the United States, who shall forthwith transmit the same to Congress, if then in session, and if not in session, then immediately upon its next assembling."

These two conditions are not conditions precedent to the admission of Representatives from any of those States. We do not declare that if these two things shall be done we will admit those Representatives. What we do declare is, that if those two things are done the president of the convention shall be authorized to transmit the certified constitution of the State to the President of the United States, to be laid before Congress, and there we stop. We do, indeed, promise, upon certain conditions, to admit Representatives; but these two are not among those conditions. There are five conditions subsequently laid down upon compliance with which we promise admission of Representatives from those States. One of them is—

"That Congress shall be satisfied that such constitution meets the approval of a majority of all the qualified electors of the State."

And right here, sir, is the sum and substance of the whole act.

I am satisfied on that point. I have not the slightest doubt that this constitution meets the approval of a majority of the qualified voters of Alabama. To my mind the evidence is overwhelming on this point. When I vote, then, as I shall vote, for the admission of Representatives under this constitution, I shall do that which I should be at liberty to do even though I had expressly declared in this act that I would never vote for the admission of such Representatives unless I should be satisfied that this constitution had the approval of a majority of the voters of the State. I never did, by voting for that act, declare expressly or by implication that I would never vote for the admission of Representatives from these States under any circumstances unless satisfied that the constitution met the approval of the majority of the registered voters of the State. I never placed such faith in registration as that would imply. But I do declare here and now that I would not vote for the admission of Representatives in this particular case unless I should be satisfied of such approval. I am satisfied on that point. I have no doubt that a majority of the registered voters of the State approve this constitution; and, as if bound by an express declaration that I would not vote for their admission without such approval, I will here vote for their admission.

The minority of our committee oppose this constitution because, as they assert, it deprives a large number of the white males of Alabama of the right to vote and hold office. Sir, these men during the war were traitors. They have no right to vote or to hold office, and for the present this dangerous favor is most righteously withheld. They oppose it, too, because it enfranchises the blacks. But, if it did not enfranchise the loyal men, black and white, I could never approve it. They object that it places the power to impose taxes in the hands of those who will not pay taxes. But it remains to be seen who will pay the taxes in the South. Formerly the white planters paid the taxes, because they owned the laborers, and the laborers earned the money with which the taxes were paid. The whites did not labor. It is yet to be decided whether they will hereafter themselves earn the money which will pay the taxes of the South, or whether the rough hands which have heretofore earned it shall earn it hereafter also and pay it into the Treasury themselves. It is a question what is the color of the future tax-payers of Alabama. But, then, in all States of the Union the majority are poor. It must be so everywhere, for if none are poor none can be rich. And yet everywhere the poor vote, and only modern Democracy is shameless enough to oppose it.

In the third section of this bill we lay down certain fundamental conditions upon which this State is to be admitted. The gentlemen on the other side speak of these conditions as something unheard of in the organization of States in this Republic. Sir, we have admitted twenty-four new States since the Federal Constitution was adopted. Of these twenty-four States nine were admitted with fundamental conditions in the acts of admission in perfect harmony with the conditions of this bill so far as the principles involved are concerned, excepting only that clause which authorizes Congress by law to annul conflicting State legislation, which clause does not meet my approval.

Arkansas was admitted in 1836 upon the express condition that the people of that State should never interfere with the primary disposal of the public lands within the State, nor levy a tax on any of the lands of the United States in that State. California was admitted in 1850 upon the same conditions; and also upon the further conditions that non-resident proprietors being citizens should never be taxed higher than residents; and that all her navigable waters should be common highways. Florida and Iowa were admitted on conditions similar to those prescribed for Arkansas. Conditions were also prescribed in the cases of Louisiana, Michigan, Indiana, Missouri, and, I believe, Nebraska.

I will not detain the House to explain the provisions of the several acts imposing conditions upon the admission of the States named. I will read only the one applicable to the State of Missouri. The act admitting the State of Missouri into the Union provides as follows:

"Missouri shall be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, upon the fundamental condition that the fourth clause of the twenty-sixth section of the third article of the Constitution, submitted on the part of said State to Congress, shall never be construed to authorize the passage of any law, and no law shall be passed in conformity thereto by which any citizen of either of the States in this Union shall be excluded from the enjoyment of any of the privileges and immunities to which such citizen is entitled under the Constitution of the United States."

If that provision did not ingraft a new feature upon the constitution of the State of Missouri, it did give a construction to that constitution which virtually amounted to the same thing.

While I am opposed to that clause of this bill which expressly authorizes Congress to annul conflicting State laws; while I am opposed to the third section as unnecessary and inexpedient, and shall vote for the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] to omit the third section, yet, sir, in accordance with nine precedents in similar cases, I insist that we have the well-established right to adopt this section of the act with the single exception of that provision which specially authorizes Congress to annul conflicting acts of the Legislature of Alabama. Therefore, sir, I shall vote, in the first place, for the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] to strike out the third section from this bill. If that motion shall fail I shall ask for an opportunity to move to strike out the provision which in terms authorizes Congress to annul the acts of the State.

I am free, sir, to say that while I support this bill and shall vote for it and hope it will pass, nevertheless if the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] shall be adopted in its stead, I shall find no occasion for much regret. Next to this bill, I prefer that to any measure that has been presented to this House or to which my attention has been called. While I hope that the bill presented by the committee may be enacted into a law, while I hope the Representatives of that State will be admitted on this floor under this constitution, yet if this House shall otherwise decide and conclude to adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio or anything equivalent to it, I shall see no great reason to find fault with that decision.

ADMISSION OF ALABAMA—AGAIN.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I have been taught to believe that our system of government, State and national, embodied the perfection of all the models. I have supposed it so formed that it was safe from the assaults of radical innovation and not subject to change or alteration from within, except in the manner provided in the Constitution. With such opinions I cannot view the constant assaults upon its several departments, supposed to have been its chief perfection, but with sadness and alarm. These departments, intended to work in harmony, operating only as proper checks and balances upon each other, cannot long continue in open and hostile antagonism without fatal consequences. And yet what do we behold? The executive power is assailed, trenched upon, hedged about and circumscribed till its influence is scarcely perceptible, and its chief officer finally is sought to be deposed and removed because he will not altogether abdicate and surrender the office and power to a partisan Congress. The judiciary, too, that last refuge of patriotic hope, that supposed conservator of popular liberty when all others should fail, is in menace. It is not only menaced, but its prerogatives, powers, and jurisdiction are assailed with a frenzied zeal and partisan hate that admit of no room for doubt of the result. It is no longer to be the independent, peaceful, pure, and impartial arbiter of our disputes and controversies; but the fiat has gone forth from a partisan Legislature that the judges of the highest court of the land must soil the ermine in doing its bidding or surrender the judicial power. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] boasting proclaimed on this floor only the other day that the purpose was "to clip its power" in every possible way. And thus it is that one by one the very bulwarks of liberty are being thrown down and all the safeguards of the people's rights destroyed. These measures, I repeat, fill me with apprehension and alarm. With the President deposed, the prerogatives and jurisdiction of the Supreme Court taken away, a partisan Congress will riot in power unrestrained. With the sword and the purse at its command who so fool-hardy as to believe our liberties safe? Look at the War Department barricaded and picketed with armed soldiers in time of profound peace and in the capital of the Republic!

And, sir, I cannot forget the most significant fact, that only a few days ago an attempt was made, probably at the suggestion of the usurping Secretary of War, to smuggle through the House in an appropriation bill a provision for the removal of the present Capitol police and authorizing the Secretary of War to detail non-commissioned officers and soldiers to take charge of the Capitol building and grounds. Had this not been discovered and the provision had become law we should be sitting to-day and legislating under the gleam of the sword and the Supreme Court rendering its decisions at the point of the bayonet. Verily, coming events are casting their shadows before. Are these things to familiarize our eyes to what is in waiting for us? Are they the advance pickets of the army with which Congress, if permitted to pursue unrestrained its purpose, will control the destinies of the people, and by which it will enforce its edicts; by which it will make and unmake States; make and unmake Presidents; make and unmake the courts and force them all to do its bidding? Is this the power, the policy, that is to control us?

Mr. Speaker, I desire to enter my protest against this bill and to relieve myself of all responsibility for its passage. Never, in my judgment, was there a more inexcusable or unjustifiable measure. It has no warrant in the Federal Constitution and no justification or precedent in the practice of this Government, unless, indeed, it be in the kindred measures of so-called reconstruction. It is in clear and unmistakable violation of all the underlying fundamental principles of the Republic.

Sir, if there be one idea upon which this Government was formed more essential and fundamental than any other, that idea is that the people of the United States are sovereign and entitled by nature to the right of self-government. This principle underlies all our institutions, and is coextensive with the utmost boundaries of the United States and its authority. The source of all power is the people, and their only grant or authority to the Federal Government is the Constitution. If the power is not there found it does not exist. Under the Constitution there are, and there can be, no conquered, tributary, or subject States. Equality of citizenship and the right of self-government have never been granted or surrendered by the people or States of the Republic. To do this would be voluntary submission to the chains and manacles of slavery. The right of self-government constitutes the liberty and freedom of the citizen. Without the enjoyment of this right no man can be styled free; no man can enjoy the liberty intended to be secured by the Federal Constitution. It is the dearest, the most essential right of American citizenship. It cannot be taken away without totally subverting the Constitution and destroying our system of Government altogether.

Sir, upon what provision of the Constitution can this bill rest; to what do its friends appeal for their justification in its support? I do not make this inquiry with reference to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] He is consistent and logical; he has never stultified himself by any pretended constitutional sanction. He proclaims all the reconstruction measures of Congress "outside" the Constitution. But to those who admit the obligation and duty of obedience to the fundamental law of the land, I ask them in all sincerity and honesty under which of its provisions or by what right do they justify their action upon this bill?

Article four, section three, provides that—

"New States may be admitted by the Congress into the Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States or parts of States without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress."

The State of Alabama is certainly not a new State; it is not a State formed by the junction of two or more States or parts of States; it is not a new State formed within the jurisdiction of another State. And, if it were a new State so formed and erected, there is no consent of the Legislature of the State concerned. There is then no authority for this bill in this section, and it is the only provision of the Constitution relating to the admission of States into the Union.

But if it be said that the purpose of this bill and the measures of Congress preceding it are only to reorganize government in the State of Alabama and not to admit the State as a new State, the inquiry is still pertinent where does Congress get the authority? I have looked in vain to find any authority for this even. I can find no authority in the Constitution for any interference by Congress in the organization or reorganization of a government by the people of an existing State of the Union. The right to form and reform, to organize and reorganize governments is under our system a right original and inherent in the people. It is only the exercise of the right of self-government—the original right upon which all our State and national governments are founded. The right to form and establish Governments does not come from Congress; it is not a constitutional grant. It is one of the rights never delegated, never parted with by the people. It was derived from a source higher than Congresses or Parliaments. It is the right, the power to make and unmake both. All the "just powers of Government are by the consent of the governed."

If the right of the people to govern themselves be usurped or surrendered to that extent the people are enslaved. They cannot part with it or allow it to be taken from them and be free. The people must either govern themselves or be governed by others. They must make their own constitutions and laws or submit to constitutions and laws made for them. The right given up, conceded to others, to make the laws, the kind and quality of the laws depend upon the will of the makers, and the people are at their mercy. They are no longer free.

Sir, these views are too elementary to admit of argument. The principles stated lie at the very foundation of the Republic. They were most clearly enunciated in the Declaration of Independence, and are imbedded in all our State and Federal Constitutions. They are the foundation ideas of all free government. They are the principles upon which alone our system of government can be maintained. They are the only principles upon which any free government can be maintained.

Now, what does this bill propose? I will not here stop to argue the question of whether Alabama is a State, whether it is out of the Union. That it is a State and a State in the Union I have several times shown in this House, to my own satisfaction at least, and by arguments and facts that cannot be refuted, denied, or answered. It is an existing State in the Union, or the history of the last five years is a lie. It is a State in the Union, or the war for the preservation of the Union and the vast expenditure of life and treasure in its name and on its behalf is a monstrous crime. It is an existing State, or all the professions and promises of the party controlling the Government during these long and bloody years, by which so many brave men were induced to offer their lives a sacrifice on the battle-field, and so many homes and hearts made desolate, were stupendous frauds and cheats. It is, and has been, a State saved and preserved to the Union by the gigantic struggle through which we have passed, or the party now in power has till the time, from the beginning of the war till this day, in bold, wicked, criminal conspiracy with the rebels and secessionists, aided them in accomplishing, and now finally consummating, what they could not alone accomplish, the division and final dismemberment of this Union. Alabama is not out of the Union, is not destroyed as a State, or every man who fought, aided, encouraged, or countenanced the war, with any consciousness of what was to be the result, whether in the North or the South, whether on the one side or the other, is a conscious traitor to this Union of States, and an enemy of the Republic of States.

But, I repeat, the State of Alabama is not destroyed. It still exists in the Union. This last bill admits that it is a State in the Union. The first bill provided for the admission of the State and for its representation; this last only for its admission to representation.

And now, if it is to be turned out or excluded from the Union, or dealt with in any other manner than as a State in the Union, it will be the work of this Congress alone. All the other enemies of this once proud and noble State; all those who would have taken her from the Union by war or force; all those who would have incorporated her in another confederacy of States, surrendered and abandoned the conspiracy for her dismemberment. It is Congress alone that would now exclude her from or degrade her in the Union. It is Congress that has made and would humiliate her to accept this constitution. And this is to be done by this bill. By this bill and the previous acts of Congress her nine hundred and sixty-four thousand two hundred and one population are to be made slaves, are to have forced upon them a government in which they have in reality, as a people, had no part in creating; a government obnoxious to all their tastes, hateful and odious to them. The constitution made by themselves, and under which the State came into the Union, and which the rebellion in vain strove to overthrow and destroy, is to be taken from them by this Congress, by this bill, and a constitution in which the vast majority feel no interest, and by which their dearest rights are taken away, is to be forced upon them.

The educated, the intelligent, the cultivated, the refined, the experienced are to be excluded from all part or share in the government of the State, and all their interests and rights of life, liberty, and property are to be given into the hands and keeping of an ignorant, debased, uneducated, uncivilized, servile minority. And all this is to be done, not in violation of the Federal Constitution only, but in most flagrant violation and disregard of the very act of Congress under which and by virtue of which this bill is justified.

And, according to the preamble of this bill, this monstrous measure is denominated, is to be taken and considered, the voluntary act of the people of Alabama! Seventy thousand, all except one thousand of which are negroes, are all who are claimed or pretended to have approved or to be in favor of the constitution which is thus sought to be forced upon this people. And these seventy thousand—sixty-nine thousand blacks and about one thousand blacker whites—are denominated, are to be, the governing people of Alabama! And this, too, when there stands on the registers made by the friends of the measure, under the direction and authority of Congress, dictated and managed by the sword, one hundred thousand more competent and legal voters, mostly white men, who condemn, loathe, and execrate such constitution and government. Add to this thirty thousand or more disfranchised by the despotic enactments of Congress and the tyrant agents appointed to administer them, and tell me, are not the preamble and all pretenses that this constitution is framed or adopted by the people of Alabama a lie?

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] chairman of the committee, and who reported the original bill, stated, when he moved to recommit, that there were twenty-odd thousand majority against the constitution. He said:

"After a full examination of the final returns from Alabama, which we had not got when this bill was drawn, I am satisfied, for one, that to force a vote on this bill and admit the State against our own law, where there is a majority of twenty-odd thousand against the constitution, would not be doing such justice in legislation as will be expected by the people. With that view of the case I shall vote for the motion to recommit, and on that motion I demand the previous question."

"The bill was recommitted."

That this constitution is not the choice of the people, that it would be an act of injustice to pass the bill, is declared. There is no real difference between that bill and this. In principle and effect they are the same. They are in violation of the will of the majority. They are in violation of that great right of the people to make their own fundamental law; they would place the majority under the control of the minority. I agree with what the gentleman said, that to pass this bill against our own law, where there is a majority of twenty-odd thousand against the constitution, would not be doing such justice in legislation as will be expected by the people.

And yet this monstrous wrong, this outrage upon all the essential principles of the Republic, is to be forced, at the point of the bayonet, upon a free people by the men who prate longest and loudest of freedom, liberty, and popular rights. In this day of progress, of advancing civilization; in the nineteenth century; in this "land of the free and home of the brave;" in this Republic, composed of sovereign, coequal States, united by and under a Constitution, the matchless work of Washington, Madison, and their noble compeers, one of those States upon which the Federal Union rests, of which it is formed, is to be dismantled, robbed of the constitution made by its people, and to have forced upon it and its million of inhabitants a constitution of government dictated to it by Congress and approved by only seventy thousand uneducated negroes—ignorant, squalid, degraded negroes! Do the annals of the world present an instance of such stupendous folly, absurdity, and wickedness? It can be justified by no man not filled with infernal hatred of our form of government and desirous of its overthrow. It must, it can only, end in blood. No man in his senses can expect anything else. The white man, the white race in the history of the world has never been the servant of the black. The madness or folly of Congress can never compel him to submit to African domination or government.

Sir, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] tells the country, by way, I suppose, of reconciling the people to this horrid work, that "we are not now merely expounding a Government; we are building one; we are making a nation." And the committee, reporting this bill in similar language, tell us that we are "building a mighty nation." They say, "But while this free people are rebuilding a mighty nation, in which there must be no taint of despotism or injustice, they have examined carefully all the provisions of the Constitution, and as a precedent which they hope will never be departed from, but which becomes necessary by the injustice of the sister States, they have determined that no State shall ever be admitted into the Union where the right to universal suffrage shall not be made permanent and impossible of violation." They have determined—the committee have determined—that no State shall ever be admitted into "this mighty nation" where the right of universal suffrage shall not be made permanent. What is to be done with New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Kentucky, and the other States which have not yet made universal suffrage permanent? They are never to be admitted into this new nation till they bow to negro domination. "Not expounding a Government," but "making a nation," "rebuilding a mighty nation in which there must be no taint of despotism or injustice!" Was there ever such impudence, such folly, such absurdity, such treason? This Reconstruction Committee, those who support this bill, members of Congress, not expounding the Constitution, not legislating according to its provisions for the Union, but building a nation, a "mighty nation." Who commissioned Congress? Where did it get the power? Who can read these bold, unblushing avowals, these foul utterances of treason to the Union, that the purpose is not to maintain this Republic of States, but to build a Government, a mighty nation, in its stead, and not stand aghast at the declaration! But there is to be "no taint of despotism" in this new, this "mighty nation!" Oh no; there is no despotism in forcing a constitution upon a people against its will. No despotism in forcing half a million white, intelligent, educated, refined men, women, and children to live under the domination of seventy thousand negroes. There is no taint of despotism or injustice in forcing the people of a sovereign State to surrender their constitution of government and accept one made by negroes. Or, can anything on earth be more cruel, arbitrary, unjust, and despotic than such a Government so enforced?

I am glad this committee and the gentleman from Pennsylvania have had the hardihood to proclaim their revolutionary purpose. There need be no longer any cavil or dispute. They would build a Government; they would make a mighty nation on the ruins of the old Union. Let the people of the States that deny universal negro suffrage take heed and understand that no State shall ever be admitted into this "mighty nation" which this revolutionary party is now making "where the right of universal suffrage shall not be made permanent and impossible of violation." This has become "necessary by the injustice of sister States." These are the solemn utterances of the representatives of a great party—the party that is building a "mighty nation." They are the official declarations of members of Congress, of a committee of the House of Representatives, while in the very act of violating its declared principles. They are the opening up of the revolutionary schemes of the party now controlling the destinies of the Republic. The grand temple of republican liberty erected by our ancestors with so much care and wisdom is to be torn down; the pillars of that majestic edifice, resting upon the solid and safe foundation of popular sovereignty and the right of self-government, are to be wrenched from their foundations, and a new Government, "a mighty nation," built in its place! And this is the war that is now being waged against our system of government, against the Constitution and Government of our fathers. Congress is not "expounding" the Constitution under which it was created and exercising the powers granted by it, but it is usurping the power and arrogating to itself the right to make a Government, to build a nation. The people are no longer to be consulted or regarded, no longer to be the architects of the Government under which they live. They must submit to the arbitrary hand of power and bare their necks to the yoke prepared by Congress and such agents as it in its majestic wisdom may depute. Congress is to rule the empire and sway the destinies of the people with more than regal power. Who will hereafter pretend that ours is a government "deriving all its just powers from the consent of the governed?" It is no longer a Government "by the people for the people." It is a Government of the people by Congress; it is the rule of the servant over the master; it is an utter denial of the right of self-government; it is Federal usurpation; it is Federal tyranny—Federal oppression.

The gentlemen who lead the other side of this House understood this in 1858. How energetically and eloquently our worthy Speaker [Mr. COLFAX] inveighed against Federal interference with the affairs and constitution of Kansas. How ably did he argue for the right of self-government—the right of the people to make their own constitutions unawed and uninfluenced by Federal power.

Let me read from his speech on that occasion, and see if it is not applicable to the present; if it does not show that this bill ought not to pass:

"A constitution is before us, not framed by the authority of an enabling act, the last Congress having failed to concur in the passage of one—not ratified by the people interested at any election in which the right to choose, the simple power of saying yes or no, had been conceded—but framed by a convention, elected under an imperfect, unfair, disfranchising, and, therefore swindling, census and registry, whose members represented on an average, exactly thirty votes apiece; who needed an army to protect them while in session from the indignation of the people, whose organic law they pretended to have been commissioned to make; who themselves conceded all that I have charged against them by submitting the constitution only to those who were willing to vote for it and to swear besides to support it; and whose ill-shapen and illegitimate offspring was repudiated as spurious by an overwhelming majority of ten thousand at a fair, open election, authorized by the Governor and Legislature of the Territory."

Ten thousand were enough to stigmatize the rule as despotic then; with a majority of twenty-odd thousand against the constitution to-day the House proposes to pass this bill:

"And yet this fraudulent instrument, which no one here is hardy enough to claim as the voice of the majority of the people of the proposed State; which no more speaks their will than does the constitution of conquered and enthralled France speak the will of the freemen of America; and which every one, here or elsewhere, knows full well is loathed and scorned and repudiated by the people who are to be forced with the bayonet to live under it—this instrument is pressed upon us for ratification on the technical ground that it emanated from a body which was nominally a convention representing the people of Kansas, that it has passed the ordeal of a pretended, one-sided submission, and that we have, therefore, no right to go behind it and inquire whether it is or is not the will of the people of that distant Territory."

The gentleman proceeds in another passage to put the following inquiry:

"Imagine, sir, George Washington sitting in the White House; that noble patriot, whose whole career is a brilliant illustration of honor and purity in high places, and who doubts that if such a constitution as this had been submitted to him for his sanction he would have spurned from his door with contempt and scorn the messenger who bore it? Or, ask yourself what would have been the indignant answer of Thomas Jefferson, who proclaimed, as the battle-cry of the Revolution, that great truth enshrined in the Declaration which has made his name immortal, and which scattered to the winds the sophistries and technicalities of the royalists of our land, that 'all Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed'; not the implied consent of enforced submission, but the actual, undeniable, unquestioned consent of the freemen who are to bear its burdens and enjoy its blessings? If a messenger had dared to enter the portals of the White House when that stern old man of iron will, Andrew Jackson, of Tennessee, lived within it, and asked him to give his indorsement and approval, the sanction of his personal character and official influence, to a constitution reeking with fraud, which its framers were seeking to enforce on a people who protested and denounced and loathed and repudiated it, and to go down to history as its voluntary advocate and champion, that messenger, I will warrant, would have remembered the torrent of rebuke with which he would have been overwhelmed till the latest hour of his life."

Then he makes an appeal in almost the same language that is used in the appeal to Congress on behalf of the people of Alabama. He says:

"She appeals to you to release her from the grasp of this despot and dictator, and to let her go free. In the language of an eloquent and gifted orator of my own State, I say, 'When she comes to us let it be as a willing bride, and not as a fettered and manacled slave.'"

So I say of Alabama.

The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] too, strange to say, spoke against the Kansas constitution on the ground that it was not freely and fairly adopted by the people who were to live under it. He, one of the committee who reports in favor of this bill, in favor of forcing this constitution upon the people of Alabama against their will, then contended manfully that the people had some rights and that Congress was bound to respect those rights. How rhetorically and bitterly eloquent he became at the thought of the Federal Executive interfering with the people in the formation of their constitution! He denounced it as usurpation—a gross outrage and wrong upon the people of Kansas. Let me read:

"I say such a thing is without precedent in the legislation of the country; is unauthorized by and in direct contravention of the Constitution of the United States. There is nothing in the Constitution of the United States which gives colorable authority for such legislation. There is nothing in the past legislation of this country that gives colorable authority for it. It is a simple act of despotism attempted to be enacted here by the Congress of the United States under cover of that Constitution which bears the peerless name of Washington. It were better, sir, that that sacred instrument should perish as though smote by the lightning of heaven than that any such act as that now proposed should be placed upon our statute-book. What is it? Why, that the Congress of the United States shall dictate to freemen that they shall accept, under pains and penalties, a bribe, and thereby become subject to a constitution which they never made, which they abhor, and which they have condemned."

Now comes the principle which I hold to be the true one, and which I want the gentleman from Ohio, when he makes his speech to-day, to answer:

"I say, and I say it without the fear of contradiction, that the genius of our Constitution is this: that new State constitutions must emanate from the people within the limits of the proposed State, and from no other source."

He said it with more eloquence and force, I have no doubt, than I could.

Sir, what has caused these most remarkable changes in the views and opinions of gentlemen? If popular sovereignty was true doctrine, if self-government was right in 1858, why is it not now? If the people of Kansas were entitled under our Constitution to frame their own fundamental law unawed by Federal bayonets and uncontrolled by Federal interference, why are not the people of Alabama? Has the result in Kansas convinced gentlemen of their error, answered all their arguments? Let the long line of emigrants fleeing from the military despotism created in and over the States of the South to seek an asylum from the oppressions of congressional reconstruction in the State of Kansas conclude the answer. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] in advocating confiscation, gave utterance to this most barbarous and inhuman sentiment: "If it drives them into exile so much the better." I would that gentleman and all those who advocate this and its kindred measures of tyranny, injustice, and oppression could have beheld only last week, as described to me by an eyewitness, the scene of sixty emigrants at the depot of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad in Baltimore, on their way to Kansas, voluntary exiles from their native homes in North Carolina. There were old men and young men; there were women and little children—a poverty-stricken, sad, and sorrowful band—resting their emaciated and weary limbs upon the floor and allaying the pangs of hunger upon crusts of bread. They had seen better and happier days; they had enjoyed the luxuries of life, the blessings of education and refinement. But, broken-hearted and in despair, they had left their sunny and once happy homes in the South, the scenes of their childhood, the birth-places of their children, and the graves of their ancestors, in the hope to find in free Kansas a place where they and their posterity may hereafter enjoy the blessings of liberty and freedom from the despotism which is crushing and destroying their old State.

Sir, the only policy under which the States of this Union or the people can prosper is that which honestly administers and fully secures to all the Constitution, and prohibits the exercise by the Federal Government of any powers not therein granted. The right of self-government cannot be denied or infringed upon with safety to the Commonwealth. The course that Congress has pursued and is pursuing in the passage of this bill will not restore good government and prosperity to Alabama. The wrong and injustice of forcing a government upon her people against their will will not soon be forgotten. The memory of it will be transmitted from father to son, and will assuredly bring the result which a sense of oppression and injury never fail to produce. The exercise of a little magnanimity, generosity, forgiveness, and kindness by the conqueror would have settled all our difficulties long ago; would have restored the States to the Union and prosperity and happiness to the people. With this spirit the victorious North should have met its conquered countrymen. Christian charity can do more now than an army with banners. A withdrawal of the armies and restoration of the government into the hands of the people is all that is necessary. That would restore the happiness and prosperity of former days, the happiness and prosperity which will never come of subjugation, oppression, and wrong.

Mr. Speaker, no man has been more desirous and anxious, I believe, than myself that the State of Alabama and the other excluded States should be represented in Congress. I believe she has been for almost three years justly entitled to have her Representatives on this floor and in the Senate. She has been, against all law and all precedents, wrongfully and unjustly excluded. But I cannot be a party to this bastard constitution, this negro government. I cannot recognize this as the State or constitution of the State. I cannot by any act of mine consent to this outrage, not upon Alabama only, but upon the people of all the States now represented in Congress. I cannot consent that seventy thousand negroes shall be the depositaries of the government of that great State; that to them shall be committed the future destinies of half a million of my own race; that they shall send seven Representatives to this House and two Senators to the Senate, when eight hundred thousand white citizens of my own State of Wisconsin can have but six Representatives and two Senators. This constitution may be good or bad; I would not vote to fasten a constitution, the best the world ever saw, upon an unwilling people. To command my support it must be the voluntary choice of those who are to live under it.

With my views I could not vote this constitution upon the people of that State if it had been made by the angels in heaven, instead of having been dictated by Congress, and enforced by the despotic power of the Army. It matters little what the constitution of government may be; if it be not the choice of the people it will be considered and felt to be a most unjust and grinding despotism, a cruel and oppressive burden. The lightest oppression is too heavy for the proud and brave long to bear. The iron in the soul wounds more deeply than manacles upon the limbs. There is no agony like that the spirit feels when crushed and bowed down by wrong and oppression. The burdens we take upon ourselves and bear with ease and pleasure would, if forced upon us by others, crush us to the earth. It is the free, the unfettered spirit that can do and brave and bear. The load the freeman carries would crush the slave. The consciousness that the man is free gives him power to do and patience to endure.

Mr. Speaker, the acts of to-day will affect this Republic for all time to come for good or for ill. Our foot-prints, as we are now moving along, will remain till the dust of ages shall cover them up, unless, as we have reason greatly to fear, the gathering storm of revolution or the rising passion of a wronged and outraged people shall wash them out with blood. The idea of the people of that State, the white people, born in freedom and accustomed to its enjoyment, submitting to a constitution formed and forced upon them as this is to be, is utterly absurd and preposterous. I have not so mean an opinion of my countrymen, my own race, the white people of Alabama, as to believe it. They may submit; they will submit so long as they are in the presence of and awed by standing armies and no longer. The time will assuredly come when the pride of race and blood will not brook the domination of inferior men; when the white people of that State, conscious of the great wrong and injustice inflicted upon them by the unhallowed hand of despotic power, and conscious, too, of their God-given strength and their right to be free, will rise in their might and drive the African rulers you shall place over them into the sea. They will regard as little the constitution enforced upon them by this bill as do those who vote for it the one they have sworn to support and which this bill so wantonly and flagrantly violates.

This bill and all such measures as subordinate the majority to the rule of the minority are but invitations to war and bloodshed. Eternal justice will bring just retribution. It may end in the destruction of both blacks and whites. It can never end in the domination by the former over the latter. I beg gentlemen to hesitate long before they endeavor to bring it about. There is a point beyond which you cannot go. Hold that people, if you will, under the sword—punish them till the most malignant passion is satiated; but seek not to make them the slaves of their former servants. They can submit to the rule of the sword without dishonor, but to be ruled and governed by the negro they cannot without utter disgrace and degradation. If you dare not trust them to govern themselves as communities, as a people, hold them in the iron grasp of military power till you dare, but do not dishonor and degrade your own countrymen and race; do not overthrow our system of government in an experiment that all history teaches must end in disaster and blood.

I can add nothing more forcible and eloquent than the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] against the Kansas bill, substituting only the word Alabama in place of Kansas:

"I repeat it: look to it, ye Representatives of the people, ye men who keep ward and watch over the Constitution and the Union, that the free men of Alabama are not by your act driven to the dread election of submission and dishonor or resistance unto blood. I tell you, notwithstanding their alleged want of manliness, Alabama has hosts of citizens, good men, and true who will never stoop to be your abject slaves—

"While heaven has light or earth has graves!"

"Sanction this constitution, conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquity, and you can only maintain it by the Federal arm and the Federal bayonet. It can never secure the voluntary support of a free people. Sanction this constitution, and with it sanction, as it sanctions, that code of abominations which the invaders of Alabama enacted, and you compel resistance. Resistance to such legislation would be duty, not crime; patriotism, not treason. The resisters or insurgents or rebels, if you please, could point you, in vindication of their rebellion, to the fact that the history of Federal intervention in Alabama, ever since the day of its organization, is but a history of repeated injuries and usurpations."

I close with reading a single passage from another speech of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] made on the occasion of the consideration of the constitution of Kansas:

"In this hour of the world's repose and the world's hope shall America, the child and the stay of the earth's old age, prove false to her most sacred traditions, false to her holiest trust, and by this proposed enactment consent to strike down liberty in her own temple and forge chains for her own children?"

Let the gentlemen answer that. I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.]

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence was granted to Mr. HAIGHT for two weeks.

Mr. NEWCOMB asked and obtained indefinite leave of absence after Tuesday next.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had disagreed to the report of the committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon House bill No. 900, to exempt certain manufactures from internal tax, had further insisted upon their amendments to said bill, and ask the appointment of another committee of conference, and that Messrs. JOHN SHERMAN, TIMOTHY O. HOWE, and A. P. MORTON had been appointed the conferees on the part of the Senate.

TAX ON MANUFACTURES.

Mr. HOLMAN. On behalf of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. SCHENCK,] who is absent on account of sickness, I ask unanimous consent to consider the message of the Senate just received.

No objection was made.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now move that the request of the Senate for another committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon House bill No. 900, to exempt certain manufactures from internal tax, be acceded to by the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as the conferees on the part of the House Messrs. ROBERT C. SCHENCK, of Ohio, THOMAS W. FERRY, of Michigan, and JAMES BROOKS, of New York.

ADMISSION OF ALABAMA.

Mr. BECK. I only desire to say a few words in answer to some of the objections made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] in regard to the minority report presented by my colleague on the committee [Mr. BROOKS] and myself concerning the three counties that were stricken out by the convention and not allowed to vote on the ratification of the constitution nor for officers under the constitution.

Now, sir, the fact is that these three counties were not the only counties created by the convention of 1866, which the gentleman complains was, under a provisional government, organized illegally by the President of the United States, but ten new counties were organized under the action of that convention. Previous to 1866 the constitution of Alabama required that each county should contain nine hundred square miles; by the convention of 1866 the minimum size of counties was reduced to six hundred square miles, and ten new counties were created—Clay, Cleburn, Crenshaw, Elmore, Hale, Lee, Bullock, Baine, Colbert, and Jones. In all those ten counties the people were registered and allowed to cast their votes for members of the convention. After the convention framed the constitution the three counties of Baine, Colbert, and Jones were stricken out, and were not allowed to cast their votes for the ratification of the constitution or against it, although the county of Jones had 1,178 voters registered, the county of Colbert had 1,810, and the county of Baine about the same number, each being entitled to a representative. But each of these counties being composed almost exclusively of white men, and each entitled to a representative on the basis of representation adopted by the convention, they were stricken out altogether, while the seven other counties created at the same time were allowed to remain, and were recognized by the convention, because in a majority of them the blacks predominated. That was the objection we made. By the census of 1866, as set forth in the report of the assistant commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau—and it is from that I take my statistics—there were only 439,000 blacks in the State of Alabama against 532,000 whites, being an excess of 93,000 whites; and yet the counties in which the blacks predominate control sixty-five representatives, while the counties in which the whites predominate only control thirty-five, and the basis of representation, as set forth by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. KERR,] shows that while it takes 11,220 where the white men are in the majority to elect a representative, only 8,900 are required where the blacks have the control. That was one objection which I desired to state.

I desire to say to the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] who has offered an amendment, that if he will adhere to it and add to it the proviso which I hold in my hand, and which I propose to read in a moment, it will come nearer securing a fair election in the State of Alabama than anything which has yet been proposed. The House will remember that the reconstruction act only excluded from the right of suffrage those men who were to be excluded from the right to hold office by the proposed fourteenth amendment to the Constitution. The House will also remember that a large number of the members of the convention elected themselves as registrars, and struck off and put on the names of voters, and were themselves candidates for office under this constitution. I suggest to the gentleman this proviso:

Provided, That no man shall be deprived of the right to register and vote in the county where he resides for or against the ratification of the proposed constitution, and for all officers to be elected thereunder, except such as are prohibited from holding office by virtue of the third article of the proposed fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States: And provided further, That no man who is a candidate for any office under the proposed constitution shall either act as registrar, or as an officer of the election, or shall in any manner take part either in determining who shall have the right to vote, who have voted, or how the fact of his right shall be determined, and any interference or attempted interference by any candidate for any office in any of these respects shall render the election of such candidate null and void, and all votes cast for him shall, so far as he is concerned, be nullities.

That will give the people of Alabama a fair chance to determine whether or not they in fact desire this constitution. Only 70,000 have voted for it out of 170,000 registered voters, while there are only 90,000 black men in the State of Alabama, according to the report of the assistant commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, and 108,000 white men, making a majority of 18,000 whites over the blacks. The gentleman from Wisconsin says that only 5,000 white men are disfranchised by the provisions of the third section of the fourteenth amendment, and he reports that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWWELL] says there are not more than 1,000; still the fact is that only 90,000 colored men over twenty-one years of age present the singular anomaly of having 98,548 registered voters, while 108,000 white men, with only say 5,000 of them disqualified, are cut down to 72,746 registered voters. If the majority in favor of this constitution is as great as is contended here, why not let the constitution go back, pass such laws as will enable all to vote upon it, and ascertain the truth of the allegations on either side? My great objection to this bill is that by it Congress undertakes to force upon the people of Alabama a constitution as the constitution of their choice, when the fact is that less than a majority of the people of that State whom you have allowed to vote have declared themselves for it, and it has been in fact rejected in accordance with the acts of this Congress.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to modify the substance which I offered for this bill the other day so that it will read as follows:

That the constitution framed by the convention of Alabama, which was submitted for ratification by the people at an election commencing on the 4th day of February, 1868, is hereby declared to be the fundamental and organic law for a provisional government for the people of Alabama, so far as the same is not in conflict with the Constitution and laws of the United States. And the officers elected at said election shall, on the 1st day of May, 1868, qualify as provided in said constitution and the ordinances of said convention, and immediately thereafter enter upon the discharge of the duties of their respective offices.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Governor, at any time after he shall have qualified and entered upon the discharge of the duties of his office, may, by proclamation, convene the Legislature chosen at said election. The Legislature, when so convened, shall possess all the power conferred by said constitution which may not be in conflict with the Constitution and laws of the United States. And the Legislature is hereby further empowered to submit said constitution to the qualified electors of Alabama for ratification at such time or times as it may designate. And said Legislature is also empowered, by a majority vote of each House, to submit the said constitution, as framed by the convention, with or without amendments proposed by the Legislature. And if amendments be proposed by the Legislature they shall be voted upon separately, and not in connection with the constitution as it came from the convention.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That whenever the people, by a majority vote of the qualified electors of Alabama, qualified under the act of Congress of March 23, 1867, to vote for delegates to frame a constitution, and actually voting upon such ratification, shall have ratified a constitution submitted as aforesaid, and the Legislature of the proposed State organization shall have adopted the amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and known as article fourteen, the constitution of Alabama may be presented to Congress for its approval.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the district commanders shall furnish all necessary aid in enforcing this act, and the act of March 2, 1867, entitled "An act to provide for a more efficient government for the rebel States," and the acts supplemental to and amendatory thereof shall remain in full force in Alabama, except as modified by this act, until Alabama shall be restored to representation in Congress.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, the bill reported a few days since from the Committee on Reconstruction, through their chairman, [Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania,] I consider of great importance. The preamble sets forth that—

Whereas the people of Alabama, in pursuance of the provisions of an act of Congress entitled "An act for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, and the acts supplementary thereto, have framed a constitution of State government which is republican in form; and whereas at an election commencing on the 4th day of February, 1868, a large majority of the legal voters of said State, voting at said election, voted for the adoption of said constitution.

The first section provides—

That the said State of Alabama shall be recognized and admitted as one of the States of the United States, and shall be entitled to representation in Congress, as soon as the Legislature of that State, the members of which were elected at the election mentioned in the preamble of this act, shall have duly ratified the amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and known as article fourteen.

And the second section relates to the rights of suffrage of citizens of the United States. That bill, after considerable discussion, was recommended, and the committee, through Mr. FARNSWORTH, one of its members, reported in lieu thereof the bill which is now under consideration, the preamble of which is the same as that of the former bill. The first section enacts—

That the said State of Alabama shall be entitled to representation in Congress as soon as the Legislature of said State, the members of which were elected at the election mentioned in the preamble of this act, shall have duly ratified the amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and known as article fourteen.

And the second section provides—

That it shall be the duty of the commanding general of the military district in which Alabama is included to notify the members of the Legislature of said State, chosen at the election held in February, 1868, to assemble at the capital of said State within thirty days after the passage of this act.

There are also two proposed amendments printed and laid upon our desks, one of which is proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BAKER,] which is in substance almost the same as that reported by the committee, and the other, proposed by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] which is asking that the constitution be referred back to another vote of the registered electors. I am opposed, Mr. Speaker, to both these amendments. The one proposed by Mr. BAKER is not, in my opinion, as good as that reported by the committee; and as to the one proposed by Mr. POLAND, referring the matter back to another vote seems to be unnecessary, as I will hereafter show. Subsequently three additional amendments have been proposed and printed, one of which is by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] He proposes to strike out the third section of the bill reported through Mr. FARNSWORTH.

There may be some doubt whether the conditions contained in this third section could be strictly carried out, but I do not deem it necessary to discuss that at this time, and am satisfied as to whatever the majority of this House may do in regard to it. My main desire is to have that as well as all the other late rebellious States admitted to representation with as little delay as possible. Another of these amendments is by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] by which he proposes to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof four sections which, among other things, provide for referring the constitution back to the registered electors of Alabama, to be again voted upon, and that of Mr. STEVENS providing for universal suffrage in said State. That however, is fully provided for in the bill reported by Mr. FARNSWORTH. I have given the constitution adopted by the convention of the State of Alabama, and submitted to the qualified voters for ratification, (a copy of which has been transmitted to Congress,) a careful examination, and I am satisfied that it is republican in form, and the framers of it deserve not only the thanks of Congress, but of the entire nation, for the able and cautious manner in which it has been drawn.

There certainly can be no substantial objection urged against it, and if a change should be subsequently deemed necessary a provision is made for it in the constitution before us. But it is contended on this floor that Alabama is not in a condition to be admitted at this time in accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress of the 2d of March, A. D. 1867, entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," and the supplements thereto of the 23d of March, A. D. 1867, entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States,' passed March 2, 1867, and to facilitate restoration," the fifth section of which (supplement) reads as follows:

"That if, according to said return, the Constitution shall be ratified by a majority of the votes of the registered electors qualified as therein specified, cast at said election, at least one half of all the registered voters voting upon the question of such ratification, the president of the convention shall transmit a copy of the same, duly certified, to the President of the United States, who shall forthwith transmit the same to Congress, if then in session, and if not in session, then immediately upon its next assembling; and if it shall, moreover, appear to Congress that the election was one at which all the registered and qualified electors in the State had an opportunity to vote freely and without restraint, fear, or the influence of fraud; and if the Congress shall be satisfied that such constitution meets the approval of a majority of all the qualified electors in the State, and if the said constitution shall be declared by Congress to be in conformity with the provisions of the act to which this is supplementary, and the other provisions of said act shall have been complied with, and the said constitution shall be approved by Congress, the State shall be declared entitled to representation, and Senators and Representatives shall be admitted therefrom as herein provided."

It will be seen that the above section provides that the Constitution must be ratified by a majority of the votes of the registered electors, "at least one half of all the registered voters voting upon the question." It is said that the whole number of registered voters in that State is about 170,000, and of course the one half of which would be 85,000. It is conceded that one half of all the registered voters did not vote upon the question of such ratification. It appears by a letter from General Grant, in answer to a resolution of this House, that according to General Meade's report there had been 71,817 votes polled, of which 70,812 were cast in favor of the ratification of the constitution and 1,005 against it, thus showing a majority of 69,807 in favor of its adoption, and which is 13,188 less than one half of the reported registered vote. It is contended, however, by some, that at least one half of the actual registered voters in the State at the time of the election did vote, inasmuch as after the registration a large number left the State, others died, and some were defectively registered, so that by a proper correction full one half exercised the right of voting. But suppose one half did not vote, it will be seen on examination of the reconstruction law that there is no prohibition in the reconstruction act or supplements thereto against the admission of Alabama in case a majority of the registered electors should not vote on the question; but that act makes the admission imperative in case a majority of the electors should vote and certify other conditions therein specified be complied with, so that there is no inconsistency in Congress passing a law for the admission of that State to representation when a large majority of those qualified electors that saw fit on that occasion to exercise the right voted in favor of the ratification.

It seems, Mr. Speaker, that every effort was made on the part of those who were opposed to the ratification of the constitution to prevent a vote by a majority of those registered, and I presume the main movers in this strategy for a reduced vote were those who were disqualified on account of their participation in the rebellion; and if those who were qualified to vote and opposed to the constitution neglected to exercise the right it is not for them now to complain. But it has been asked why was not a larger vote polled by those said to be in favor of the ratification? My answer, Mr. Speaker, is that it appears that the proper accommodations were not provided, the polls having been established at inconvenient distances from many of the voters, so that it was very difficult, especially for those who had to travel on foot, to reach them; and besides, there had been heavy rains about that time, causing swollen streams and making the roads in many places almost impassible.

The supplement above referred to provides that "there shall be an opportunity to vote freely and without restraint, fear, or the influence of fraud." This part of the statute seems not to have been fully complied with, hence the reason why the vote was not larger. I would have preferred if there had been a majority of the registered electors voting; still I see no good reason for putting the Government to the expense and the electors to the great inconvenience of another voting on this question. It was a great mistake to have inserted in the reconstruction acts such a clause as to require at least one half of the registered voters voting upon the question of ratification. As a general rule in almost all cases a majority of those voting control in an election, and why a different rule should have been established in this case I cannot imagine, for there is no compulsion for electors to vote, and why should their staying away from the polls be the means of preventing a majority of the votes polled from prevailing? But Congress has recently removed that defect in the reconstruction acts, so far as regards future voting in the unreconstructed States, so that a majority of the votes cast shall govern. This latter act, after having passed both Houses of Congress, was sent to the President for his approval, but he neither signed nor vetoed it, and let it become a law by neglecting to return the same within ten days. So that it would be folly to require Alabama to vote over again on the question of the ratification of its constitution, and certainly those who willfully stayed away from the polls have no right to complain.

There is a wholesome provision in the reconstruction law that I deem of vast importance as to the future welfare of this Republic, and that is requiring of all these States as a condition-precedent to representation in Congress the ratification by their Legislatures of the amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress and known as article fourteen. That amendment settles the question as to who are citizens, and extends to all the protection of law and the apportionment of Representatives. It also provides that the validity of the public debt of the United States authorized by law, including debts incurred for the payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing the insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned; and said amendment also declares that neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave, but all such debts, obligations, and claims shall be held illegal and void. This amendment being ratified by three fourths of all the States of the Union, there can be no question raised as to whether a ratification by three fourths of the States that did not claim to have seceded would be sufficient; and then to change it would also require three fourths of the States, which it is not likely could ever be obtained; so the adoption of this amendment makes our country safe against speculators and evil designing men, who might be disposed to involve us by assuming the rebel debt, and make us liable for slaves emancipated, which would be ruinous.

As I have already said, Mr. Speaker, the adoption of article fourteen is a condition-precedent to representation in the bill under consideration. I am rejoiced to find that the dark cloud that seemed to be hovering over us is about being dispelled, and that the late rebellious States are again taking their stand in the Union, properly reconstructed, so as to protect life, liberty, and property. Then the governing of their States by military rule, with which the Democratic members of this House found so much fault, can be dispensed with, unless it might be for a short time to prevent obstruction to the enforcement of the civil law. Had the southern people manifested the proper spirit there would have been no occasion to place over them military rule; but under the circumstances then existing it was the only recourse left for Congress, and now, from present indications, it can soon be dispensed with.

It has, Mr. Speaker, long been the desire of the Republican members of the House that these States should again be represented in Congress, and every effort was employed on our part to have that end accomplished as soon as it could be with safety to the Union. We could not, without being derelict to duty, admit such representation until we had a sufficient guarantee for the future. The nation has suffered too much in the way of expenditures of money and loss of hundreds of thousands of our bravest young men to allow any State that had claimed to secede and joined the rebellion to take its stand in full fellowship in the Union until thoroughly reconstructed, so as to render the nation secure in the future. I do not agree with the doctrine that any of the so-called rebel States were taken out of the Union by the rebellion and are now to be treated as conquered provinces. I think such theory unsafe and one that I have battled against ever since the question was agitated, and if such doctrine should be entertained by Congress it would involve the country in inextricable difficulties.

But it may be said if they were not out of the Union how can Congress insist on their reconstruction? My answer is that by the rebellion they overthrew their State governments and were reduced to such a condition as to render it impossible for the United States to guarantee them a republican form of government. Hence, in order to accomplish that a reconstruction policy was necessary in order to subdue the rebellious spirit and afford adequate protection to the citizens; and, in my opinion, it would be unwise to adopt a theory that might involve the country in difficulties with citizens of foreign nations in regard to the rebel debt. We have full authority under the Constitution to regulate these States prior to their admission to representation, without adopting any doubtful policy, and had not a large portion of these States listened to evil advisers, they might have been admitted to full fellowship with the other States long since, and been in a more prosperous condition.

Mr. Speaker, I regret that one of my colleagues [Mr. BOYER] should exhibit so much venom against the Republican party, which is founded on the old Whig party, of which he was at one time a member. He, in classic style, denominates it—

"A party which has not hesitated during three years to wantonly perpetrate disunion, and to rob the nation of the natural fruits of peace; a party which seeks to degrade the judiciary, destroy the executive, and murder constitutional liberty for party ends, may be expected to do anything else which might be deemed necessary for the accomplishment of the same objects."

Why, sir, if it had not been for the great Republican party what would have become of this Republic when leading men, during the country's struggle for existence, promulgated the abominable—I will not for the sake of modesty say reasonable—doctrine that if a State undertakes to secede there is no power under the Constitution to prevent it, notwithstanding the President is bound under that instrument "to take care that the laws be faithfully executed?" and it seems to me no good statesman or sound lawyer will contend at this day that secession is warranted under the laws and Constitution of the Union. The Republican party well deserves the credit of putting down the rebellion and saving the country. When has that great party attempted to "perpetuate disunion and rob the nation?" Why, in article fourteen of the amendments to the Constitution, proposed by the Republican party, is the very salvation of the Union, and yet we find that gentleman and his present party opposing it. We are charged by him with destroying the Executive. The Executive no sooner joined hands with the gentleman's party than he became reckless and the friend of rebels who sought to overthrow the country, and became so emboldened that it was found necessary to impeach him. We are also charged with "murdering the Constitution!" Now, sir, as to that we, as a party, have always sought to sustain it in its purity, while the gentleman and his party were endeavoring to protect those who in the country's peril attempted to destroy it.

I will say, in addition, Mr. Speaker, that all the abuse of the gentleman and his party, to which he clings with so much tenacity, will not deter this side of the House from doing its duty, and hurrying the admission of representatives in Congress from these ten States as soon as it can possibly be done with safety to the country, which, if reconstruction progresses with a proper spirit on the part of citizens residing therein, will be in a few months. I would say to our friends this is no time to stand upon technicalities; and as Alabama has presented a fair case it is our duty to admit it, and certainly it presents full as strong a claim as did Kansas when it was admitted under the Wyandott constitution by the act of Congress of January 29, 1861. I will say, in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that it affords me great satisfaction to find my venerable colleague, the chairman, [Mr. STEVENS,] is still able to battle in the cause of reconstruction, and though, through age, disease, and close application, he has become somewhat enfeebled in body, yet that gigantic intellect with which he has been endowed by an all-wise Providence remains as clear as the sun at noonday. I trust that his health may be preserved so that he may be enabled to join in welcoming to representation those erring States by admitting to seats on this floor loyal Representatives, which God grant may be within the course of a few months.

Mr. BINGHAM obtained the floor, and said: I yield twenty minutes of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WILLIAMS.]

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I shall vote against this bill, as I did against the recent amendment of the reconstruction acts; and inasmuch as in so doing I shall probably be found at variance with many of my political friends, I crave the privilege of stating in as few words as possible the reasons that have brought me to this conclusion.

The arguments upon which the present measure rests—as did the other—are substantially these:

1. That it is essential to the settlement of the nation that we should not only invite but compel the rebel States to come in and sit down at the board we have so generously spread for them, at all hazards and in the shortest possible time;

2. That the rule which required a majority of the registered voters to accept the invitation was a profound error in policy; and

3. That the loyal people of Alabama were intimidated by threats, and deterred by foul weather, from signifying their desire to respond to the importunate instances of those who were pining so greatly for their return.

In the first place, then, while I am as anxious as any man to see this Union restored, I do not agree that it is either essential or wise that these people should be compelled to enjoy its privileges, and share in its Government, against their will. I am not one of those who think that all that is necessary to restoration is the outward presentment of it, in the reappearance of the delinquents within these Halls, only perhaps to embarrass our legislation and defy our power, as heretofore. I want evidence that a majority of them at least are sincerely desirous to get back, and that not for the purpose of escaping from our military rule, but because they have repented of their great crime and feel like the returning prodigal, an instinctive yearning for the old roof-tree, and a reawakening affection for the old Union that watched over their cradles, and the old flag that their own fathers would have died to defend from insult or dishonor. Upon no other terms than these would I desire to see them here, as upon no other would it, in my opinion, be consistent with the public safety or with sound statesmanship to readmit them, with no means of retrieving a possible error that might prove to be a fatal one.

And yet I find no such condition of things in any of the rebel States. If there be any considerable number of white men there, who have any conviction of wrong, any sense of contrition for what they have done—beyond that feeling of remorse which smote the hearts of Satan and his peers only because their enterprise had failed—or any honest regard for that Union which they so lately endeavored to destroy, I have not seen the evidences of it. Too proud even to enact the part of the hypocrite in the presence of those who seemed to wish to be deceived, they have not, I think, made, and certainly not paraded, any pretension of loyalty beyond the reluctant declaration that they submit to the necessities of their condition, which is precisely the standard that the apostate President had prescribed, and no more. So long as they were without hope they were humble, it is true; but who does not know that with every glance of encouragement from the Executive of this Government their visors have been lifted, and their unconquered pride and unrepented diabolism revealed anew? And this was natural. The monsters who could be capable of starving and shooting their own captive brethren in cold blood were not to be reclaimed to love or even humanized by chastisement. If the appearances had been even otherwise the statesman must have felt that after a five years' wanton, unprovoked, and barbarous war, such as these men had waged against us, those appearances required to be scrutinized before being trusted, because they were unnatural. But with these great facts flashed again and again into our eyes, it passes all comprehension with me how any cautious, reflecting man should think for a moment of compelling these incorrigible malignants into an association of power with a people whom they hate, and a Government they will spare no effort, as they have spared none heretofore, to destroy; and this, too, in a case where there is no apology for haste, as there never can be in great affairs of State; where we can afford to wait if they can; where we can control them outside, and shall only break our scepter by letting them in to defy us as before. I doubt whether there is a Government on earth that would take such a risk as this, except it may be our own. It was not certainly thus that imperial Rome maintained her conquests over the barbarian world.

Nor am I ready to agree that the rule which required a majority of the registered votes was an erroneous one. I voted for it, and against its repeal. I did not then, and do not now, believe that to give to a minority of the people, whether white or black, the power to construct a government for the whole is to fulfill the constitutional guarantee of a republican government, of which I supposed the majority principle to be an essential feature. The argument that the refusal of a majority to vote in such a case is either evidence of assent or only a default which may be punished by giving the rule to a wakeful minority does not satisfy me. It strikes me only as a flimsy sophism, resting on a false analogy. In a State which has a government, and that a loyal one, the reasonable presumption is that the man who declines to exercise his privilege of suffrage is willing to trust the business of politics to those who do, and it is a necessity that the majority of the votes cast there should decide in order to have any effective election at all. Here it is a question of the erection of a new government, among a people who have just emerged from a universal rebellion, and are all, of course, presumptively disloyal. It is an affirmative expression that you want with such an element, and the presumption, therefore, is that all who do not vote are in antagonism to the plan which you propose. If they be, however, there is an end of the question, unless you are prepared to reject the majority idea in the very first steps of the establishment of a civil and political State, which you intend to be republican, and are bound to make so. And the objection is neither captious nor technical, as the rapid reconstructionists would have you to believe. It is substantial, fundamental, vital. Other foundation can no man lay for a republican State than on the will of a majority, which the supporters of this bill are constrained to assume, not only without evidence, but against it.

But then it is insisted that the majority were deterred from voting by threats, and fraud, and "accidents by flood and field." No argument could have been more unhappy and unseasonable than this; and those who mistrust this hurry, and doubt the wisdom of this bill, may well exclaim, on hearing it, "I thank thee, Jew, for teaching me that word." Assuming the fact to be as supposed, and without indulging in any unkind reflection upon the fair-weather patriots, who were too delicate to wrestle with the angry elements, or even to brave the clouds, on which the iron men of the North looked down from the heights of Lookout mountain, I see in this statement the literal verification of my worst fears—"confirmations strong as proofs of holy writ," of the heavy doubts that have oppressed me in regard to the admission of these States, even upon their rigorous compliance with the severest terms that Congress has imposed on them. If I had hesitated before as to the wisdom of admitting any of them, I should scarcely do so now, upon this startling confession. We know that the white men, in Alabama at least, have almost invariably refused to vote. The government we propose to admit, then, is not only a minority government, but substantially a negro government. Now, while I have been among the very first to advocate the suffrage of the black man in the rebel States, as well upon the principles of the Declaration of Independence as from a sense of gratitude and justice, and upon the conviction that it was a necessity of State—the cheapest, and, indeed, the only defense of his liberties and our peace—I am not quite persuaded of the wisdom or propriety of surrendering the republican idea of the majority rule, for the purpose of bringing in a new government, whether it be black, yellow, or red, without, at least, some little intermixture of the paler element. Whatever objection may be taken to the form of speech, I cannot shut my eyes to the great fact that this Government was built by white men, upon ideas, if not instincts, that were peculiar to their race, and, perhaps, to some only of the great families that compose it; that its predominating element is still the same; and that there is no reason to expect that in the long future it will ever put on any other complexion.

In saying this I would not be understood as intending to disparage the political rights of any race that fate or fortune has cast upon our shores, whether it be the docile African or that other and more turbulent one, that comes by shiploads, with its Old-World ideas, and its anti-republican instincts in church and State, to fill the ranks and feed the wasting reservoirs of the so-called American democracy. We have them both to deal with, as we have had the Spaniard and the Frenchman, and have now the Mexican and the Indian, and under the new purchase of the President and Senate, if ratified here—which God forbid—the Esquimaux or Mongol of the Polar sea, and must do the best we can to incorporate and assimilate, if we cannot fuse down these heterogeneous elements, by educating them into a love of order and a just appreciation of the rights of man. But nobody, I suppose, would think of constructing a durable republican State from either of these materials without a judicious inter-mixture—a little leaven—a flavoring; at least, of that high instinct which puts the man above the State, and has, in the process of ages, evolved stability and independence from the assertion of individual manhood, and, as its consequence, a just respect for the rights and liberties of all.

The negro, as we know, has just thrown off the chains that have shackled his limbs and bound down his higher faculties for more than two hundred years. That he will be able to maintain himself for any considerable time, even by superior numbers, without a reasonable amount of support from loyalists with whiter skins, in the presence of the stronger and more cultivated, if not the higher ethnic element, I do not believe. When you bring the two races—nay, any two races—in juxtaposition, on terms of equality and rivalry, the weaker will be sure to go to the wall; just as among the white races the Celtic man has always succumbed in the presence of the stronger Teuton, as well on this continent as upon the other. With the white element divided, as in the State of Tennessee, I should have felt no difficulty on this score. But where it is all black on one side and all white on the other I see no safety in, as I look for no great popularity for, the measure here. When I am told that the loyal black and white man both have been afraid to vote, even under the ægis of our flag, and with the bayonets of the Federal Government at their backs, I realize the imminent risk that, once within the charmed circle of the Union, the arrogant and still unconquered rebel of the South will put his foot upon the neck of his quondam slave, but that the poor white man, too, whom that power has held in the like chains of ignorance and dependence will, probably share the same fate. It makes no difference, in my judgment, that the rebel lords are even disfranchised. They still hold, by the grace of Andrew Johnson, all their great baronial possessions, with all the influence that waits on property. There is a spirit of caste, a power of public opinion, that is stronger than political institutions, more potent than the law, which, even without the suffrage, will climb into the seats of justice, invade the jury-box, and eventually govern the State. Until the whole texture and framework of society there are changed—a result which the treachery of the President has now apparently rendered impossible except in the lapse of years—whenever it becomes the interest of the proprietor classes to unbend, there is danger that they will conquer the negro, and the poor white man, by the same courtly arts, and the same gracious and irresistible condescension, by which they so promptly overcame and mastered the fiercest of their enemies, in the person of him who has now delivered the South over to their rule. It is not wise to underrate their power. It is confessed, I think, as well in the recitals of my colleague [Mr. KELLEY] a day or two ago as in the reign—I do not intend a pun—of terror, so graphically described by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] himself. If it was strong enough to subdue even the man who hated its possessors, because they looked down on him as a plebeian; if the first ray of its beneficent regards was powerful enough to melt down the fierceness of the tiger to the meekness of the lamb, and to make the dispenser of more than royal patronage feel honored even by its acceptance of a pardon at the hands of a parvenu; if its fascination has been so irresistible as to lead even the rugged Democrat of the North, whose heart went out with the hegira of his southern allies, and abode with them through all the vicissitudes of the war, to regard the southern lordling as a better man than himself, what hope is there for the unfuture negro, and the equally untutored white man of the South, who have been trained alike to habits of obedience and reverence under that aristocratic rule? If they can be deterred from voting now by menaces of injury, what will be their condition when the arm of the Federal Government shall be withdrawn? and what will be ours with that power once more securely enthroned at the Capitol? I shudder at the risks which all this involves, and cannot consent to be a party to any measure that invites them.

It is said, however, that all this is but conditioned upon the ratification of the constitutional amendment by the Legislature lately elected—the stipulation that the Constitution shall never be so amended as to deprive any citizen or class now entitled of the right to vote, or to allow anybody excluded by the fourteenth article—and the reservation of the power here to annul any amendments or enactments made in violation of these conditions.

Without inquiring whether an antecedent ratification is such a one as the Constitution requires in case the amendment in question is not already a part of that instrument—as I think it is—it is only necessary to say that the reservation is an idle one. Is there any way of enforcing it? If there be, what is it? Is the defaulting State to be expelled, or is its law to be nullified by legislation here? Where will gentlemen find the power to do either? Does it rest on the contract or the Constitution? If on the former, how is that to confer on Congress a jurisdiction which the Constitution does not give, or to take away from the States a power that is expressly reserved to the States respectively and to the people? I have no faith in such stipulations. They confess a condition of things which is not yet ripe for unconditional restoration. I do not choose to anticipate by taking such a risk. I prefer to wait until all is at least apparently safe. There will be danger enough even then. It is no easy task to construct a friendly republican State, with a hostile element so formidable to be dealt with and provided for. He is but an apprentice in political science who thinks it can be done either in a hurry, or without the coöperation of a clear majority of the people. No good thing, no instrument certainly of a structure so delicate or complex as the organism of a State, was ever perfected in a hurry. We can afford to wait. I warn gentlemen that we cannot afford to commit an error.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I can scarcely hope, in the short time that is left to me, to answer all that has been suggested on this side of the House and also upon that side of the House against the bill which was reported by the Committee on Reconstruction. The bill as originally ordered to be reported by the committee is as follows:

A bill to admit the State of Alabama to representation in Congress.

Whereas the people of Alabama, in pursuance of the provisions of an act of Congress entitled "An act for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, and the acts supplementary thereto, have framed a constitution of State government which is republican in form; and whereas at an election commencing on the 4th day of February, A. D. 1868, a large majority of the legal voters of said State, voting at said election, voted for the adoption of said constitution: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the said State of Alabama shall be entitled to representation in Congress as soon as the Legislature of said State, the members of which were elected at the election mentioned in the preamble of this act, shall have duly ratified the amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress and known as article fourteen.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the commanding general of the military district in which Alabama is included to notify the members of the Legislature of said State, chosen at the election held in February, 1868, to assemble at the capital of said State within thirty days after the passage of this act.

I desire to assure the House, in the outset, that I do not stand here to-day wedded to any special form of restoration. The records of this House will bear witness that I have surrendered before, as I surrender to-day touching this matter, measures which I thought essential to the prosperity of all the people of this country in this work of reconstruction.

The bill as originally reported by the Committee on Reconstruction is not the bill which I had the honor to refer to it. But I assented to their bill as originally reported and above set forth, and am willing to stand by it, acting in this matter upon the principle which has always governed my action, a principle that statesmen cannot well afford to ignore; that if you cannot obtain what you would obtain, then you should take what you can get.

The great point is the restoration of the State; it concerns all the people of this country. We are pledged, so far as we have the control over this question, to interpose no obstruction to restoration. We have heretofore gone to the people upon that issue, and they expect us to keep faith with them. The interest of all the people of this country, outside of as well as within the territorial limits of Alabama, are involved in this question of the speedy restoration of the State to its proper relations to the other States of this Union.

Now, the gentlemen on the Democratic side of the House have an account to settle with the people, because they have heretofore attempted to secure such legislation as would work against reconstruction and prevent these States from being speedily restored to their proper relations in the Union. There stands the record to bear witness of the truth of that which I aver.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] stands here to denounce me to-day for advocating the restoration of a State under the operation and limitations of existing law, when the record bears witness that in spite of every effort of mine to the contrary the gentleman and his party, with one honorable exception, united with the minority on our side to interpose these very obstacles and by law place these very fetters on the action of the people. More than once, standing in my place here, fettered and restrained by the combined opposition of a minority of my own side of the House and a solid vote on the other side, I insisted that every resident citizen of the United States, being a male person over twenty-one years of age, should, without regard to his past conduct, be permitted to vote on this question of reorganization and restoration. Twice over I was sustained in that position by the Senate; twice I was sustained in that position by a vote of this House; but at last I was defeated by a minority of Republicans with the united vote of the representatives of the Democracy. Now, gentlemen who assisted in getting up this condition of things come here and undertake to denounce me and those who act with me for the results of their own handiwork.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I did not intend to denounce the gentleman.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire now to say to the House that the first two sections of this bill with the preamble did receive the support of a majority of the Committee on Reconstruction, and were ordered to be reported to this House. I desire to say further, that the third section of this bill, as it stands printed, never did receive the support of a majority of the Committee on Reconstruction. The committee was called together after the bill had been agreed upon, and—

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I suppose the gentleman does not mean to say that the third section was not considered and adopted by a majority of a quorum at a regular meeting of the committee, called upon due notice?

Mr. BINGHAM. No, sir. I was just stating, when the gentleman interrupted me, that after the committee had ordered this bill to be reported without this third section, the committee was called together again, and by a minority only, as I am advised, by but four votes of the committee, was the third section ordered to be reported to the House. I have moved to strike it out for that reason, that it never received the support of the majority of the committee; for the further reason that it is in direct contravention of the pledged faith of the majority of this House in its past legislation—faith pledged to the people of Alabama as well as to the people of the other unreconstructed States. It, in other words, imposes conditions which were not imposed upon them by the previous existing legislation of Congress. I think myself that too many conditions have been imposed hitherto. I am opposed to laying upon them any further conditions. For that reason I ask that this third section may be stricken out; and in order that I may be more fully understood by the House let me read the language of the section:

That said State of Alabama shall be entitled to representation in Congress and recognized as a State of the Union upon the following conditions: that the constitution of Alabama shall never be so amended or changed as to deprive any citizen or any class of citizens of the United States of the right to vote, who are entitled to vote by the constitution herein recognized.

Now, sir, I oppose this, because, as I have already said, there is nothing in your statute-laws that authorizes the adoption of any such condition. I oppose it for the further reason that there is nothing in the Constitution of the country that authorizes it. I say, in the words of Washington, that the basis of the whole American system is the right of the people to alter and to amend their constitutions of government at pleasure, subject always to the limitations and restrictions of the Constitution of the United States. Why, sir, take this third section literally as it stands, and it results that a man, for any future bad conduct, in violation of the laws of the State and the country, in violation of the private rights of his fellow-citizens, could not, by the act of the people of the State, be disfranchised, because, forsooth, you choose to put into a law as a fundamental condition of the restoration of the State, the words, "that the constitution of Alabama shall never be so amended or changed as to deprive any citizen or any class of citizens of the United States of the right to vote who are entitled to vote by the constitution herein recognized." Sir, the American system of government is a total failure if the people cannot be intrusted with the right of altering and amending their constitutions of government at their pleasure, subject to the general limitations of the Federal Constitution.

Besides, sir, it is a departure from all your previously enacted legislation on the subject of reconstruction. There is not a word of the sort in any of your acts.

But the third section contains the further provision that the constitution of the State shall never be "so amended or changed as to allow any person to vote who is excluded from office by the third section of the fourteenth article of the amendment to the Constitution of the United States until the disabilities imposed by said section shall have been removed in the manner therein provided."

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, I am justified in saying to the House and the country there is no colorable excuse for attempting to ingraft such an act as this upon the statute-book of the United States.

Why, sir, this Congress is concluded on that question, and the Thirty-Ninth Congress as well. When I speak of this Congress and the Thirty-Ninth Congress I recognize the majority of the Thirty-Ninth Congress who voted for the fourteenth article of amendment to the Constitution as now present. They then conceded, sir, that to place a limitation of this sort upon reconstructed or unreconstructed States it was needful it should be authorized by an amendment to the Constitution of the country; and when the fourteenth article of amendment was reported to the House from the Committee on Reconstruction it contained a limitation that persons who participated in the rebellion should not vote for Representatives in Congress or presidential electors until after the year 1870. Where was the need of this limitation then, for a period of three years, by way of amendment to the Constitution, if you could impose it by mere act of Congress, as a fundamental condition for the restoration of a State? Let some man who advocates this third section answer that question.

Sir, the question as to its policy, as to its wisdom, as to its justice, was condemned by the Thirty-Ninth Congress. To be sure this House, by the aid of the Democratic members coöperating with the minority on the Republican side, resisted your efforts and mine to strike out from the fourteenth article of amendment this limitation upon the elective franchise for three years, and fastened it upon us in the House. We sent the amendment with that limitation in it to the Senate. The yeas and nays were there called upon it, and every vote in that body save one was recorded to strike out the limitation as a thing not to be tolerated even for the short period of three years, much less for the indefinite period contemplated by the third section of this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I have said all it is needful to say to justify my motion pending before the House to strike the third section out. I leave it there perfectly willing the House should pass judgment upon it in the light of our past legislation. It is quite inconsistent with all we have ever done, and I trust it is quite inconsistent with all we shall do hereafter touching this matter of restoration.

I come now to the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS;] and I desire to say here, as I have already intimated in the remarks I have addressed to the House, it would have been acceptable to me, in perfect accord with all I have ever endeavored to do touching this matter of restoration, if the bill contained a provision requiring the Legislature of the State, in accordance with the constitution of the State adopted by the people, to enlarge the elective franchise and to remove disabilities. The constitution adopted by the people of Alabama authorizes the Legislature to do so, but the committee saw fit to reject the proposition. I have no complaint to make against the committee on that account.

Allow me to say we are not without precedent for the bill as originally reported. When we admitted Tennessee by her constitution and laws a large majority of the free male population of the State were excluded from the elective franchise; but, sir, that constitution authorized her Legislature to remove disabilities in Tennessee just as the constitution of Alabama authorizes the Legislature of Alabama to remove disabilities in Alabama. I ventured upon the discussion of the bill admitting Tennessee to say that it would be the interest of the people of Tennessee and the interest of the people of the United States to immediately remove disabilities to such an extent as to place the power of the State in the hands of the majority of the people, and the Legislature of Tennessee after admission did it. I venture to say that if we allow the people under the constitution of Alabama to remove disabilities they will do it. But the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania goes further.

The section offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] which I ask shall also be rejected by the House, is this:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That said State of Alabama shall be recognized and admitted into the Union upon the following fundamental condition: that the right of suffrage of citizens of the United States shall never be denied or abridged in said State on any account except for treason, felony, or other crime infamous at common law; but suffrage as above provided for shall forever be universal and impartial.

Who does not know that every person born within the limits of the Republic is, in the language of the Constitution, a natural-born citizen? Who does not know, therefore, that all the natural-born persons in the United States, men, women, and children, are citizens of the United States? This section, therefore, as it reads, is simply to confer suffrage upon men, women, and children. I do not strain the construction of it. There is no one can hesitate a moment about it who ponders on the words of the section. It is, "That the right of suffrage of citizens of the United States shall never be denied or abridged in said State on any account except for treason, felony, or other crime infamous at common law." "On any account." If citizens of the United States are excluded from suffrage on account of sex, is not that within the meaning of this provision? Are we prepared to legislate in this way? I trust the House will reject the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

As to the substitute offered by my learned colleague, [Mr. SPALDING,] I was not able to catch the amendments very clearly as read by the Clerk, but I believe I comprehended their substance. As the substitute is printed, I beg leave to say to the House that it is directly in conflict with your past legislation. I refer to the third section of the substitute, which is:

That whenever the people, by a majority vote of the qualified electors of Alabama, shall have ratified a constitution submitted as aforesaid, and the Legislature of the proposed State organization shall have ratified the amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and known as article fourteen, the constitution of Alabama may be presented to Congress for its approval.

Now, these words, "whenever the people, by a majority vote of the qualified electors of Alabama, shall have ratified a constitution," are simply a restoration of that bungling provision of the law of last year which we repealed this year.

Mr. SPALDING. Allow me to state that that section is modified so as to read "a majority vote of the electors qualified under the act of Congress."

Mr. BINGHAM. Very well; that is what I was coming to now. If the substitute be so amended it should be rejected. Why? Because it simply acknowledges the very principle that is at stake in this whole controversy, namely, that less than a majority of the qualified electors of the State, but a majority, nevertheless, of those voting, may ratify a constitution. That is fair, that is just. If that is the law, why not stand upon it now, as the first and second sections of the bill reported provide? An overwhelming majority of the people voting at the recent election did ratify the constitution of Alabama.

But, sir, there is another objection to this substitute, and that is this provision of the second section:

And said Legislature is also empowered to submit the constitution, as framed by the convention, with or without amendments proposed by the Legislature.

While that remains in the substitute—"with or without amendments proposed by the Legislature"—I do not stand upon the word which I uttered here before, and which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] did me the honor to quote from my speech, that the constitution of a State can emanate only from the people of the State. These conventions that are called by the people are acts of original sovereignty, not complete, to be sure, till accepted and ratified by the general sovereignty of the nation.

Mr. SPALDING. Will the gentleman allow that amendment to be read as it has been modified?

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes, sir; the last clause. The Clerk read as follows:

And the said Legislature is also empowered by a majority vote of each House to submit the constitution as framed by the convention, with or without amendments proposed by the Legislature; and if amendments be proposed by the Legislature they shall be voted upon separately and not in connection with the constitution as it came from the convention.

Mr. BINGHAM. Of course; and the result of all that is that they may amend it by striking out everything after the preamble and make a constitution and submit it to the people. I see no occasion for any such legislation.

Mr. SPALDING. It is very easy to suppose cases.

Mr. BINGHAM. There is nothing like it, I undertake to say, in the past history of this country, in our past legislation on reconstruction.

Mr. DAWES. It may be so with the last qualification of the gentleman's remark, so far as reconstruction is concerned; but the gentleman will remember, for I think he stood with me, that when the acts were passed to admit Colorado and Nebraska into the Union, this House prescribed a certain amendment to be attached to their constitutions, and prescribed that if that amendment was adopted, not by the people of the States, but by the Legislatures which had already been elected, then they should be admitted.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is entirely foreign to what I am saying. The power of Congress to impose fundamental conditions within the limitations of the Constitution of the United States was settled by the great and immortal act of 1819, on the admission of Missouri; but that is a different question.

Mr. DAWES. It is not a question of fundamental condition that I am calling the attention of the gentleman to, but to the fact that there was prescribed an amendment to the constitutions of the States of Colorado and Nebraska by this House, and it was also provided that the amendment so framed here should be submitted, not to the people of these inchoate States, but to the Legislatures.

Mr. BINGHAM. Oh, I cannot yield further. I understand it perfectly. I undertake to say it was a fundamental condition in the case of Nebraska; and, so far as I am concerned, I have no difficulty about it, for I never voted for it at all.

Mr. DAWES. Does the gentleman decline to yield?

Mr. BINGHAM. I do. It has nothing to do with the question at all; nothing at all to do with it.

Mr. DAWES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BINGHAM. No, sir. There is no kind of excuse for undertaking to evade this issue in that way. This proposition is that the Legislature may amend the constitution of the State of Alabama without any limitation about it, and submit their amendments to the people of that State; and I undertake to say, for myself, (gentlemen can decide for themselves,) that there is no kind of parallel between this provision and the provision of the act of 1819, or the provision of the act admitting the State of Nebraska.

Mr. DAWES. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman is not putting a question that is germane to my point. Not at all.

Mr. DAWES. I would inquire of the gentleman from Ohio, through the Speaker, if he will permit me to put a question to him.

Mr. BINGHAM. Well, I will yield for that, but not to make a speech.

Mr. DAWES. If the gentleman will yield for a question, it is this: will the gentleman permit me to inquire of him what the difference is?

Mr. BINGHAM. Well, I supposed I had said enough for the gentleman to have seen the difference.

Mr. DAWES. Does he decline to be interrupted by me?

Mr. BINGHAM. I decline to be repeating myself for the accommodation of the gentleman. [Laughter.] The difference, however, is perfectly manifest. I have said before, and I do not intend to be diverted from what I have said, that, for myself, I hold that no fundamental condition can be imposed upon the restoration of any State to this Union, or upon the admission of any new State into this Union that does not stand within the limitations and conditions of the Federal Constitution. I stand here to reiterate and reassert what I said before, that the great question involved in the admission of the State of Missouri was a question that stood within the very provisions of the Constitution of the United States itself, not simply by construction, not simply by intendment, not simply by implication, but by the express letter of the Constitution of the United States.

But this is a very different thing. Here is a proposition to authorize the Legislature elected under the constitution already adopted by the people of Alabama to amend that constitution at their pleasure. I say it is without a parallel in the history of the country. I give the gentleman the benefit of the suggestion of the case of Nebraska. The Legislature elected under the constitution which they were sworn to support were asked to change that constitution, and that, too, withholding the people a vote upon the subject. Asked to change it in what? In one particular only. Gentlemen doubtless thought that it stood within the provisions of the Constitution of the United States as the Constitution then was, for the Constitution was not then, in my judgment, what it is now—not by any manner of means. I intimated upon that occasion, speaking for myself, that if the fourteenth article of the amendments had been adopted I thought it very likely that within the provisions of that amendment, so far as the elective franchise was concerned, within the general rule that had obtained in the States, it might be competent for Congress to do the very thing which Congress did attempt to do in that case. But that is foreign to this matter.

Now, having indicated the objections to these various amendments to the bill, I desire to say a few words further in support of the bill as originally reported and without the amendments which are attempted to be fastened upon it, in the hope that the House will come to a direct decision upon the questions; first, whether the original bill shall be perfected by striking out this third section; and second, whether the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] shall be rejected; and third, whether the substitute for this bill, offered by my colleague, [Mr. SPALDING], shall also be rejected; and lastly, whether the bill so amended shall be passed.

The bill, if it be passed in that shape, will be substantially the bill upon which you admitted the State of Tennessee. That bill worked well for the Republic, worked well for the Representatives of the people that passed the law, for the people sustained them everywhere. And I venture the prediction that if the House proceed with this work, following the example set in that case, and admit the State of Alabama, so far as this House is concerned, agreeing to the first and second sections of this bill as reported by the committee, they will find themselves again sustained by the constituencies which they immediately represent upon this floor, and sustained hereafter by the action of the people of Alabama.

Men consult their own interests in matters of this kind. And it is of the highest interest to the people of Alabama, for it touches even their personal security and the security of their homes and their firesides, that they shall provide for the future by extending and securing to a large majority of all the male population of the State the right of the elective franchise as authorized by the provisions of their constitution. That being done, I shall be content.

But, says the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE], appealing to your record, Mr. Speaker, and to my record, "You go back upon yourselves." I remember that day, Mr. Speaker, when, ten years ago, standing in your place here as a Representative of the people of Indiana, you made the speech from which the gentleman read some portions—a speech which did honor alike to your head and your heart. But the gentleman saw fit, taking advantage of your present position, when you could not speak for yourself, to mutilate your speech. For his own purposes the gentleman substituted in my speech of that day the word "Alabama" for the word "Kansas."

Sir, how was it about the constitution of Kansas? It never emanated from that people. No seventy thousand, no fifty thousand, no twenty thousand, no ten thousand, no thousand of the resident citizens of Kansas ever voted for it. You exposed that fact, and so did I, in the arguments which we made on that day. That constitution, known as "the Leecompton atrocity," was nothing more nor less than a written conspiracy against the rights of the people.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] did well to read so much of our speeches as he did, for they reflect no discredit upon us. He also did well, perhaps, to omit so much of our speeches as he did omit, for that reflects credit upon his ingenuity. If he had pursued his investigations further in that record he would have found that there was imbedded in that Leecompton constitution the blasphemous doctrine that the right of ownership in slaves was before and higher than any human constitutions or laws, and that the constitution of Kansas should never be so amended as to affect the ownership of property in slaves.

Are the cases of Alabama and Kansas parallel? They are as wide apart as the poles; as manifestly distinct as those two conditions in the universe, heaven and hell. There is no use in attempting to get up a parallel. Here is a constitution which secures to every human being, irrespective of the accidents of birth, color, race, or the adventitious aid of wealth or social position, the equal protection of the laws. On the other hand, there was a constitution that smote down men on account of their color, and declared that they had none of the rights whatever which belong to human nature.

I am not to be moved from my support of this bill by any reference of that sort to my past record. Here is a constitution of government republican in form; a constitution ratified by the votes of seventy thousand freemen; a constitution, I venture to say, supported by a larger vote, with perhaps a solitary exception, than the constitution of any State of this Union organized under the Constitution of the United States ever received in its inception.

Now, my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAMS] talks of the majority principle. What, sir, is the majority principle in this country and in every State of the Union but the principle that the majority of those voting at the election shall determine the result. That is all there is of it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would like the gentleman to say why that principle was not adopted in the reconstruction act.

Mr. BINGHAM. I answer, because the gentleman and his friends, aided by a minority on our side of the House, voted it down. But, sir, we have repealed the provision of our law that conflicted with this principle, and the principle is now embodied in our act; and I want some man in this House or out of the House to tell me the difference between recognizing that principle now, after the fact, or recognizing it before the fact and allowing it to go through this operation again. It is the difference between tweedledum and tweedledee. If it be wise or just or proper for this House to provide that seventy thousand votes shall be sufficient next May to adopt and ratify this constitution, it is within the power of this House, to-day, to say that the seventy thousand who did vote for it last February made it thereby the law of that people. Why? Because it is but the exercise of the right of petition, and, no matter how or when that right may be exercised, it is for Congress to give effect to that petition, the highest petition of right known among the American people, by a solemn act of Congress. If you affirm their petition it becomes fundamental law for the State; if you reject their petition, whether it be sent up last February or next May, it will be no more than so much blank paper.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] who reported this bill, is entitled to one hour to close the debate.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] and afterward I will yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] I propose to occupy but a brief time myself, as the House is anxious to come to a vote.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, I should be very glad to vote for this bill as it comes from the committee, either with or without the third section, if I could see that it afforded any guarantee of security to the people of Alabama. I did desire that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] should, if possible, remove from my mind some doubts which I at present entertain on this subject. I regret that the gentleman, in his seeming self-satisfaction with his own ideas, was disposed to proclaim them as the lex scripta of the House, and permit no man to dissent from them as conclusive evidence of the duty of this body. The gentleman knows very well that he and I stood side by side in this House in resisting to the extent of our power what seemed to me precisely the same thing as that which he denounced a moment ago when referring to the proposition of his colleague from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING.] That which the gentleman proclaimed has never been done before is, it seems to me, precisely the thing which has been done time and again.

My purpose, however, in rising at this time, was merely to put on record a reason why I am unwilling to vote for this bill. The proposition of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] will secure to the people of Alabama everything that is secured to them by the original bill, except one thing; and that is representation in Congress. The theory of all our legislation touching those States recently in rebellion is that the moment representation is secured to any one of them in this and the other branch of Congress the State passes from under our control, except so far as we may, under the limitations of the Constitution, control every other State of the Union; in other words, that if Alabama be admitted to representation in the Halls of Congress, then, whatever may afterward result, we can no more interfere with the State of Alabama than with the State of Massachusetts. That is the theory upon which all our reconstruction legislation rests.

Now, it is proposed by the substitute of the gentleman from Ohio to legislate so that everything which, under the Constitution, can be secured to those people shall be secured to them, except representation in the two Houses of Congress. It is insisted, however, that it is our duty not only to secure to them this right, but also to take them from under the supervision of Congress hereafter. Notwithstanding the doubtful condition of things in that State, notwithstanding the uncertain voice of the people touching this fundamental law, gentlemen of this House are unwilling to say to those people, "We will put you in a condition in which you will be able to prove whether you can sustain your constitution and your personal rights under it." It appears to be absolutely necessary, in the opinion of those who advocate the original bill, that representation in Congress shall be at once granted to Alabama.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I confess to have undergone some change of views during the years I have spent in this House touching the question of granting representation in Congress to those portions of the country that have been under the control of the rebellion. You remember, sir, that in times past I have struggled to secure representation to even single districts as the armies of the United States cleared out the rebellious element in those districts. I have stood here trying to secure to them, district after district, representation in this House. But, sir, I have become satisfied that representation in Congress, instead of being the first thing to be secured to these States, should be the last thing; that the State should first be built up, personal rights should be secured, the damage done by the rebellion should be repaired, the stability and security of the State as an organized and peaceful community should be made certain; and representation in Congress should follow and grow out of that security, not be relied upon as a means of bringing about such security. Representation in Congress should be the last step in the work of reorganization, not the first.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] may be extended.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I cannot consent to extend the gentleman's time. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.]

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I wish to say a few words with regard to the condition of this bill, and what seems to me as wise to be done by this House.

Sometime ago Congress passed an act authorizing Alabama and other waste territories of the United States [laughter] to form constitutions so as, if possible, to make them fit to associate with civilized communities; and we gave them a certain length of time for that purpose. It was provided—whether wisely or unwisely it is not for me to say—that Alabama and these other communities, after having their voters registered, should hold elections and that a majority of the registered voters should be necessary to secure the adoption of such constitutions. Unfortunately, Alabama in her recent election has failed by a considerable number to poll the required majority for the adoption of her constitution. The House, foreseeing this difficulty before it finally happened, passed several months ago an act empowering these States to adopt constitutions by a majority of the votes polled, in accordance with the majority principle as recognized generally throughout the Union. But the Senate (and here is the source of all our troubles) with a wisdom far above that of this House—a wisdom which has characterized that body upon many just such disastrous issues [laughter]—let that bill lie upon their table for over two months, though urged to take it up and pass it before the election had taken place in Alabama. The election was held, and it was found that the constitution had received, according to the existing law, a minority of votes. Hence we are now called upon either to deny Alabama admission under that constitution or to violate our own enabling act, which provided for admitting those States upon certain conditions. There is nothing that prevents us from violating that act if we deem it prudent to do so.

I am often reminded by gentlemen in this House—some very wise and some otherwise [laughter]—that I have said more than once that all our legislation on this subject was "outside of the Constitution." [Laughter.] He is "otherwise" who thinks that assertion untrue. [Laughter.] This very proceeding shows, if a majority here should adopt the measure now proposed, that this House believes itself to be acting not in accordance with the forms of the Constitution, which contemplates no such case of lapsed territory to be formed into communities and brought into the nation.

When West Virginia was introduced I first made that declaration. That State sought to come in and was admitted by a majority of this House, upon the ground that the people had gone through with the requirements of the Constitution in obtaining the consent of both those States when one had ceased to exist long before and the other one existed in Ohio, and gave her consent there. [Laughter.] I voted for the admission of that State. I was not going to make either a fool or a knave of myself and say I voted for it under the Constitution, or I did not know what I was voting for. I held then, as I hold now, that having conquered that portion of another power—a power recognized as an independent belligerent by all civilized nations of the earth, ours as well as the rest—we had a right to treat them as a foreign nation and take them in or keep them out as we pleased. I said then that the Constitution had nothing to do with them.

Now, I would inform my learned friends from the bushes [laughter] that when I spoke of being outside the Constitution I did not mean that the Constitution does not recognize the law of nations. It does recognize the law of nations, and the law of nations recognizes the right of a conquering power to do with its conquered territories as it pleases. Hence we had a right to treat these rebel States after they had become a power just as we pleased, without the least reference to the Constitution except so far as the Constitution covered over them the law of nations under which we were acting.

I trust that I shall hear nothing more after this explanation from my most obfuscated friends who have so often seemed so ignorant of what I meant or what they were talking about. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, what are we to say with regard to Alabama? And I confess to you, sir, that I am not entirely clear as to what we ought to do as a just and wise body. We have power under the Constitution to admit new States, whether made out of the fragments of a confederate State or the fragments of a foreign nation, or by another process when we come to agree with those States. For I hold that when you come to admit new States you can admit them on just such conditions as the States agree upon. They are parties capable of contracting, capable of proposing and consenting, and until they have lost their power to consent by having become actually incorporated in another body which takes away that power, they have always the right to enter into such contracts, and after they have gone into a negotiation and made a contract and it is partly executed, they are bound to fulfill it.

What was done with regard to Texas? When she was admitted it was not only a condition imposed by this Congress, but it was a proposition made to that State that she should keep her wild lands and pay her debts, there being over fifteen million acres of wild lands and several million dollars of debt, which we afterward paid to be sure, because Texas could not pay it. Did any body ever doubt that that was a valid and binding contract on the people of both sections—upon both nations, if you please, for they were two nations—upon both contracting powers?

Sir, after the many cases which I shall not enumerate, for it would be an intimation of great ignorance on the part of members of this House for me to do so, after the numerous cases in which conditions have been proposed and accepted and acted upon and never violated; after the conditions proposed to Missouri, to Arkansas, and the other States, which, as I said I will not enumerate, after the admission of States without enabling acts, time out of mind, for anybody to maintain, upon any tract of land coming here and saying, "Here are one hundred thousand people; here is a constitution under which we would like to become one of the members of your Union;" that we cannot upon that state of the case send that identical constitution to their people to be voted upon, and if ratified to be accepted and acted upon here forever after, seems to me to be a degree of ignorance which I will not presume to exist in this House.

If, then, we have a right to do it in one instance we have a right to do it in all instances in which we admit new States into the Union. Now the only question is, although this State has not lived up to this enabling act, are we prepared to admit her as fit to associate with freemen, a few of whom have so sympathized with the rebels that they are unwilling to let these poor men into this Union at all?

What is that Constitution? It is that every man of sufficient age, twenty-one, shall be entitled to vote at their elections. If I were certain that those who have just perjured themselves and attempted to break down this glorious Union would live and abide by their contract, and not attempt further to destroy us if we admit this terrible leaven, I should not hesitate. There are no forms, no omissions, that would keep me from admitting them into the Union at once. I confess I have my doubts—I am sorry for it—as to whether, after we shall have admitted them into the Union, and after the morrow's sun shall have set upon them, they will not be ready to call a new convention and to reestablish slavery in some shape or form. We know very well the ingenuity of these men. We abolished slavery except for crime; but I have been informed of twenty cases in which men have been sold into bondage and are now serving in it. One case is in Florida, where our commissioner of freedmen informed me that he had seen six of them sold for twenty years. How do they do it?

They pass a law that any man guilty of assault and battery shall be sold into slavery for twenty years. It is the law there now. They go into the street and a white man jostles a black one or a black man jostles a white one. He is taken right to the court-house, is convicted of assault and battery, and is sold for twenty years into slavery. There are hundreds this day in the southern States who are serving as slaves on just such contrivances. They have so altered the law that they have introduced the system of peonage, even worse than in Mexico and the middle southern provinces. And yet what shall we do? We must try so to shackle them in some way that while we are admitting these fraudulent white men we are securing the poor ignorant black man from their impositions. Hence it is that I have moved to strike out all after the first section and insert in its place what I think will be a complete shackle.

But the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] to strike out the third section is all, I must say, in the interest of slavery. I have offered my proposition to try to protect, if possible, freedom against the wiles of the most wicked institution that God ever afflicted man with or that ever could exist through the invention of human ingenuity.

Mr. BROMWELL. I desire to make a suggestion to the gentleman. His amendment is considered not specific enough. It would permit any citizen of any other State to vote in Alabama who might happen to come in immediately before an election.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. How should I alter it?

Mr. BROMWELL. Confine it to citizens of the State of Alabama. As it stands now it would confer the right of suffrage on both sexes.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. What words shall I use?

Mr. BROMWELL. I want to know if that is the gentleman's intention?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Oh, no; but the intention is that everybody shall vote.

Mr. BROMWELL. I suggest to the gentleman that he use the words "citizens of the State according to the laws thereof."

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I will make it read "citizens of the State." Now, sir, I will vote for no constitution that does not give universal and impartial suffrage, and, so far as human ligaments can bind it, bind that provision unalterably and ineradicably into that instrument, so that if it is ever taken out by the roots it shall take out every other fragment of the instrument itself, and send them back to act according to the provisions of a new law.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.]

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make one observation in regard to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] I believe that, however just may be its purpose, it is wholly inadequate to accomplish any practical result in the form in which it is presented. It provides "that the right of suffrage of citizens of the United States shall never be denied or abridged in said State on any account except for treason, felony, or other crime infamous at common law." That applies as well to women and children as to men.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman will allow me to say that that is not a fair construction of the amendment; but I will say "electors of the United States" instead of "citizens."

Mr. BOUTWELL. Well, I do not see how that would help the matter.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Well, how can you help it, then?

Mr. BOUTWELL. If I submit a proposition I consider it my province to meet all the difficulties that may be raised in regard to it. If I oppose a proposition it can hardly be supposed that I will suggest the means to perfect it.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman is opposed to the proposition, very well; let him go on.

Mr. BROMWELL. Let the gentleman say "male citizens."

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I will say "male citizens of the United States over twenty-one years of age."

Mr. BOUTWELL. I am in favor of this bill and opposed to the amendment submitted by the chairman of the Committee on Reconstruction [Mr. STEVENS] after the bill has been agreed upon by the committee and reported by them to this House. The objection to the amendment submitted by that gentleman is so practical and easy to be understood that, in my judgment, it is not possible for this House or for Congress or for the country to accept it.

What does the gentleman say in that amendment? That the right of suffrage shall not be abridged except for treason, felony, or other crime infamous at the common law. How is that fact to be ascertained? There is no provision here for that purpose; but by the necessary construction of the language, if employed in a statute, it is to be ascertained by a conviction of the party. And does the gentleman expect that the men who, by the third section of the fourteenth article of amendments to the Constitution of the United States, have been declared to be ineligible to the office are to be convicted in any court in Alabama of treason, or that any considerable number of them are ever to be arraigned? And will it not be a consequence of the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] if it shall be adopted and become a part of the law of the land, that all persons in the State of Alabama will be at once admitted to the exercise of the elective franchise? I say that the amendment would give to every rebel in that State, even though guilty of treason of the highest grade, the right to vote at all the elections of that State.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I cannot yield to the gentleman. He has had half an hour, and I have only five minutes.

I have to say further only that the conditions declared to be fundamental by the third section of this bill are in entire harmony with nine precedents in the history of this country, and are within the rule laid down by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] they are in harmony with the Constitution of the United States, and not in any sense outside of it, or extraneous to it, and they are conditions that are necessary to the security of this country, if Alabama is to be readmitted as a State in the Union.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I shall not occupy much of the time of the House on this occasion. I think I have been very considerate so far, having occupied less than thirty minutes when I reported this bill; and I shall now occupy less than twenty minutes in closing the debate upon it.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] opposes the passage of this bill because, he says, it will put the State of Alabama in the hands of rebels. Gentlemen on the other side of the House oppose its passage because it will put the State in the hands of loyal men. Now, who shall decide when doctors disagree?
